SIR ALEXANDER GORDON: Sir, before I address to the House the few remarks I wish to make upon the question before us I think it is due to the House, as well as to myself, to state the reason why I rise on this side of the House, instead of upon that from which I have formerly addressed it. It had not been my intention to say a single word in this debate, although I have carefully studied the Papers and made up my mind upon the question; but the course of the debate in this House, and in "another place," has shown me that the sole remaining cause of the war is a supposed necessity for altering the North-West Frontier of India. That, Sir, is a military question which all military men of any standing in the Army have studied, and upon which they have very strong opinions. It is a question wholly removed from Party politics; and I am sure the opinion of military men on one side of the House is as good as that of military men on the other. But I know well from past experience that if I rise on the other side of the House to state an opinion, although it be only a military opinion, that is not concurred in by some hon. Members opposite I meet with interference, annoyance, and even obstruction which prevents my speaking freely. I do not refer for a moment to the courteous Member for Mid-Kent (Sir William Hart-Dyke), or any of his officially recognized assistants. Their conduct is always marked by courtesy and kindness. But there are some self-constituted lieutenants who think it their duty when a Member is not speaking in accordance with their views to cause him great annoyance. I have, therefore, thought it best, Sir, on this occasion to rise in the freer atmosphere on this side of the House. I wish, in the first place, to refer to what I consider the origin of the war which we are now discussing. I consider that it took its origin in the measure that was announced on the very first day that I took my seat in this House in 1876. On that occasion a measure was brought into Parliament, and I formed the opinion that that measure contained the germs of a policy which would bring trouble upon this country. That measure has developed itself into what is now called "Imperialism." It has now, in my opinion, resulted in this war. Sir, I would wish to mention to the House what has not yet been stated, and which I think a very remarkable circumstance. The measure to which I allude, and which was announced to the Government of India on the 28th February, 1876, was not brought before this House for the second reading of the Bill until the 9th of March, and it did not receive the Royal Assent until the 27th of April. But, notwithstanding that, we find that on the 28th February, 1876, Her Majesty's Government sent to India detailed instructions for carrying into effect an Act of Parliament which was not passed till two months afterwards. I think, Sir, that was an instance of disregard for Parliamentary procedure which would be dangerous to Parliamentary government. The despatch to which I refer is addressed to the Governor General, Lord Lytton, and will be found at page 156 of the Blue Book. It is not couched in language notifying an expected measure to be taken into his consideration and to be prepared for when it should be passed into law—explicit instructions are given to the Viceroy as to how his duties and relations were affected by the assumption of the Imperial title by the Queen, as if the Royal Titles Act were already a measure upon which

[Fourth Night.]

Parliament had decided. I think if hon. Members had known, during that heated discussion on this question, that two months before it was passed, and while we were discussing it in this House, the instructions for carrying it into effect were already in India, they would have been very much surprised. Now, Sir, it appears to me that the responsibility of this war rests upon the shoulders of one individual. It was announced at the Lord Mayor's dinner by the Prime Minister for the first time that the Government thought it necessary to have a rectification of our North-West Frontier in India. Military men immediately inquired who was the author of this rectification. No one had ever heard of such a proposal. It had never been officially brought before the public in any document. Military men had always congratulated themselves upon the strength of the North-West Frontier. Nature had given us a better Frontier than we could have devised for ourselves. But when this Paper was laid before Parliament, it appeared in a Memorandum from Lord Napier of Magdala. I find in that Memorandum this paragraph—

"Our policy of masterly inactivity, or rather of receding from every difficulty until what were matters easy of suppression have grown into serious dangers, has continued too long, and if it is maintained will lead us to disaster."

That was the opinion given by Lord Napier of Magdala in a Memorandum dated May 30 this year, and recorded at page 226 of the Blue Book. But if you look to page 134 of these Papers you will find there a despatch from the Foreign Department of the Government of India, dated Simla, June 7th, 1875, with six signatures, including that of Lord Napier of Magdala, in which it is said—

"Much discussion has recently taken place as to the effect that would be produced by a Russian advance to Merv."

It goes on—

"To anticipate the Russian occupation of Merv by any active measures or specific Treaty engagements would, in our opinion, be more likely to prejudice rather than to advance the interests of Her Majesty's Indian Empire. . . . We would impress upon Her Majesty's Government our conviction that such relations will best be secured by a steady adherence to the patient and conciliatory policy which has been pursued by the Government of India for many years towards Afghanistan."—[Ibid. p. 135.]

Sir Alexander Gordon

That opinion was signed by Lord Napier of Magdala; and the House and the country have a right to know the distinct reasons which have caused him now, in the year 1878, to change the strong opinions which he expressed, in 1875, in concert with the Government of India. Something more is required than a telegram of two lines, read by the Prime Minister in "another place." That telegram stated that Afghanistan in the hands of another Power may deal a fatal blow to our rule, and that an advanced position is necessary for our safety. Lord Napier, in the Memorandum which he sent home in May, 1878, said—

"It has been frequently asserted, by people with pretensions to speak with authority, that we shall be secure if we remain within our mountain boundary. But this is at variance with all history. A mountain chain that can be pierced in many places is no security if you hide behind it. India has been often entered through her mountain barrier, which was never defended. India waited to fight the battle in her own plains, and invariably lost it."—[Ibid. p. 226.]

But my opinion is that the country ought to be very cautious how it acts upon that opinion, even although it comes from one whom I respect so much as Lord Napier. In opposition to that opinion I would give that of the Archduke Charles, who, writing in the beginning of this century upon what the French call La Grande Guerre, stated that a great many Generals adopt the erroneous opinion that a country must be protected by the establishment of a long line of posts, and neglecting the essential principle of concentrating on decisive points, forgetting that by so doing they threw all the advantages into the hands of the enemy when he brought his whole force to bear upon a single point. The opinion of General de Fauré, of the Military School of Instruction of Switzerland, is that the best method of repulsing an aggression consists in concentrating as much as possible, and in occupying in force all positions from which rapid advances upon the attacked points can easily be made. The last opinion I will quote is that of a distinguished officer of our own—General Hamley—who, in a work he wrote some time ago, said that whenever the theatre of operations was in a mountainous country, and although bodies of troops might manœuvre in the hills, the main action of the campaign will be in districts which will be practicable for the movement of large armies. It is a very singular circumstance that that distinguished officer this very afternoon delivered a lecture upon this very question at the United Service Institution, under the presidency of Sir Henry Rawlinson, and I was pleased to observe that he still held his formerly recorded opinion—that it was not necessary to take a single yard of country in front of that which we now possess in order to keep that country in a proper state of defence. After the events of 1842, the Duke of Wellington wrote to Lord Ellenborough that “No extension of our territory is desirable in India, even if a war for conquest could be justified;” and in the House of Lords he said—

“Your Lordships would reject Afghanistan and Cabul, even if they were bequeathed as a peace-offering by Shah Shujah to England.”

In a despatch from the Government of India, while he was a Member of it, addressed to the Government at home, Lord Napier said—

“Should a foreign Power, such as Russia, ever seriously think of invading India from without, or, what is more probable, of stirring up the elements of disaffection or anarchy within it, our true policy, our strongest security, would then, we conceive, be found to lie in previous abstinence from entanglements at either Cabul, Candahar, or any similar outpost; . . . in the construction of material works within British India.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 44.]

With these opinions before them I think I have a good right to ask why the Government have adopted a policy of extending our Frontier in that direction? It seems to me that if we advance at all in that direction we must advance so as to include the whole of Afghanistan—so as to obtain ample room for our armies to move, and to be supplied by the plains beyond the mountains. If we were to do that we should find ourselves in a position of considerable difficulty if France should attempt to carry out the design frequently attributed to her of annexing Belgium. No doubt we had entered into Treaties engaging us to defend Belgium in any such eventuality; but it would be awkward for us to raise our hands to prevent France from “rectifying her Frontier” in that direction, if we ourselves had annexed Afghanistan for a similar reason. It had been said that the Indian Frontier had never been invaded; but it must be remembered that India had never been attacked, since we had had it. If it ever were attacked, I am convinced that our present Frontier would be most gallantly defended. The Under Secretary of State for India has stated that during the last 28 years there have been 19 expeditions comprising 58,000 men. That gives an average of 2,000 men. I think it a very fortunate thing that the Frontier can be defended with so small a force. Too little pains have been taken to avoid the extremity of war. I find in a telegram from Sir Neville Chamberlain the following very remarkable expression:—

“Cavagnari reports that we have received a decisive answer from Faiz Mahomed, after personal interview, that he will not allow Mission to proceed. . . . Make another attempt to-morrow morning, and try to bring Faiz Mahomed to reason, or make him fire upon us.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 236.]

“Or make him fire upon us!” That expression appears to indicate a very remarkable frame of mind, and to some extent goes to show that sufficient pains have not been taken to avoid this unfortunate contact. In the words of Sir Charles Metcalfe deprecating in the strongest manner a somewhat similar proposal, he said—

“It was a trick unworthy of any Government, which, when detected, could not fail to excite jealousy and indignation; and might not, impossibly, lead to war.”

I have thought it my duty, intending to vote for the Resolution of the hon. Member for Bedford, to explain to the House why I do so, because I fear the country is embarking in a most serious and hazardous policy.

MR. R. E. PLUNKETT said, he hoped if he were surrounded by any of the self-constituted lieutenants of the Conservative Whip, they would not bring to bear upon him the system of annoyance of which the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Alexander Gordon) complained, and which he said compelled him to have recourse to the serener atmosphere of Opposition in order to state his opinions. He (Mr. Plunkett) contended that the alleged change of policy on the part of the Government did not begin with the letter which was sent to the Ameer's Commissioner at Peshawur in July, 1876, and he held that it could be satisfactorily proved that at that time there was a secret Russian Agent at Cabul. There had been evidence that the Envoy was at Cabul at that time; and on the 14th of September there was a complaint from our Foreign Office on the subject. So that the point so strongly urged by some of the leading speakers opposite simply fell to the ground. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) urged that the present Government had changed the policy of never sending a Resident Agent to Afghanistan. If, however, the words of Lord Mayo were to be taken as promising for all time that we should never send a Resident, it must be also taken that we had promised we should never for all time send British troops into Afghanistan, or enter into a Treaty with the Ameer, which was absurd. Accusations had been made against Members of the Government in connection with the Papers which had been produced, which perhaps it would be better not to allude to. Attacks made by hon. or right hon. Members in presence of each other were within the limits of Parliamentary debate, conducted on a fair field, and before the most generous Assembly in the world; but when they attacked those who were not there to answer for themselves, it should be with more moderation than had characterized the language lately used against the Viceroy of India. He did not complain of the language used by the hon. Member for Bedford or the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt); but there was a point on which he thought they were almost entitled to ask for some explanation from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone). In the speech he made at Greenwich the other day he accused the Government of what really amounted to fraud and deceit, because, he said, they had suppressed three letters, which were the cause of the war. Now the three letters which the right hon. Gentleman said had been suppressed were identical with the letter to which he had referred, and the right hon. Gentleman had the substance of the letters in his hand when he brought against Lord Lytton this portentous charge of dissimulation and fraud. The right hon. Gentleman having described them as startling and astounding, expressed a hope that some explanation would be afforded of them. After making that speech and before he spoke in this House, the right hon. Gentleman might have consulted the Papers, where we were distinctly told the letters were copies of one another and might have acknowledged that he had been mistaken, but he took no such course. The letters were given in extenso in the Papers, where they were stated to be copies of each other, and this was what they said—

[Fourth Night.]

“ I write this friendly letter to inform you that the 16th or 17th September has been fixed for the departure of a Mission of high rank from the British Government to Cabul, and that the Mission will start whether Nawab Gholam Hussein shall or shall not by that time have had the honour of waiting on His Highness the Ameer. The object for which Mission is deputed is friendly, and the refusal of free passage to it, or interruption, or injury to its friendly progress will be regarded as act of hostility. I am to explain that the Mission will not in any case enter capital of Cabul before expiry of the month Ramazan. In conclusion may you keep well.”—[Afghanistan, No. 2, p. 21.]

He (Mr. Plunkett) had no difficulty in seeing how the matter stood; but he probably read with less prejudice than the right hon. Gentleman. He listened attentively to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, who, he regretted, did not appear to feel himself bound to make some retraction of so baseless a charge.

MR. COURTNEY said, that having begun with the notion of a friendly Mission, we had gone on to a rectification of Frontier; and if the result of the present war should be a rectification of Frontier we should certainly be driven, as soon as we had crossed the crests of the mountain ranges, to pour down to the valleys on the other side as surely as water poured down a hill. We must go further if we advanced at all. He would therefore offer a view of this question which, as far as he knew, had not been presented to the House. It had been assumed in this debate that we were deeply interested in the maintenance of Afghanistan as a free, strong, independent and friendly territory. Its freedom and independence, indeed, might be limited so far that it must be free from all influence and all control except our own. In a very able paper, Sir Bartle Frere, with whom in many points he did not agree, had made some observations marked by very good sense. He pointed out what had been proved by experience over and over again—that, if two civilized

Mr. R. E. Plunkett

States have between them a Power less civilized that Power will be a source of embarrassment to both. Now, he maintained that so far from being a source of embarrassment to us, if Afghanistan ceased to be friendly, our position in India would be improved, even if Russia embodied Afghanistan in her own territory. And why? For this reason—we should be near our base, while Russia would be far from hers; we should have an admirable position such as we had now, Russia would have no position whatever; we should be well supplied and Russia ill supplied; and we should have all our forces at our command, while Russia would be at a great distance from her supplies. When he had the privilege three years ago of travelling in India, he went up to the very country to which the debate had reference, and he took the utmost pains, by consulting all authorities, to investigate the Frontier question. As the result of his inquiries he found a general concurrence of opinion among all authorities, civil and military, which fully confirmed the views expressed by the hon. and gallant Officer near him (Sir Alexander Gordon) in favour of the present Frontier, and protesting against any advance of it. Holding that opinion, he read with the greatest dissatisfaction the Central Asia Papers from end to end. More than that, the opinion which he put forward was the opinion of Her Majesty's Government. The Prime Minister himself had said that it was a wholly impracticable proposition to cross our present Frontier; and the present Foreign Secretary, who had a longer acquaintance with Indian affairs than the Secretary of State for India, had expressed a similar opinion. He believed that we might defy all Russian intrigue in India as long as we governed that country justly and honestly. He would now take into consideration what were our relations with Afghanistan when the present Government came into Office. The Ameer was not less favourably disposed towards us then than he had been for a long time before. Indeed, how was it possible for the Ameer to care very much for us? We had shown, over and over again, that we did not care the least for him or his dynasty, and that all we cared for was the maintenance of Afghanistan. He was astonished to hear hon. Members complain of Sir John Lawrence keeping himself aloof from the contest between the Ameer and his brother. It had been argued as if we ought to have known from the first that Shere Ali would be settled on the Throne; whereas, in fact, that result was brought about by a mere accident—the death of his brother. The Ameer had nothing to thank us for, and the particular things he desired were those which the Government absolutely refused to concede. Lord Salisbury, on coming into office, started this question of improving our relations with Shere Ali without even ascertaining whether they could be improved. The noble Lord, bent on doing something, was led step by step, from Mission to Mission, until at last he got to the question of the rectification of the Frontier. When the Duke of Argyll asked Lord Salisbury in the House of Lords what he was going to do in this matter, he made an answer which had been defended by hon. Members opposite. The defence amounted to this—that Lord Salisbury was speaking by the card; that he himself said so; and that everybody who heard him must have been aware of the necessity of paying great attention to his remarks so as not to misunderstand them. Surely Lord Northbrook, who was in the House at the time, must have listened most attentively to Lord Salisbury's remarks. Well, Lord Northbrook on that occasion made a short speech, in which he said that the policy of previous Governments had been to show the Ameer our desire to assist him with our advice whenever he required it, and not to press upon him the presence of British Residents in his territories, unless he really desired that they should go there and would give them a welcome. Whatever the intention of Lord Salisbury was, it was evident that his reply was misleading, and that it actually did mislead a man most competent to judge the question, as was shown by the speech of Lord Northbrook. More than that, Lord Salisbury heard those remarks of Lord Northbrook, but offered no correction of the misapprehension, although he corrected the statement of another noble Lord in reference to another question. This misleading policy on the part of the Government had recently received several exemplifications, and no time ought to be lost in stamping it with the reprobation of Parliament. All these transactions, the progress of which was marked, as he had shown, by the circulation of misleading despatches and telegrams, culminated in a war which the House was now asked to pronounce to have been alike unjust and unnecessary, those who opposed the war being described, amongst other epithets, as devotees of peace at any price. He denied the accuracy of the description as far as he was personally concerned. They were told that it was impossible to appreciate the insulting and sardonic character of the Ameer's reply to Lord Lytton unless they knew the Persian language; but what knowledge, he would ask, had Lord Lytton of Persian? It was, perhaps, about on a par with his knowledge of the Servian language, and those who paid any attention to current literature knew the extent of Lord Lytton's knowledge of Servian. His reason for supporting the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford was that, being jealous of his country's honour, and anxious for her welfare, he saw that the policy of Her Majesty's Government tended to degrade the national character, and, at the same time, to set an evil example to the people of India, who were placed under our charge for education as well as for government.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the debates upon this great question had been marked by the exhibition of great talent; but there had been a good deal of bitterness displayed on account of the supposed suppression of information. He did not think that these suspicions were justified to the extent that had been urged. He desired, however, to recall to hon. Members the fact, that the House had placed itself at a great disadvantage in relation to every subject connected with India. By successive Acts Parliament had cut off every source of independent information. Formerly, India was governed by the East India Company, regulated to some extent by the Board of Control. The Directors of the East India Company were capable of being elected Members of this House, and some of the Directors were always Members of this House. Parliament afterwards exhibited its consciousness of the necessity for the preservation of independent information, and of its authorised communication to this House, touching the government of India; for by the Act of 1853, not more than three nominees of the Crown were added to the Court of Directors, while the Government was retained in the hands of the Company. Again, by the Act of 1858, which transferred the Government of India to the Crown, Parliament retained seven Directors elected by the East India Company, as independent experts, in the Council created by that Act, and among other reasons in order that the Council might serve as a source of independent information for this House and for Parliament; but he must remind the Members of the late Administration, that India was now governed under the Acts of 1869, chaps. 97 and 98, by which the independence of the Council of India was wholly suppressed. The first of those Acts constituted the Government of India not in the Council, as it stood in the Act of 1858, but directly in the Secretary of State for India; and, instead of retaining seven Members of that Council, elected either by the East India Company, or self-elected by the Council, they made every Member of that Council the nominee, the creature of the Secretary of State. By passing those two Acts the House had, in his judgment, deprived itself of the means of obtaining that current information, from any source independent of the Minister of the day, which was really necessary for the exercise of its functions in relation to the Government of India. He (Mr. Newdegate) had felt the effects of that. He proved it from this fact—He had looked through Hansard to ascertain how far subjects connected with India had been considered by that House during the last three Sessions. In order to ascertain the time devoted by the House to Indian subjects, he counted the pages of Hansard, and he had the figures here, and they proved that little more than one-thirtieth part of the time of the House during the last three Sessions was devoted to Indian subjects. That was a natural effect of the lack of current independent information with respect to Indian affairs. But for the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), to whom all honour was due, the House would have remained altogether without information. When, however, hon. Members on the Opposition Benches rose and complained that they had been kept too much in the dark, he could not help reminding them that it was by their own

Mr. Courtney

Acts, passed during a Liberal Administration—the Indian Acts of 1869—that they had effectually provided against receiving independent information by having access to the Minutes of the Council and the independent opinions of experts. This was a very serious change, because it had always been held that it was essential to the safe government of India and to the retention of our Indian Empire that the action of “party” in this House and in Parliament should be, as far as possible, limited in its effects on the government of India. And what had they now? A Secretary of State, who must be a party-man, invested with the sole government of India. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) evidently entertained some feeling of this kind when he sought some opportunity, apart from the proceeding on the Address to the Crown, so that the party feeling and action of this House should bear upon the actual Government in India; since his Motion was couched in words condemnatory of the past conduct of the Government. The Government refused him all facilities; and he (Mr. Newdegate) ventured to recommend the hon. Member at once to appoint his Motion for some day at the command of the unofficial Members of the House. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) interfered. That right hon. Gentleman was more responsible than anyone else for the fact that the question before the House, which was intended to be a substantive Resolution, had been converted into an Amendment to the Address, thus giving the substance of the Amendment an immediate and distinctively party character—a character which, if too often repeated in its proceedings and maintained in its debates on Indian affairs, would incapacitate the House, in the opinion of the country, from exacting from Ministers their due responsibility for the government of India; because, if the action of parties in the House were to be represented in the Government of India, the reproach of Shere Ali would be verified, and the Natives of India and their local Rulers would not know from year to year what policy or what treatment they were to expect from the Government of India. Nothing could so completely shake their confidence; nothing could tend so essentially to endanger our Indian Empire; and beyond this, what would be the effect of this Amendment, if it were carried, upon the position of our Army in Afghanistan? He was old enough to remember the events of 1838, 1839, and 1840, and the present circumstances were in many respects wonderfully similar. In 1837 the Russian agent Vichovich was reported to be engaged in intrigues at Cabul. He was reported to have been poisoning the mind of Dost Mahomed, the Ameer, the father of Shere Ali, against this country and her government of India. It was a Liberal Government who, in 1838, dispatched an expedition to Afghanistan. That was an ill-omened expedition; it was dispatched at too late a period of the year; and when he asked himself how he would vote that night, he could not help thinking of the present severe weather, and the position of our troops in Afghanistan. When, on the previous day, the hon. and learned Member for the City of Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) lauded the old policy in preference to the new, the hon. and learned Member's speech touched a chord which vibrated, for he (Mr. Newdegate) was not in love with this new policy. It appeared to him that this war in Afghanistan was to be traced directly to the fact of the present Government having sent Indian troops to Malta last year—a measure in condemnation of the manner of doing which he had recorded his vote. He traced the present war directly to that expedition; and what had been the effect of it in other respects? Hitherto it had been the habit of that House to abstain from introducing into questions relating to European politics subjects connected with the government of India; European politics must ever be a matter of party debate and party action in that House. Now, if that House were habitually to adopt party action on questions relating to India, that would endanger our Indian Empire. If Indian subjects were to be mixed up with European politics, how would they be able to preserve continuity and stability in the government of India from the disturbance of the party action, which was inseparable from subjects connected with European politics? At that hour of the night he would not presume further to trespass on the kindness of the House. But if he recorded his vote against the Resolution of the hon. Member for Bedford, which he felt he must do, he should do so from a sense of duty—of duty to our Army in Afghanistan, a duty dictated by the conviction—that if our Army should now hastily retire from that country we should never be able to re-establish our old position there. Hon. Members opposite should consider what would be the effect of the success of that Amendment. At that moment, when our troops were far advanced into a dangerous country in winter, would, under such circumstances, hon. Members condemn the work of our Army and their action? [Cries of "No!" from the Liberal Benches.] At all events, by the success of that Amendment they would condemn the cause for which our Army was fighting. He was not in love with the new policy; but what chance had they, he asked, if the Amendment were carried, of re-establishing the old position? In his opinion, the time had not come when it might be safe to condemn—as he himself might possibly be disposed to condemn—much of the past in the administration of the affairs of India, as it had now affected our relations to Afghanistan.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am surprised that the hon. Member who has just sat down should have based the opposition he is about to give to the Amendment upon the effect which, if carried, it would have upon our Armies at present serving in Afghanistan. I think it has been made pretty clear, by those of my Friends who have had the opportunity of speaking, that whatever may be our opinion as to the justice of the causes which have led the Government to embark in this war, that there is no difference among us as to the necessity of supporting, by every means in our power, the gallant troops who are now engaged in it; and in no speech that has been delivered in any part of this House have I heard one single remonstrance against the opinion so expressed. And I am the more surprised that the hon. Member, who is generally so staunch a supporter of all Constitutional doctrines, should have put forward such opinions; because it seems to me to amount to nothing less than an assertion that when once the Government has involved the country in a war, the Houses of Parliament are to be debarred from expressing any opinion as to the justice of the war, or the policy of the Government that has led to it. The hon. Member also referred, in terms of some regret, to the personalities which have been introduced into this debate. I hope to be able to avoid the use of any personalities; but I must say that there is one thing which is still more to be regretted than the use of personalities, and that is the conduct which renders personalities natural or necessary. No doubt that is, and always will be, a matter of opinion; but as to the personalities that have been introduced into this debate, I can only say that we are ready to leave to the judgment of the House and of the country whether the personalities that have been introduced, or the conduct that has led to them, is the more deserving of censure. I stated, on the first night of the Session, that there was no difference of opinion among us as to the necessity of supporting Her Majesty's Government in the prosecution of this war until an honourable conclusion has been reached. I also stated that it seemed to me Her Majesty's Government had a perfectly legal right—and I believe, strictly speaking, a Constitutional right—to involve the country in that war. But while I expressed that opinion, I believe I intimated—and if I did not do so then, I must do so now—that it was a very different matter whether it was wise, or prudent, or Constitutional, in the strictest and best sense of the term, on the part of the Government, to involve this country in such a war, without giving Parliament or the country any opportunity of expressing, or even of forming, any opinion on the policy which had led up to it. I can well understand that, in the course of long and protracted negotiations on a subject well-known and understood by the country, a critical moment may arise when it may be the duty of the Government to commit the country to an appeal to arms before it is able to take the sense of Parliament formally upon the question. But I must say that I do not recollect that there ever was any precedent for the country finding itself committed to a war, while ignorant not only of the immediate cause which has provoked a declaration of war, but of the whole course of the circumstances and of the policy which have led to it. It cannot be denied that up to a very few weeks ago Parliament had not received from the Government the slightest information of the change of events in India and Afghanistan, which have been the cause of this war. It will not be asserted by the boldest Member of the Government, or by their boldest supporter, that any information has been vouchsafed to us by them, either in the form of Parliamentary explanations, or in the form of Papers laid before Parliament. Nay, more, I think they will not be unwilling to acknowledge that information which might have been laid before Parliament has been deliberately withheld. I said I would endeavour to avoid all personal recrimination; and I am not, therefore, going to enter into a subject which has been already so freely discussed—the correctness of the answers which have been given in this or the other House of Parliament when information as to our relations with Afghanistan has been asked for. The excuse which has been put forward with regard to the nature of those answers, is that nothing was stated in them which was not the fact; but I do not think that the Government themselves will deny that, in the replies to interpellations which were addressed to them, they did not communicate the whole state of the case either in this or in the other House. We are told that there were reasons which prevented a full and frank statement on the subject. Now, what I want to know is, without entering into the personal question, what those reasons were which induced the Government to abstain from making a free and full communication to Parliament—what reason existed why the Government should not have laid those very Papers which are now before us on the Table of the House? [An hon. MEMBER: They were not wanted.] The hon. and gallant Gentleman says they were not wanted. Does he mean that they were not asked for? [“Hear, hear!”] Exactly. My answer to him is that we were not in a position to know the real state of the case, and did not know what to ask for. But I would again ask, what was the reason which prevented the Government from laying the Papers on the Table? I suppose we shall be told that at that time, in 1877, our relations with Russia were, as the expression goes, somewhat strained, and that it was not desirable in a matter of this kind, which involved, to a certain extent, our relations with Russia, that a full disclosure should be made of the unsatisfactory state of our relations with Afghanistan. If that was the reason, it seems to me to be a totally inadequate one. Does the Government suppose for a moment that the Power with whom at the time our relations were supposed to be strained—that that Power of whose cunning and astuteness in diplomacy we have heard so much—was not accurately informed of all that passed between them and the Ameer, and that when they were concealing information from the House of Commons that they were concealing it from Russia also? I doubt very much whether they could for a moment have laboured under that impression; but even if such information with regard to our relations with Afghanistan would have been communicated to Russia in consequence of its having been laid before this House, I think the advantages gained from laying it before Parliament would have far outweighed any advantage obtained by concealing it. If we had been furnished with this information, there would probably have been debates in this House on the subject; and no doubt the Government would have been blamed then, as they are blamed now, for what we should have considered then, as we consider now, the clumsy and blundering manner in which these negotiations have been conducted. They would, unquestionably, have exposed themselves to an attack of that sort. But I think the result of an open discussion in the House of Commons, at that time as now, would have been to show, on the one hand, to the Government of Afghanistan, that no intention existed on the part of the Parliament or the people of this country—whatever intention might have existed on the part of the Government; and I will not impute anything of the kind to them—to interfere in the slightest degree, or to diminish to the smallest extent, the independence of their country. On the other hand, I think the result of the debate would have been to prove to Russia, that however great may be the desire which is felt on all sides of this House to remain on friendly terms with her, that no interference on her part with the integrity or the independence of Afghanistan would meet with the smallest countenance or approval from any Party, or portion of a Party, in this House. I think that a great advantage would have been conferred by a full discussion of the subject in this House; and it seems to me that, in order to avoid what might have been a Party embarrassment, the Government has withheld from this House and from Parliament information which Parliament had a right to expect that it would receive, and which it would have received with the greatest benefit to India, and even to our relations with Russia and Afghanistan. Passing from that point, I must put aside at this hour of the night a great number and variety of topics which have been the subject of much controversy and debate during the last four nights. I must put them aside—not because they are minor subjects, not because they are trivial, not because they are unimportant—but because the time at my disposal and the patience of the House would not be sufficient to enable me to go into them. I may, however, just refer in one or two words to some of the subjects which I cannot enter into at greater length. Charges have been made against the accuracy of the statements contained in the Papers laid on the Table. These charges have been designated as “trivial;” but, for my part, I cannot think that any question affecting the strict accuracy of the Papers which are laid before this House can ever be unimportant; and I must say that, so far as I have heard, no answer has been made, scarcely any answer has been attempted, to the impeachment brought by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) against the accuracy of much that is contained in these Papers. There is another subject which has been made a subject of considerable controversy, and it is far from unimportant. Much has turned upon whether the Ameer of Cabul has or has not ever at a previous time expressed his willingness to receive a British Resident. That is a subject well worthy all the attention which it has received, but it is one which it is useless to enter into, except at considerable detail; and it is one, therefore, which I must leave to the judgment of the House, after having heard all that has been said on the subject on both sides. There are still more important subjects upon which the controversy has been extremely keen—almost bitter—on both sides of the House: I refer to the conduct of Lord Lytton and the Indian Government in the proceedings preliminary to and during the Peshawur Conference; and, again, as to the conduct of Lord Lytton and his Government in the measures taken in the autumn of this year for securing the reception of Sir Neville Chamberlain's Mission, and especially regarding the imperious haste—as it is described on this side of the House—with which the Mission was pressed on the Ameer, and the manner and the nature of the Ultimatum which was finally addressed to him. These, Sir, cannot for one moment be described as minor points; they are subsidiary, perhaps, to the main issue; but they are by no means of a minor character. Without a thorough examination of the points which I have indicated, it is impossible for the House to decide upon what was the character of the policy of the Government; and it is impossible to decide, without a thorough examination of these points, whether the object of the Government has really been to bring about a better understanding and better relations between themselves and the Ameer; or whether, on the other hand, their object has been to impose conditions upon him which would, practically, have reduced him to the position of a vassal of the Sovereign; and, in the event of his refusing to accept them, to find the ground for a dispute with him to invade his territory and to destroy his power. It is impossible to form an opinion upon these all-important questions, without a thorough examination of the mode and the spirit in which the negotiations were conducted; and I cannot help expressing my gratitude—and, I think, I may say the gratitude of all who sit on this side of the House, at any rate—for the great care and labour and ability with which these questions have been entered into by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), my hon. and learned Friend who addressed the House this evening, and others, who have entered at great length into this part of the subject. I wish also to say to the House, that if I refrain from following their footsteps in a minute canvass of all the steps of the negotiations in the year 1876, and in the present year, it is not because I am not fully sensible of their importance and of their relevance to the subject now before us; but simply and solely because I feel that I could not enter into them without going again into that minute examination of the Papers laid before us, which I know that I, at least, have not the power of making sufficiently interesting to the House to justify me in asking it to listen to me at this time of the evening. Passing by these subjects, then, although by no means neglecting them, I want to ask the House to turn its attention for one moment to what I am afraid may, perhaps, alarm them, though I think they need not feel any undue alarm on the subject. I am going to refer for a moment to the despatch of Lord Cranbrook of the 19th November of this year; and I do not think the Government can complain that I should make it the text of a few observations. The Government have themselves put forward that despatch as a summary of all these proceedings and negotiations, and they cannot, therefore, complain if I refer a little to that despatch. I want to refer to the 9th paragraph, and that maybe an intimation somewhat alarming to the House, after all the controversy that there already has been on the subject. I can assure the House that I do not desire to refer to it in any spirit of personal imputation or recrimination—I do not desire to recur to that paragraph for the purpose of shifting the blame of what has occurred from one Administration to another; but simply because I think by reference to the 9th paragraph I can best place before the House what I want to advert to. If this debate is to be of any service to the country and both sides of the House—who I am sure desire that it shall not be in vain—it will be in that it will enable the country to form a better and a more balanced judgment upon the circumstances which have led to the departure of the Government from the old policy and the adoption of the new. There have been, as we all know by this time, for many years among Indian statesmen two policies. One has been described for some years—although I do not accept the sufficiency or the aptness of the description—as the policy of “masterly inactivity;” and the other, I believe, has been described as the “forward policy.” Almost every statesman who has been responsible for the management of Indian affairs up to a short time ago—every responsible statesman—has been a supporter of what is described as the “masterly inactivity” policy; and certainly no Member of any Government has ever been a warmer or more able advocate of that policy than the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who I presume will follow me. I suppose he will not deny that, warm advocate of that policy as he has been, he is now forced to abandon it; and what I think will be one salutary effect of this debate will be, that the country will more completely understand what is the difference between these two policies, and what are the reasons which have induced the Government to abandon that policy which they formerly supported, and what are the reasons why we think that they have been utterly and completely wrong in doing so. I think the account given in the paragraph of Lord Cranbrook’s despatch is calculated not to inform, but to mislead the country. The impression which is suggested by that paragraph is that in 1873 there existed a difference of opinion between Lord Northbrook and the Government of India and the Government at home, and that he was prevented by the Government at home from doing something which he considered necessary in the interests of India. I know that hon. Gentlemen opposite have come forward to say that they are willing to accept Lord Northbrook’s statement, that there was no such difference of opinion. But that is not a satisfactory way of settling the matter. What we maintain—and what we think is shown from the Papers—is that upon the Papers that have been presented there never was any reason to suppose there was any difference of opinion between Lord Northbrook and the Government at home. I am prepared still further to assert, that not only was there no difference between Lord Northbrook and the Indian Government and the Government at home, but that for two years there was no difference upon the main principles of his policy between Lord Northbrook and the present Government. This point was referred to—and ably referred to—by my hon. and learned Friend earlier in the evening; but it seems to me so important, that I think the House will excuse me if I say another word or two on the subject. The impression sought to be conveyed in this

Mr. Newdegate

The Marquess of Hartington

[Fourth Night.]

despatch is that Lord Northbrook was prepared to make certain assurances to the Ameer of Afghanistan, but was prevented from doing so by Her Majesty's Government. Shortly after that time that Government was succeeded by the present Government, and a little time after that—early in the year 1874—Lord Derby made a speech in the House of Lords upon this subject. I will not read extracts from that speech—I am prepared to read one or two if I am challenged—for I think the Government will admit that it is not an unfair account of Lord Derby's statement to say that when he was challenged in the House of Lords and asked what view the Government took of the assurances which had been given by Lord Northbrook in the Conferences of Simla in 1873, he certainly did not in any way seek to extend or to explain those assurances. If anything he rather indicated, although he did not complain of what Lord Northbrook, under the instructions of the late Government, had done and said, that, in his opinion, he had said quite as much as was prudent, and quite as much as the Government which he represented were willing to say. Perhaps it may be said that Lord Derby was a very cautious Minister, and that subsequent events have shown that his views upon these subjects were not in accordance with those of the rest of the Administration. But Lord Derby was, and remained for a long time after that speech, a Member of Her Majesty's Government. He was the Member of the Government who was put forward to reply to the questions of Lord Napier and Ettrick upon this subject. The then Indian Secretary (the present Foreign Secretary) sat by his side, and his statements were accepted by his Colleagues as the exposition of the views of the Government. I might further prove my point by a more detailed reference to his speech, but it is not necessary for me to do that; because for two years after the accession of the present Government to Office, I am prepared to assert—and these Papers show it—that no instructions were ever addressed to Lord Northbrook directing him to extend, to strengthen, or to explain the assurances which had been given in 1873 by Lord Northbrook to the Ameer of Afghanistan. It is true that despatches were addressed in 1875 to Lord

Northbrook, directing him to try a new policy—a policy that was, to a certain extent, new with the Ameer. But that policy had nothing whatever to do with the assurances which he had given, or was authorized to give, to the Ameer. On the contrary, it was Lord Northbrook himself who pointed out to the Government, if they were determined to insist upon that reception by the Ameer of a British Resident which they thought necessary, that the only way in which there was any chance of such a proposal being accepted was to extend the assurances he had been authorized by the late Government to give. Not even in their reply to Lord Northbrook, in December, 1875, was there the slightest hint or the slightest indication that, in the opinion of the Government, it was desirable to extend these assurances. That, Sir, seems to be a not unimportant fact. In these circumstances, what is the use of the Under Secretary of State coming forward in this House at the present time and telling us that Lord Northbrook's assurances to the Ameer were so vague and misty that it was impossible for him to understand them, and that he was not surprised if they puzzled the Minister of the Ameer? Why is there any controversy between us on this subject when it is proved, beyond the possibility of doubt, that up to the year 1875 there was no difference between either the Indian Government, or the late Government, or the present Government, as to the nature and the extent of the assurances and engagements which it was right and politic for this country to enter into with Afghanistan? Sir, it is true that a difference of opinion, which we shall very soon see was to bear fruit, did arise between the present Government and Lord Northbrook. The Government thought it was desirable—they thought it was necessary—that conditions should be imposed upon the Ameer of Afghanistan which had never been imposed upon him before. They thought it necessary that he should be required to admit British Residents, not to his capital, but to various points in his territory. I am perfectly willing to admit—and it has been admitted by my hon. and learned Friend—that that was a demand which it was perfectly legitimate on our part to make, and which it is possible it might have been in the interests of the Ameer himself to accept. There was only one objection to it, and that was the objection which was pointed out by Lord Northbrook and the Indian Government, that all experience showed, and all Indian authorities believed, that this condition would never be willingly accepted by the Ameer, and that it could not be pressed upon him, except at the cost of forfeiting his friendly alliance. The Under Secretary of State, or an hon. Gentleman opposite, has said that subsequent events have proved that Lord Northbrook was wrong and Lord Salisbury was right; but has experience proved that? Why, the Government have tried the experiment with their own Viceroy and with their own Envoy. They had in their hands the selection of the time, the circumstances, the manner, in which the proposal was to be made; and therefore we may assume that it was made under what I suppose they thought would be the most favourable circumstances; and it has failed—utterly and completely failed. Was Lord Northbrook right, or Lord Salisbury right, in this matter? Sir, I am not going to argue now whether when the Ameer declined to accept the conditions which you sought to impose upon him you had, in strict justice and equity, a right to take advantage of that refusal to repudiate the engagements—the verbal engagements, but still the engagements—which had been entered into by various previous Viceroys as to our relations with him. I am not going to argue the justice of the course which you took. I do not want to argue that at this moment; but were your proceedings politic? I will concede, if you like, for the purposes of that argument, that you had a right when the Ameer rejected your proposal, and the condition which you thought it necessary he should accept, to re-consider your relations with him. Well, you have considered them, and what has been the result? You had, I am thankful to say, not three courses open to you, but you had four; and I will enumerate them in the order in which it seems to me they were most likely to be advantageous to this country. You might have had, first, a friendly Afghanistan—that is, the Afghanistan which you tell us we might have had, and of which we missed the opportunity. Well, that may be; but it does not lie in your mouth to say it; because, as I have just shown, you had two years and more in which you might have recovered that opportunity which you say we lost, and in which you might have gained the friendly Afghanistan which you say we neglected to obtain. The second policy open to you was that you might have had what I will describe as a sulky Afghanistan—that is, the Afghanistan which you say we left you. I do not think you can describe the condition of things in Afghanistan as we left them in any more unfavourable terms than that, and you might have many a worse bargain than that. There was not much that you wanted from Afghanistan. It is perfectly true the relations of its Ruler were not friendly. He was unwilling to do a favour to you, and he was unwilling to accept one from you. But there was very little we wanted him to do. All we wanted of Afghanistan was that it should preserve its independence. We wanted it to be as jealous of interference from any other quarter as it proved itself to be of interference from us. And that was the condition in which we left Afghanistan. It was not, perhaps, the most satisfactory condition; but I maintain it was not an unsatisfactory condition. What was the third alternative? You might have an unfriendly, an alienated, a hostile Afghanistan, and that is the Afghanistan which you have secured by your Peshawur Conference. That is the Afghanistan which you have secured by your letters, your interviews, your threats, your allusions to iron pots and earthen pipkins; by your hints about an understanding with Russia; about the iron band which was surrounding the territories of the Ameer; about the rectification of Frontier which was to be made without reference to, or consideration for, the feelings of the Ruler of Afghanistan. That is the alienated and the unfriendly Afghanistan which you have secured. Then there is one policy worse even than this, and it is that which you appear to me to have begun, and which I am afraid you are determined to carry through. That is the policy of the military occupation either of the whole or a part of Afghanistan. That is the fourth and, as I believe, the worst policy of all. On this part of the subject I really hardly know where to begin or what arguments to use. Up to this time there had been so complete an agreement among all authorities, military and civil, as to the impolicy of a military advance upon, and the occupation of, Afghanistan, that the difficulty is not to find arguments against it, but to select from the arguments against it. This is, to a certain extent, a military question, upon which I am not competent to speak; but I have not observed that we have been favoured with many military arguments in the course of this debate and upon the side of the Government. I am not aware that we have been favoured with any military arguments at all. The hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) to-night addressed to the House what appeared to me to be a very sound and a very powerful military argument; but I have not heard from the other side of the House any military opinion upon this subject at all. Indeed, Sir, we have not been favoured with a great deal of information during this debate from the front Bench opposite. The noble Lord the Postmaster General, who certainly has never been considered to be a very high authority on the subject of India, is the only Cabinet Minister who has addressed the House during these four nights. Although the military administration of India is not immediately in his Department, I should have thought we might have been favoured by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War with the opinion of his advisers on the expediency and the advisability of a military occupation of Afghanistan. I am averse from troubling the House by reading extracts at this time of night; but I have said I am not a military authority, and I do not think I can do better—I feel certain I cannot express my views more shortly—than by reading one or two extracts from the opinions of military men of high distinction, who I do not think have been referred to in the course of this debate; and I simply read them because I can bring the views I entertain more shortly and much better before the House in that than in any other way. The first is the opinion of Sir Henry Greene, who is certainly not an advocate of the masterly inactivity policy, and who, I believe, is one of the advocates of a forward policy. Writing in 1873, and alluding to the Afghan tribes, he says—

[Fourth Night.]

The Marquess of Hartington

“The country bordering on the valley of Peshawur and skirting the Pass leading from Jellalabad to Ismael Khan is held by various tribes of mountaineers, numbering perhaps 200,000 men, who in many a border fight against other tribes have shown their high courage. To occupy the valley of Jellalabad we should have to pass through and leave in our rear the most dangerous and numerous of these tribes, and we should also leave in our rear some of the most difficult defiles of the Jellalabad Pass. Having arrived, we should be surrounded by similar mountains, inhabited by the same warlike tribes, and the communications with Peshawur would be always most precarious. They are the most intractable people on the whole border country, and the necessity of sending frequent expeditions among them has proved this. It appears to me, therefore, that to place a force in their midst would be to place it in a position of great jeopardy. Consequently, I think our safest plan is to hold the Valley of Peshawur and to complete, as far as possible, the railway to Lahore, in order to re-inforce the garrison at Lahore as quickly as possible when necessary.”

That is the opinion of Sir Henry Greene as to the occupation of Afghanistan. I have another extract which I should like to read, from an authority who, I dare say, will not command much respect from that side of the House. I do not quote it as an authority, but because the view is well put, and because it is the most convenient form of expressing my own opinion. It is a Memorandum by Sir William Mansfield, the late Lord Sandhurst. He says—

“I can conceive of no greater political mistake than a course which would unite the whole population of Afghanistan in actual hostilities against us, and so compel us to meet their hostility on ground most unfavourable to us and entailing great waste of our forces. I believe nothing could be more true than that, supposing that at some future time Russia and England were engaged in a struggle for Asiatic dominion, that party will enter on the contest with great advantages which has abstained from forestalling events by an invasion and annexation of Afghanistan. If it is assumed that Russia wishes to invade India through Afghanistan, it would become necessary to hold the country very strongly, otherwise the population would rise to drive out the invading army, and its forces might be divided in a most dangerous manner on ground most unfavourable to itself. In this manner Afghanistan would be a cause of weakness to Russia, and so would become our worst ally. If we invaded Afghanistan the problem would be exactly reversed, and Afghanistan would become our worst enemy. We should have to hold it with a force of some 40,000 or 50,000 men, and at the same time to meet Russia with a great strain upon our resources, and under conditions most unfavourable to ourselves.”

That is the most important part of the despatch, and nothing can be more true than the case which is there put hypothetically. This question is not discussed very much in the Papers laid before us. There was one passage, however, in a despatch from Lord Lawrence, which expresses the same ideas in very much the same language. So much for the military opinion upon the military occupation of Afghanistan. I know it is said that military opinions expressed two years ago are now very much over-weighted by the necessity of doing something on account of the advance of Russia in Central Asia. Well, Sir, I want to know exactly what this advance in Central Asia is which has so alarmed the Government and impressed upon it the necessity of doing something. I referred the other day to a despatch contained in these Papers—a despatch written in answer to one by Sir John Lawrence, pointing out not only what had been done, but what was likely to be done by Russia—which the right hon. Gentleman opposite (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) very properly reminded me was 10 years old. In that despatch the Government said that they felt not the slightest jealousy or alarm in reference to Russia in Central Asia. It was pointed out with extraordinary accuracy, as far as I am able to judge, not only what those designs have been in the past, but what they were likely to be in future years; and the right hon. Gentleman put the assurance aside with the utmost calmness, and stated that we had not the slightest cause for alarm. That is not the last pronouncement of the Government upon the subject of the advance of Russia in Central Asia. I cannot now go into details; but the House remembers very well the speech of the Prime Minister in this House, in 1876, in which he expressed—I thought in a very reasonable and sensible way—his views with respect to that advance in Central Asia. Now we have these Papers, expressing, in the most frank and friendly manner, their perfect comprehension of the course of events, and the entire absence of alarm and jealousy, both Governments being on most amicable terms. We know very well, while the Government were making speeches in this House, and were writing frank and friendly assurances to Russia, that they did feel alarm; that in 1876, when Lord Lytton went out, or when the despatches to Lord Northbrook were written, the Government had begun to consider that the state of things affecting the Russian advance was extremely grave, and demanded measures which they were pleased to call “of timely precaution.” They may be right; but what I want to know is, what the particular advance of Russia was that they considered altered the situation, and made these measures of timely precaution, involving the invasion, and perhaps the annexation, of Afghanistan a necessity to us? I stated very generally the other night my ideas upon the Russian advance. That advance may be a very serious one; but I do not care to be put aside generally by such a reply as—“Oh! the advance of Russia has been terrible, and something must be done.” It is more business-like, and more prudent, to look the matter boldly in the face, and to say where we are threatened, and to point out the exact danger to which we are exposed. Is the actual invasion of our Indian Empire the danger which we may expect? I cannot imagine it is that. The Prime Minister himself has put aside that view; for Lord Beaconsfield at the Guildhall the other night said that Her Majesty’s Government entertained no apprehensions of the invasion of India by our North-West Frontier. The noble Lord said the “aspect of the country is so forbidding, that I do not believe any invasion of our North-West Frontier could be possible.” It is true that Lord Beaconsfield is a great authority; but there is a greater. The noble Lord the Vice President of the Council does not agree with him, and contradicts him in the flattest possible manner. He says it is a great mistake to suppose there is no danger of invasion. He says that the configuration of India and Italy very much resemble each other; that no country has been so often, or so successfully, invaded as Italy; that India has also frequently been invaded.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am very sorry to interrupt the noble Lord. What I said was that the only reason why the Afghans did not invade India was because we were a greater military Power; and I also pointed how, under certain conditions, we might cease to have this immunity from invasion.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I understood the noble Lord in his allusion to say that Italy and India, in their configuration, very much resembled each other; that Italy had often been successfully invaded; and that India had also been previously invaded; and if the argument was not pointed to the danger in which India stood of a formidable invasion, I really should like to know what point his observation has. It is true that India has often been invaded, and through these Passes; but I want to know whether India has ever been held before by a Power such as ours; and whether the danger of an invasion of India is not every day becoming a danger less likely to occur? In the opinion of most men, I believe, the invasion of Afghanistan in 1838, under the influence of a scare somewhat similar to the present, was a great mistake; but, at all events, Lord Auckland's Government at that time had some excuse which the Government of this day cannot plead. Our power in India was not the same as it is now. Our power in India has been greatly consolidated since 1838. Our policy in India has been greatly consolidated by the wise administration of a succession of Viceroys, not the least of whom is that Viceroy whose name has been so often mentioned in these debates, and whose name has been mentioned with scarcely sufficient respect from the opposite benches. I am not certain; but I am rather under the apprehension that the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. E. Stanhope)—I hope I am not misrepresenting him—made some somewhat disparaging remarks upon Lord Lawrence's conduct at the time of the Mutiny. [Mr. E. STANHOPE: It was not I.] I beg your pardon; but disparaging remarks have been heard from that side of the House, and there can be no doubt that a violent attack has been made upon Lord Lawrence by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), and we have not had the conduct of Lord Lawrence vindicated, as I should, under those circumstances, have expected. But I am sure that when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer rises he will not fail to notice these matters, for he is in so responsible a position for everything that Lord Lawrence has done with reference to the North-West Frontier. There is one other paragraph in the despatch to which I must direct notice. Writing in 1867 the right hon. Gentleman says, addressing Lord Lawrence — “Your Excellency is so intimately acquainted with the general views of the Government, and with the whole condition of Afghanistan, that the Government feel we may safely leave it to your discretion to act as you think best, in case any emergency should arise.” Now, Sir, I think, if the Members of the Government who have spoken before had their position in this matter in view, they would have taken an opportunity of vindicating the character and policy of Lord Lawrence from the attack which has been made upon him from that side of the House. Since 1838 the power of England has been greatly strengthened and consolidated in India; and in no respect has a greater or more remarkable change been made than in the improvement of our systems of communication. In 1838 it would have taken weeks, perhaps months, to mass any considerable portion of our military strength on our North-West Frontier. Now, in consequence of the system of railways and other improved means of communication, we could mass our whole available military strength in a comparatively short time to meet an army far from its resources and with difficult communications. It does seem to me the wildest idea that ever disturbed any Government in this country to think that there is the slightest danger to our rule in India from an army, manœuvring far from its base, with difficult communications, issuing through the narrow defiles and Passes of Afghanistan to meet the disciplined forces—Native and European—of England ready to crush them. I know that actual invasion is not the only danger in that region—there is the danger of intrigue. That, I fully admit, is a more real danger than the one to which I have referred. But it is one which cannot be removed or done away with—on the contrary, it might be increased by any action in the direction of an advance to Afghanistan. What is the argument? It is, as I understand it, that if the Russians are permitted to acquire an influence in Afghanistan, they will make use of it by intriguing across the border of the Native States, in order to make them unfriendly. Is that prevented by our advancing and occupying either the whole or any part of Afghanistan? Suppose that we do occupy the whole;

[Fourth Night.]

The Marquess of Hartington

we do not get rid of Russian intrigue—on the contrary, Russia can intrigue from Bokhara. Russia has, then, the same opportunity to cross the border into Afghanistan, and into a far better field to work in. Supposing it is only the rectification of the Frontier, the annexation of a part of Afghanistan would give Russia a far better opportunity for intrigue in the remainder, and provide her, at the same time, with the very means. Either you displace the present Ameer from his Throne, or you have him hostile to you, enraged by the loss of a part of his territory, and what more convenient plea can Russia have? Supposing you drive the Ameer out of his Kingdom across the border, has not Russia an equally good instrument for intrigue; and how does the Government explain, how will it prevent the possibility of Russian intrigue advancing? I believe, on the contrary, such a course will hasten and facilitate any operations that Russia may desire in that direction. I am happy to admit—and have admitted—the possibility of danger; it must be dealt with; it must be met as one of the facts which cannot be ignored. No one can suggest that Russia can be put back. It is a difficulty which the Government must face, and face as best they can. It is for them to prove that the only way it can be dealt with is by an advance to meet Russia. If it is to be dealt with, I believe, in the opinion of the most eminent statesmen, that Russian intrigue will be best met by a wise and prudent administration of our own dominions. But supposing that it has to be met and dealt with by some direct means, then sooner or later we must deal with Russia herself. I am not advocating any rash or hasty proceedings with regard to Russian intrigue. I do not know what explanation Russia may give of her advance; but I am quite sure that you will not stop Russian intrigue by merely punishing a subject upon whom Russia is practising. You will not stop Russia by punishing or even by dethroning the Ameer—you will only give her new and increased opportunities of playing her game more effectually than she would be able to do in any other way. For these reasons, it appears to me that the policy you have adopted—a hostile policy—is about the most unwise which you could have chosen. We have been asked very often in the course of this debate—"What would you do under the circumstances?" I think the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich is a sufficient answer. It is a question which I do not think any Government has a right to put to any Opposition. How are we to say, when we think that your conduct has been a succession of mistakes, what is the precise position which we should have taken under the circumstances? But I will say—although I do not admit that the question is one to which we are bound to give an answer—that there are one or two things which I think it is possible we should do. I will say that, whatever the result of this war, the more speedy its conclusion and the greater its success the better—I will say that, whatever the result of this war, no permanent occupation of any part of Afghanistan, contrary to the wish of any of its inhabitants, ought to be sanctioned. I believe that any strategical advantage which might be gained—I doubt whether the balance of military opinion is that any advantages would be gained—would be dearly purchased with the lasting ill-will of the whole of the people of Afghanistan. It will be difficult, certainly, but it may not be an impossible task to convince the people and the Ruler of Afghanistan that we do not desire to interfere with their interests; and I believe that no proof, no better proof, could be given to them than that after a successful war we should retire within our own boundary without annexing one inch of their territory. I do not think we could find any more effectual or better barrier against any possible dangers we may apprehend from the advance of Russia than the conviction that such a proceeding on our part would give to the minds of the people of Afghanistan of our real desire for their independence. What have the people of that country done to lead us to suppose that they have already sacrificed their independence to Russia? It is we—and we alone—who have thrown them into the arms of Russia; and the only policy in my mind by which the errors of the last two years can be repaired is to replace once more in the minds of the Afghan people the conviction that their independence is as great an object to us as it is to themselves. There is one more indication of policy I may suggest. Whatever else may be done, I think the present Viceroy should be recalled. I admire the genius of Lord Lytton, and I believe that in Europe his diplomatic talents would be useful; but I cannot help saying that as a military diplomatist in India he is a mistake. Sir, I think that Lord Lytton should be recalled; because he appears to me to be the incarnation and embodiment of an Indian policy which is everything which an Indian policy ought not to be. Except when some danger or some trouble, such as the present, threatens us, we do not see or hear very much of what goes on in India. But when during the last two years we have had a glimpse of what is passing in India, what have we seen of Lord Lytton? We have seen him at one time mimicking at Delhi the forms and state of the Mogul Emperors, and obscuring in the minds of the Princes and of the people of India the real nature and the real sources of the greatness of our rule, by endeavouring to impose upon them an imitation of the pomp and state of former days. We have seen him at another time fidgeting about the harmless eccentricities of the Indian Press. Now, in these Papers we see him—I do not think the sight is calculated to impress respect for our rule in the mind of any Indian Prince—at this Conference at Peshawur, addressing the puzzled and frightened Envoys in a letter, which seems to me to be composed of language borrowed partly from a lawyer's letter, and partly from a tale of The Arabian Nights. Sir, I am afraid that if we are to part with Lord Lytton, we shall have to part with something besides. I do not expect that Her Majesty's Government will recall him. I do not think it would be just or generous to do so. Lord Lytton has faults; but all Lord Lytton's faults are not the faults of Lord Lytton alone. I own he has faults—great faults—but his fault has been that he is only too faithful an embodiment of the policy of the Government he represents. This policy is either a part of, or the result of—or perhaps both—of the policy we have had for the last two years. Her Majesty's Government have boasted of a spirited foreign policy, and all the time they appear to me to have acted like men possessed with the most abject and most unworthy terror. Not a movement could take place in any part of Europe or Asia, but that it was discovered by the Government that some harm was threatened, that some danger impended to English interests or English honour. An insurrection takes place in Bosnia—the Government immediately rush off to buy shares in the Suez Canal. The Bulgarians revolt against their oppressors, and there is immediately a cry of "British interests in danger." Well, Sir, it is not difficult to find a reason—Her Majesty's Government seem to me to have no confidence in the strength of England, or in the resources or energy of Englishmen. Like most men who are deficient in true courage, they make great parade of their courage and of their power. They bring over 8,000 Indian troops to Malta, and they leave it to be understood that behind them are the whole troops and resources of the Indian Empire. All this time that they are parading this demonstration of Indian troops, Russia is preparing, without ostentation and without anybody knowing anything about it, a trap which they felt quite certain Her Majesty's Government would fall into—which Her Majesty's Government have fallen into, and which has given occupation to the 8,000 Indian troops in Afghanistan. It will be fortunate, indeed, if it does not give occupation to troops from England also. I hope—I cannot express any confident opinion—that this is a policy of which the country has had nearly enough. I agree with the opinion which has been expressed by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt). I do not care how soon the country has an opportunity of expressing its opinion on this policy. We have been told—and I have no doubt we shall be told still more freely and more openly in the country than we have been told in this House—that we are indifferent to the honour and the greatness of our Indian Empire. The imputation has not been made, that I know of, by any hon. Gentleman in this debate. It is one which is so false that I can scarcely condescend to deny it. But there are some of us who have read something of the way in which that Indian Empire was raised and was extended. There are some of us who have watched that Empire contending with difficulties and dangers which, compared with any that now threaten us, are as the mountains and gorges of the Himalayas compared with the hills and valleys of an English county. We have read also the history of the events which led to and which caused the only check that in recent times our arms have ever received in India, and the only blow which our power, and, if you like, our prestige, in India has ever received; we have watched Lord Canning, and the band of heroes by whom he was surrounded in the midst of the tremendous dangers of the Indian Mutiny, meeting them with the calm courage of Englishmen. It is, Sir, because we believe that the present policy of Her Majesty's Government is founded rather upon an imitation of the errors which have marred than of the wisdom which has saved our Indian Empire, that we ask the House to-night to express its condemnation of the policy which has resulted in its present position.

[Fourth Night.]

The Marquess of Hartington

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I am somewhat puzzled at the motives which can have actuated the noble Lord in the last few sentences he has addressed to the House. We have heard from him a temperate and, I will not deny, a well-argued speech upon matters of great importance which have been brought before us in this debate. But towards the end of that speech the noble Lord, without any accusation having been levelled against him—as he himself confesses—indulged in an outburst of patriotism, and of admiration for the greatness of this Empire, and especially of our Indian Empire, which, I confess, had it not been for one or two casual expressions, I should have felt great difficulty in understanding. But a word or two which fell from the noble Lord furnished us with the key of the matter. He gave us very clearly to understand that this was not a speech addressed to the House of Commons, but was intended for the hustings. Well, Sir, when the proper time may come for meeting our constituents, we shall not be afraid to measure swords with the noble Lord. Meantime, let us understand what it is that we in the House of Commons have to-night to decide upon; and let us consider frankly what the issue is which the noble Lord has raised. I thank him for the distinct way in which he has raised that issue towards the conclusion of his speech. Throughout these long debates we have been sometimes rather at a loss to know what the precise issue was that we were met here to try. Sometimes one point, sometimes another, was presented to us; but to-night, at the close of the debate, the noble Lord, in his character of Party Leader, has very frankly and fairly said that the real and true object of the whole matter is to turn out the present Government. ["No, no!"] I hear cries of dissent. I do not know whether they proceed from the opposite side of the House; but the statement of the noble Lord could hardly be plainer. I may say for myself and for my Colleagues that we in no degree complain of an attack so directly and fairly made. There was only one point in that attack which I did hear with regret and with some degree of pain, as coming from the noble Lord. It was when he commenced his attack upon the Government by suggesting that the first thing to be done was to recall the Indian Viceroy. In that he was anticipating, of course, what came afterwards; because anything more impossible—anything more disgraceful—than that the Government at a crisis of this importance, and in the pursuit of a policy for which they themselves are responsible, should recall him who is charged with the conduct of that policy in a distant part of the Empire, it would be impossible to imagine. The noble Lord did not intend that; because he said immediately after that the recall of the Viceroy must inevitably mean also the downfall of the Ministry. Of course, it must; and, therefore, I would ask him why, with his patriotic feelings so loudly expressed—and I have no doubt so honestly entertained—did he use language which is calculated, as long as we have our Viceroy in India, to shake his position there? Turn out the Ministry if you can; replace them if you will; and when you have taken their places, recall the Viceroy, and substitute another in whom you have greater confidence. But, for heaven's sake, while he still remains in that anxious and important charge, do not endeavour to debase him in the eyes of those over whom he rules by heaping on him epithets and appellations which are not directly connected with his policy, but which are calculated to lower him in the eyes of those amongst whom he is now placed.

[Fourth Night.]

A greater injustice was never done to any man. His policy, and the policy of the Government, is, of course, a fair subject for criticism. But I am bound to say his merits are systematically ignored and overlooked, and that he is "checked like a bond slave, all his faults observed and conned by rote." Everything which can be urged against not only his policy, but the minor incidents of his life, is brought against him; and we are taught—and our fellow-subjects and the Native Princes of India are to be taught—that this man, the Representative of the Government and the power of England in that Empire, is such as the noble Lord has represented. I will appeal to the condition of India as against the patriotic outburst of the noble Lord. Never was there a time when the people of India were more loyal; never was there a time when the Native Princes were better affected to our Government than at the present moment, and in all those matters on which you challenge our policy. You say we were wrong in bringing the Native troops to Malta. [Opposition cheers.] Yes, of course you do; and that we were wrong in organizing this expedition into Afghanistan. But this, at all events, you will not deny—that in this expedition, and in all these movements, we have had not only the Native soldiers, but the Native Rulers cordially and heartily with us, and in favour of your present Governor General. Is not all this something of an evidence of the regard and the respect with which the policy and the conduct of England are regarded in that portion of our dominions? Do you suppose that we should have been able to obtain, and to retain, that respect and that cordial support on the part of our Native soldiers and Native Princes and Indian subjects if we were for a moment liable to all the charges which have been brought against us? Now, Sir, I am most reluctant at this late hour of the night to detain the House at any great length; but it is necessary for me to throw myself upon the indulgence of the House. The noble Lord has truly said that but few of the Members of the Cabinet have addressed the House. Indeed, my noble Friend the Postmaster General is the only Member of it besides myself who has done so. But we have been supported by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bourke), by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. E. Stanhope), and by my noble Friend the Vice President of the Council (Lord George Hamilton)—all three of whom are thoroughly acquainted with these subjects, and all three of whom, I venture to say, have done their part in this debate in a manner that leaves nothing to be desired. If others of my Colleagues have not spoken, it has been from no indisposition on their part to take their share in the labour of the debate, but from a feeling that there were many Members who wished to speak, and from a natural desire not to interfere with the opportunities of these hon. Members. As I said a little while ago, we have been a little confused by the issues that from day to day have been raised in this debate; and I venture to think that it will be of the greatest importance that we should endeavour to clear our minds as to the real issues presented to us by this Motion. Before I proceed to this, I am bound to take notice of—I will not call them side or bye—issues which have been raised, and which it is impossible to leave unanswered. I do not intend to go into these questions of detail as to the accuracy of certain parts of the Papers—properly raised and very ingeniously argued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone)—because I think he was very fairly and very fully answered by my noble Friend the Vice President of the Council (Lord George Hamilton). [Ironical laughter from the Opposition.] Be that as it may, these are questions which the House has before it; they have been argued on both sides; and it only remains to give the verdict on the pleadings on the one side or the other. There are, however, one or two questions upon which it is my duty to say a very few words. We have been charged with a great many offences; with offences against Parliament, against the law, and against the Constitution. Though I hope, considering the very large field that I have to travel over, and the important questions that I have to raise, that I may be excused from going too minutely into these questions, yet it is impossible that I should not take some notice of them. With regard to our violation of the law, my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich says that is a sin which we are so very much accustomed to commit that we have almost rendered the House callous to it, and that he hardly thinks it worth while to take notice of such a trumpery thing. With regard to that, therefore, I will not go into details. I do not for a moment admit that we have in any degree violated the law. I believe that we have entirely kept within it, and that we are perfectly in consistence with the law in its letter and in its spirit. But I will not argue that question, for it has not been much discussed. Well, then, it has been said that we have been guilty of reticence, and even of worse than reticence, in misleading the House; and very severe remarks have been made both upon my noble Friend, Lord Salisbury, my noble Friend, Lord Cranbrook, and myself, with regard to some of our sins of omission and commission. I do not intend to go at length into these matters. My noble Friend, Lord Salisbury, has been spoken of in this House in a manner which I think was unworthy of the Member who used the expression. The language of the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) was such as under no circumstances should have been used in this House; but I do not think that is worthy of any serious remembrance. My noble Friend has explained in the House, where the statement was made, the grounds of his statement—and I think we may leave the matter very well where he has placed it—that he was called upon to answer particular questions, and that he answered them with reserve. [Opposition cheers.] Yes; with a reserve which he stated at the time that he was exercising. He stated that he was obliged to speak with reserve, and could only give negative answers. I think that anybody who would take the trouble—which I suspect very few have done—really to read the whole of the conversation which then took place, will form a very different opinion of my noble Friend's language from that which has been so current in this House. With regard to Lord Cranbrook's despatch, that, perhaps, occupies different ground, and upon that my noble Friend has spoken at length and with great energy in the other House. I have endeavoured, on previous occasions, to explain generally what our views are; and I utterly deny that there was anything unfair or unreasonable in the statements contained in the celebrated 9th paragraph of that despatch. We accept entirely the disclaimer by Lord Northbrook of the construction which we have put upon his part of the transaction; but I say now—as I have said before—that to persons reading those telegrams, and comparing one with another, the impression which was made on our minds was, I think, a very natural impression. At all events, it was a case in which, whether the Viceroy was overruled by, or whether the Viceroy coincided with, the Home Government, does not really very much matter to the main argument of the despatch, which was that the policy adopted in 1873, either dictated by the Government at home, or by Lord Northbrook himself, was a policy which produced a certain effect. With regard to myself, I really do not know whether I am accused seriously of having attempted to mislead the House in the speech to which reference was made. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) told me that I was to be compared to a dentist trying to soothe a timid child by holding out quieting and soothing promises and statements. I have read and re-read the discussion to which reference is made, and I can see nothing in what I said that was, in the slightest degree, chargeable either with misleading the House, or with failing to give proper information. The question then raised was the question of Quetta. Now, I frankly admit—it is no admission, because I readily say—that at the time I was at the India Office the question of the occupation of Quetta was the particular form which was then given to what is called the “forward policy;” and I have always been—and I have been reminded that I was and always have been—an opponent of what is called and known as the “forward policy.” Quetta being then the word which was, as it were, the flag of that policy, when I heard there was something going on about the occupation of Quetta, I frankly admit that I became somewhat alarmed. I came down to the House and saw my noble

A greater injustice was never done to any man. His policy, and the policy of the Government, is, of course, a fair subject for criticism. But I am bound to say his merits are systematically ignored and overlooked, and that he is "checked like a bond slave, all his faults observed and conned by rote." Everything which can be urged against not only his policy, but the minor incidents of his life, is brought against him; and we are taught—and our fellow-subjects and the Native Princes of India are to be taught—that this man, the Representative of the Government and the power of England in that Empire, is such as the noble Lord has represented. I will appeal to the condition of India as against the patriotic outburst of the noble Lord. Never was there a time when the people of India were more loyal; never was there a time when the Native Princes were better affected to our Government than at the present moment, and in all those matters on which you challenge our policy. You say we were wrong in bringing the Native troops to Malta. [Opposition cheers.] Yes, of course you do; and that we were wrong in organizing this expedition into Afghanistan. But this, at all events, you will not deny—that in this expedition, and in all these movements, we have had not only the Native soldiers, but the Native Rulers cordially and heartily with us, and in favour of your present Governor General. Is not all this something of an evidence of the regard and the respect with which the policy and the conduct of England are regarded in that portion of our dominions? Do you suppose that we should have been able to obtain, and to retain, that respect and that cordial support on the part of our Native soldiers and Native Princes and Indian subjects if we were for a moment liable to all the charges which have been brought against us? Now, Sir, I am most reluctant at this late hour of the night to detain the House at any great length; but it is necessary for me to throw myself upon the indulgence of the House. The noble Lord has truly said that but few of the Members of the Cabinet have addressed the House. Indeed, my noble Friend the Postmaster General is the only Member of it besides myself who has done so. But we have been supported by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bourke), by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. E. Stanhope), and by my noble Friend the Vice President of the Council (Lord George Hamilton)—all three of whom are thoroughly acquainted with these subjects, and all three of whom, I venture to say, have done their part in this debate in a manner that leaves nothing to be desired. If others of my Colleagues have not spoken, it has been from no indisposition on their part to take their share in the labour of the debate, but from a feeling that there were many Members who wished to speak, and from a natural desire not to interfere with the opportunities of these hon. Members. As I said a little while ago, we have been a little confused by the issues that from day to day have been raised in this debate; and I venture to think that it will be of the greatest importance that we should endeavour to clear our minds as to the real issues presented to us by this Motion. Before I proceed to this, I am bound to take notice of—I will not call them side or bye—issues which have been raised, and which it is impossible to leave unanswered. I do not intend to go into these questions of detail as to the accuracy of certain parts of the Papers—properly raised and very ingeniously argued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone)—because I think he was very fairly and very fully answered by my noble Friend the Vice President of the Council (Lord George Hamilton). [Ironical laughter from the Opposition.] Be that as it may, these are questions which the House has before it; they have been argued on both sides; and it only remains to give the verdict on the pleadings on the one side or the other. There are, however, one or two questions upon which it is my duty to say a very few words. We have been charged with a great many offences; with offences against Parliament, against the law, and against the Constitution. Though I hope, considering the very large field that I have to travel over, and the important questions that I have to raise, that I may be excused from going too minutely into these questions, yet it is impossible that I should not

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

take some notice of them. With regard to our violation of the law, my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich says that is a sin which we are so very much accustomed to commit that we have almost rendered the House callous to it, and that he hardly thinks it worth while to take notice of such a trumpery thing. With regard to that, therefore, I will not go into details. I do not for a moment admit that we have in any degree violated the law. I believe that we have entirely kept within it, and that we are perfectly in consistence with the law in its letter and in its spirit. But I will not argue that question, for it has not been much discussed. Well, then, it has been said that we have been guilty of reticence, and even of worse than reticence, in misleading the House; and very severe remarks have been made both upon my noble Friend, Lord Salisbury, my noble Friend, Lord Cranbrook, and myself, with regard to some of our sins of omission and commission. I do not intend to go at length into these matters. My noble Friend, Lord Salisbury, has been spoken of in this House in a manner which I think was unworthy of the Member who used the expression. The language of the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) was such as under no circumstances should have been used in this House; but I do not think that is worthy of any serious remembrance. My noble Friend has explained in the House, where the statement was made, the grounds of his statement—and I think we may leave the matter very well where he has placed it—that he was called upon to answer particular questions, and that he answered them with reserve. [Opposition cheers.] Yes; with a reserve which he stated at the time that he was exercising. He stated that he was obliged to speak with reserve, and could only give negative answers. I think that anybody who would take the trouble—which I suspect very few have done—really to read the whole of the conversation which then took place, will form a very different opinion of my noble Friend's language from that which has been so current in this House. With regard to Lord Cranbrook's despatch, that, perhaps, occupies different ground, and upon that my noble Friend has spoken at length and with great energy in the other House. I have endeavoured, on previous occasions, to explain generally what our views are; and I utterly deny that there was anything unfair or unreasonable in the statements contained in the celebrated 9th paragraph of that despatch. We accept entirely the disclaimer by Lord Northbrook of the construction which we have put upon his part of the transaction; but I say now—as I have said before—that to persons reading those telegrams, and comparing one with another, the impression which was made on our minds was, I think, a very natural impression. At all events, it was a case in which, whether the Viceroy was overruled by, or whether the Viceroy coincided with, the Home Government, does not really very much matter to the main argument of the despatch, which was that the policy adopted in 1873, either dictated by the Government at home, or by Lord Northbrook himself, was a policy which produced a certain effect. With regard to myself, I really do not know whether I am accused seriously of having attempted to mislead the House in the speech to which reference was made. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) told me that I was to be compared to a dentist trying to soothe a timid child by holding out quieting and soothing promises and statements. I have read and re-read the discussion to which reference is made, and I can see nothing in what I said that was, in the slightest degree, chargeable either with misleading the House, or with failing to give proper information. The question then raised was the question of Quetta. Now, I frankly admit—it is no admission, because I readily say—that at the time I was at the India Office the question of the occupation of Quetta was the particular form which was then given to what is called the “forward policy;” and I have always been—and I have been reminded that I was and always have been—an opponent of what is called and known as the “forward policy.” Quetta being then the word which was, as it were, the flag of that policy, when I heard there was something going on about the occupation of Quetta, I frankly admit that I became somewhat alarmed. I came down to the House and saw my noble

A greater injustice was never done to any man. His policy, and the policy of the Government, is, of course, a fair subject for criticism. But I am bound to say his merits are systematically ignored and overlooked, and that he is "checked like a bond slave, all his faults observed and conned by rote." Everything which can be urged against not only his policy, but the minor incidents of his life, is brought against him; and we are taught—and our fellow-subjects and the Native Princes of India are to be taught—that this man, the Representative of the Government and the power of England in that Empire, is such as the noble Lord has represented. I will appeal to the condition of India as against the patriotic outburst of the noble Lord. Never was there a time when the people of India were more loyal; never was there a time when the Native Princes were better affected to our Government than at the present moment, and in all those matters on which you challenge our policy. You say we were wrong in bringing the Native troops to Malta. [Opposition cheers.] Yes, of course you do; and that we were wrong in organizing this expedition into Afghanistan. But this, at all events, you will not deny—that in this expedition, and in all these movements, we have had not only the Native soldiers, but the Native Rulers cordially and heartily with us, and in favour of your present Governor General. Is not all this something of an evidence of the regard and the respect with which the policy and the conduct of England are regarded in that portion of our dominions? Do you suppose that we should have been able to obtain, and to retain, that respect and that cordial support on the part of our Native soldiers and Native Princes and Indian subjects if we were for a moment liable to all the charges which have been brought against us? Now, Sir, I am most reluctant at this late hour of the night to detain the House at any great length; but it is necessary for me to throw myself upon the indulgence of the House. The noble Lord has truly said that but few of the Members of the Cabinet have addressed the House. Indeed, my noble Friend the Postmaster General is the only Member of it besides myself who has done so. But we have been supported by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Bourke), by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Mr. E. Stanhope), and by my noble Friend the Vice President of the Council (Lord George Hamilton)—all three of whom are thoroughly acquainted with these subjects, and all three of whom, I venture to say, have done their part in this debate in a manner that leaves nothing to be desired. If others of my Colleagues have not spoken, it has been from no indisposition on their part to take their share in the labour of the debate, but from a feeling that there were many Members who wished to speak, and from a natural desire not to interfere with the opportunities of these hon. Members. As I said a little while ago, we have been a little confused by the issues that from day to day have been raised in this debate; and I venture to think that it will be of the greatest importance that we should endeavour to clear our minds as to the real issues presented to us by this Motion. Before I proceed to this, I am bound to take notice of—I will not call them side or bye—issues which have been raised, and which it is impossible to leave unanswered. I do not intend to go into these questions of detail as to the accuracy of certain parts of the Papers—properly raised and very ingeniously argued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone)—because I think he was very fairly and very fully answered by my noble Friend the Vice President of the Council (Lord George Hamilton). [Ironical laughter from the Opposition.] Be that as it may, these are questions which the House has before it; they have been argued on both sides; and it only remains to give the verdict on the pleadings on the one side or the other. There are, however, one or two questions upon which it is my duty to say a very few words. We have been charged with a great many offences; with offences against Parliament, against the law, and against the Constitution. Though I hope, considering the very large field that I have to travel over, and the important questions that I have to raise, that I may be excused from going too minutely into these questions, yet it is impossible that I should not

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

take some notice of them. With regard to our violation of the law, my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich says that is a sin which we are so very much accustomed to commit that we have almost rendered the House callous to it, and that he hardly thinks it worth while to take notice of such a trumpery thing. With regard to that, therefore, I will not go into details. I do not for a moment admit that we have in any degree violated the law. I believe that we have entirely kept within it, and that we are perfectly in consistence with the law in its letter and in its spirit. But I will not argue that question, for it has not been much discussed. Well, then, it has been said that we have been guilty of reticence, and even of worse than reticence, in misleading the House; and very severe remarks have been made both upon my noble Friend, Lord Salisbury, my noble Friend, Lord Cranbrook, and myself, with regard to some of our sins of omission and commission. I do not intend to go at length into these matters. My noble Friend, Lord Salisbury, has been spoken of in this House in a manner which I think was unworthy of the Member who used the expression. The language of the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) was such as under no circumstances should have been used in this House; but I do not think that is worthy of any serious remembrance. My noble Friend has explained in the House, where the statement was made, the grounds of his statement—and I think we may leave the matter very well where he has placed it—that he was called upon to answer particular questions, and that he answered them with reserve. [Opposition cheers.] Yes; with a reserve which he stated at the time that he was exercising. He stated that he was obliged to speak with reserve, and could only give negative answers. I think that anybody who would take the trouble—which I suspect very few have done—really to read the whole of the conversation which then took place, will form a very different opinion of my noble Friend's language from that which has been so current in this House. With regard to Lord Cranbrook's despatch, that, perhaps, occupies different ground, and upon that my noble Friend has spoken at length and with great energy in the other House. I have endeavoured, on previous occasions, to explain generally what our views are; and I utterly deny that there was anything unfair or unreasonable in the statements contained in the celebrated 9th paragraph of that despatch. We accept entirely the disclaimer by Lord Northbrook of the construction which we have put upon his part of the transaction; but I say now—as I have said before—that to persons reading those telegrams, and comparing one with another, the impression which was made on our minds was, I think, a very natural impression. At all events, it was a case in which, whether the Viceroy was overruled by, or whether the Viceroy coincided with, the Home Government, does not really very much matter to the main argument of the despatch, which was that the policy adopted in 1873, either dictated by the Government at home, or by Lord Northbrook himself, was a policy which produced a certain effect. With regard to myself, I really do not know whether I am accused seriously of having attempted to mislead the House in the speech to which reference was made. The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) told me that I was to be compared to a dentist trying to soothe a timid child by holding out quieting and soothing promises and statements. I have read and re-read the discussion to which reference is made, and I can see nothing in what I said that was, in the slightest degree, chargeable either with misleading the House, or with failing to give proper information. The question then raised was the question of Quetta. Now, I frankly admit—it is no admission, because I readily say—that at the time I was at the India Office the question of the occupation of Quetta was the particular form which was then given to what is called the “forward policy;” and I have always been—and I have been reminded that I was and always have been—an opponent of what is called and known as the “forward policy.” Quetta being then the word which was, as it were, the flag of that policy, when I heard there was something going on about the occupation of Quetta, I frankly admit that I became somewhat alarmed. I came down to the House and saw my noble

Friend, Lord Salisbury, and my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State (Lord George Hamilton), to know what it was. I was told what it was, and it was this — It had no connection with the forward policy, or with any idea of advancing to meet the Russians; but the occupation, as it was called, of Quetta was the movement of a certain number of troops in company with one of our Commissioners with a view to the settlement of certain questions which had arisen in Khelat. It was a totally different question from that of an advance to anticipate Russia. When I was challenged particularly by the noble Lord after that discussion to say what I had to say upon that subject, I began by admitting that I was not very well acquainted with the details of the matter, and then I repeated my own articles of faith. I held them, and I still hold them, and I deny that I misled the House. Passing from these personal matters, I wish to take notice of two very serious statements which have been made in the course of this debate. They are serious statements, because they go forth with the imprimatur of Members of authority in this House, and because they are calculated to have great effect in India, and to do great harm in other countries, by giving the impression that there is something underhand and discreditable in the style of our proceedings, and in the way in which our diplomacy is conducted. A great deal has been said about an expression which was used by my noble Friend, Lord Salisbury, in his despatch of the 19th of November, 1875, directing, or recommending, the Government of India to find, or, if need be, to create, an opportunity of communicating with the Ameer, in order to induce him to reconsider his views as to the reception of a friendly Mission. [Mr. FAWCETT: To find a pretext.] I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. These are the exact words used by my noble Friend—

“The first step, therefore, in establishing our relations with the Ameer upon a more satisfactory footing, will be to induce him to receive a temporary Embassy in his capital. It need not be publicly connected with the establishment of a permanent Mission within his dominions. There would be many advantages in ostensibly directing it to some object of smaller political interest, which it will not be difficult for your Excellency to find, or, if need be, to create.”—[Afghanistan, No. 1, p. 149.]

That seems to be regarded by hon. Gentlemen opposite as a most objectionable passage. But let me just say something about it. It occurs in a despatch of November 19, which is an answer to a despatch written from Simla on the 7th of June, and signed by Lord Northbrook and the Ministers of his Government. This was the recommendation of Lord Northbrook and the Members of his Government—

“We recommend that no immediate pressure be put upon the Ameer, or particular anxiety be shown by us upon the subject, but that advantage be taken of the first favourable opportunity that his own action or other circumstances may present for the purpose of sounding his disposition and of representing to him the benefits which would be derived by Afghanistan from the proposed arrangement.”—[Ibid. p. 133.]

So that, to my mind, the chief difference between the first proposal and the second letter is, that the one was written by Lord Northbrook's Government and the other was written by Lord Salisbury. I can conceive of no fair interpretation which can be put upon Lord Salisbury's words which distinguishes them from the words of Lord Northbrook. I do not wish this to be considered as if it were a mere matter of retort. It was said the other night that nothing was more common in diplomacy than that opportunities should be taken to seek some reason for discussion when important subjects were involved, which it was not thought desirable to approach too abruptly. Murmurs were heard at that, as though there were something discreditable in such conduct. I venture to say that I could find scores upon scores of such instances—some of them taken from Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich himself. But I do not wish to take modern, and perhaps Party, precedents. I will take an authority which I think will be recognized as one that is above suspicion. Certainly, there is no statesman whose name and whose praise have been more frequently in the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich than those of Mr. Canning; and there is no Englishman whose name stands higher, for everything that is honest and straightforward, than the name of the Duke of Wellington. Well, let me read from an Instruction given by Mr.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Canning to the Duke of Wellington, in the year 1826—

“His Majesty the King having been pleased to make choice of your Grace to convey to the Emperor Nicholas His Majesty's congratulations on his Imperial Majesty's accession to the Throne of Russia, I have received His Majesty's commands to take advantage of the favourable opportunity which your Grace's access to the Emperor and to his Ministers will afford, for ascertaining the real views of the new Emperor with respect to the affairs of Turkey and Greece, and for endeavouring to come to some direct and confidential understanding upon that subject with the Court of St. Petersburg.”

I will leave myself there; and I can only express my own conviction that these words are an illustration of the old saying—that one person may steal a horse, while another may not look over a hedge. We have had some very serious remarks made upon the apparent disregard and repudiation of their assurances by the Government. Nothing more serious, I think, can be alleged than that the English and the Indian Governments are indifferent to the sacredness of the assurances which may be given, however those assurances may be given. There has been no repudiation, that I can find, of verbal assurances, or of any other. What I understand by the repudiation of an assurance is, that if an assurance is given, and if the occasion arises upon which that assurance is relied on, and it is not acted up to, then I consider there is a breach of faith which is, in the highest degree, to be condemned. But what was the case here? There was no repudiation whatever of any assurance upon which we were called upon to act. What took place was this—Notice was given to the Ameer that, in consequence of uncertainties which had arisen from the different constructions which were put upon verbal assurances which were vague, and to which he attached one meaning and others another, it was desirable to put an end to those assurances and to substitute for them a clear, well-defined, carefully drawn-up Treaty, which would be intelligible, and from which there would be no escape. That was what was done, not that we drew back from our verbal assurances. I have heard it said—it was said by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) himself—that he believed Shere Ali put a more favourable construction for himself upon the words of Lord

Mayo than they were intended to bear. So he did also upon the words of Lord Northbrook; and it was because there was this great difficulty of dealing with him, because he put different constructions upon mere loose verbal assurances, which could be repeated one way by one person and another way by another person, that Lord Lytton desired that a Treaty should be substituted. That is the whole explanation of that of which such incorrect accounts have been given. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to come to a clear understanding as to the real issue before us; and in order that we may have that clear understanding of the issue, it is important that we should have a clear understanding of the occasion and the causes of these hostilities. That is a point which has been very much obscured in the course of the discussion. We have been told by some that we have gone to war to get a scientific Frontier; by others that we have gone to war to punish the Ameer for the sins of Russia; and various other statements have been made which I think will be dispelled by a consideration of what the real cause and the real occasion of the war was. What was the immediate occasion of the hostilities? It was that a friendly Mission sent by the Government of India to the Ameer of Cabul was repelled by him, in territory not his own, by force and under circumstances which gave his act the character not only of a defiance, but even, to some extent, of a menace. It was absolutely impossible, when matters had been brought to that pass—[Cheers—no; let us go step by step and listen to me—it was absolutely impossible that after that we could do anything but that which we did. After giving the Ameer the fullest opportunity of recalling and apologizing for his conduct, we could have done nothing less than take the steps which we did. We could not have remained inactive. As I said the other day, the security of our Frontier and our dominion in India depends upon the conviction of the Indian people that we are both just and strong; that we are strong not only in the sense of having strength, but of being prepared, if necessary, to use it. What would be the consequences if any of our subjects should be under the impression, which the Ameer himself was under, that there was a greater power than ourselves, and that we were afraid to meet that power? Depend upon it any faltering or quavering at that moment would have been productive of the most serious and fatal consequences. It is said—"You might have gone and reckoned with Russia." But the point was not that Russia had sent a Mission to the Ameer, but that the Ameer had refused our Mission. The connection of the sending of the Russian Mission was this—that, in the first place, it disproved and cut from under his feet the ground upon which he had always refused to receive our Mission. He had said—"I cannot receive it, because I cannot with safety allow Europeans at my Court; and secondly, because, if I did so, I should be obliged to receive the Russian Mission also." A Russian Mission had been received—and received under circumstances which seemed to show anything but a friendly feeling of the Ameer towards ourselves. I should like to read a very few, but very significant, words from the conversation at Simla, on the 7th of October, 1876, between Sir Lewis Pelly and the British Native Agent at Cabul—

"Another reason advanced by the Ameer for declining the Mission was, that a pretext would thereby be afforded to the Russians for deputing a similar Mission to Cabul; that the circumstance of their having given assurances to the contrary would not stop them; that the Russians broke Treaties at pleasure, were very pushing in their policy, and feared no one."

Let me call attention to the next few lines—

"The recent political history of Europe showed that the English were unable to compel the Russians to adhere to Treaties, and were equally impotent to arrest Russian aggressions."—[Ibid. p. 181.]

That was very shortly after the Black Sea Treaty had been torn up. It would never have done for us to allow that idea to get abroad in India. It is bad enough that it should be in the mind of the Ameer of Afghanistan; but if it should be supposed in India that we are unable to stop Russia, I will leave anyone to consider what the consequences would be. I was cheered just now when I said that it was when matters came to this pass that we were obliged to do what we did. I have, of course, to acknowledge the fact, and that is what I am about to come to, that the main issue raised by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) is not so much as to what was done after the Mission had been repelled, as it was a condemnation of the policy which he says led to its being so. I imagine the hon. Member would accept that as a fair description of the greater part, at all events, of his speech. He has endeavoured to show that the bad state of feeling between us and the Ameer, which immediately gave rise to this repulse, was produced—if you are to believe him, entirely produced—by the action of the present Government. The hon. Member has a most convenient mode of dealing with these questions. He was complimented, in the course of the debate, on his skilful handling and management of the Blue Books. I quite admit he has a very skilful mode of managing them. The other day he gave us a history of these transactions in a manner which was quite agreeable to listen to, from the skilful and easy manner in which he dealt with a complicated and difficult task. But there is one part of his method which, I must confess, I thought was more to be admired than imitated, and that was the cool and quiet way in which he began at page 129, as if there had been nothing before that. At page 129, after the first despatch that Lord Salisbury wrote, things, it appears, began to go wrong. Ex illo fluere et retrò sublapsa referri spes Danaûm. We can hardly admit that the whole of the mischief really arose from the conduct that was pursued after page 129, and from nothing else. The hon. Gentleman, when he was managing and reading his extracts, found occasionally that there was one great secret for making his tale complete and consistent, and at the same time not wearying to the House, and that may, perhaps, be best described by the title of a little book, some of us I dare say have seen, Where to Stop and Why. The hon. Member read and laid great stress upon a portion of the Memorandum of Dr. Bellew and his communications with the Envoy at Peshawur. He read a good deal, telling us at the same time that this Envoy was particularly free and frank in his communications with Dr. Bellew, as he certainly was. In particular, he read us a passage to show how it was that the confidence of the Ameer had been turned from the British Government. But he stopped short just before this curious paragraph—"Now I will tell you what has turned the Ameer's confidence from your Government." Considering he was particularly confidential to Dr. Bellew, that was surely worth knowing—

"But what came to pass in the time of Lord Northbrook? I will now tell you. Lord Northbrook wrote to the Ameer on behalf of Yakob Khan, . . . . . to send him back to Herat. The Ameer was angry, and resented this interference."—[Ibid. p. 195.]

and he goes on to explain what his grievances are. They turn out to be this, which has remained, as we know by subsequent evidence, in his mind, and remains there—rankles in his mind, as the chief grievance he has against us. Do not let it be supposed that we find fault with Lord Northbrook for his interference. No. But the argument addressed to us is that anything we have done which has caused offence to the Ameer must be wrong; while anything done by Lord Northbrook which gave offence to the Ameer is to be judged on its own merits. That has run all through this debate. There are two standards. There is one which is two applied to us, and another which is applied to our Predecessors. I am sorry that I am now obliged to go into a matter of considerable importance, though it seems to be rather of a personal nature, which has been put to me very distinctly, and in a manner which I cannot possibly avoid answering, especially by the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff), by the noble Lord, and by others. It has been said to me—"What is the explanation of your own turn of policy? How is it that you who, according to these despatches, appear at one time to have been, and are known to have been, an advocate of one policy, have completely turned round and become an advocate of another?" Well, I do not admit the charge; but in order to explain my position, it is necessary that I should endeavour to clear up another matter which, I think, has not been made quite clear in any of these discussions, and that is what the policy of Lord Lawrence actually was. Certainly, as I understood and accepted it—and as I think I shall be able to show I had very good grounds for believing it to be—that policy was different in several respects from what it has sometimes been reported to be. It was a policy which, if pursued to its consequences, and under the circumstances which have since arisen, must necessarily have led to the views we now entertain. The views of Lord Lawrence have been stated in many ways. They are officially recorded in despatches in this Blue Book. But I have asked for, and received, the permission of Lord Lawrence to read some extracts from private letters addressed to me by himself while I was Secretary of State and he was Governor General upon this subject, in which he expresses himself with more freedom, and which, I think, will show rather more clearly what his real views were. This is a letter which he wrote to me at the very first moment of receiving by telegraph the information that I had been appointed to the office of Secretary of State. It was a letter which he wrote in order to put me in possession of his views upon many of the particular topics of the day, and part related to the affairs of Afghanistan. He says—

"There is only one other subject on which I wish at present to trouble you. Hitherto we have steered clear of all Afghan troubles; we allowed the contending factions to fight out their own battles on their own resources. The Ameer Shere Ali has been, I anticipate, practically beaten without hope of recovery, unless he receives foreign aid, or some very extraordinary turn of fortune should take place. His only hold of Afghanistan is the possession of Herat and the country in its vicinity. He is not a man, however, to sit down and content himself with the remnants of his kingdom so long as he has life. He has now sent down one of his Envoys to the Commissioner of Scinde. . . . Until I hear what this Chief has to say, I can come to no definite conclusion; but I anticipate he comes to seek aid from us, and probably with an intimation that he will be compelled to seek assistance from the Persians, or even the Russians. Now, it is one thing to leave the Afghans alone to fight out their own battles, and quite another to stand by in the same attitude when others are interfering. I do not think there is much to choose between the two parties in Afghanistan. I do not think that either of them is in the least degree to be trusted if any strong inducement were to arise in which it was the interest of the ruling power to turn against us. I do not think any one Chief if he were to obtain supreme authority could count on retaining it for six months. But though little inclined to interfere, and with little expectation of doing real good, I think, on the whole, it would be the best course, if Shere Ali adopt the policy I have indicated, to tell him plainly that though we have not helped him yet we have taken no part on the other side. That we still cannot consent to send him aid, yet so long as he can hold Herat by his own power we will continue to maintain our Treaty with him, and recognize him as the Ruler of Herat. But that if he should resolve on calling in the aid of Russia or Persia, and either of those Powers should send him material aid, it would lead us to give assistance to his enemies, the two brothers who are now in possession of Candahar and Cabul."

[Fourth Night.]

That was a letter which was written by Lord Lawrence on the 9th of March, 1867. Subsequently he wrote a letter on the 18th of August, in which he refers to a rumour that Persia had designs on Herat. He goes on to say—

"Neither of the Afghan parties are in the slightest degree trustworthy, and both would equally use us for their own purposes. . . . If the news which I send you prove true, I am for helping the party now in power with money and arms to maintain their position. Of the two parties I rather prefer the one which is out, that of the Ameer Shere Ali; but this seems to me to be one of secondary importance. If he fail to recover power we shall have done good service to his enemies. If he succeed his position would be precarious, and he would, in all probability, be willing to make common cause with us. In that case I should help him. There would be no treachery to the other party in this, for I would let them know in the first instance—indeed, they already know—that such would be our policy. All Afghans are prepared for such changes. They understand that we do not care for this or that Chief; but that we desire Afghanistan should not fall into the hands of any foreign Power. In this feeling the great body of the Chiefs and the people would go with us."

These are the letters which I received, and which preceded the official letter which will be found in the Blue Book. When that letter arrived I circulated it among my Colleagues in the Cabinet, and I made some memoranda of my own upon it, from which I will read a short extract showing my own views. I wrote—

"I think that it would be reasonable that we should either hold ourselves absolutely aloof from Afghanistan politics and recognize the de facto Ruler of the day, whoever he may be, or that we should so far ally ourselves with one Chief as to support him with arms and subsidies, as Sir John Lawrence proposes, should occasion require it. But I cannot bring my mind to the proposal that we should subsidize first one and then the other, according as accident brings up Shere Ali or Abdul Rahman to the head of affairs. I have great confidence in Sir John Lawrence's knowledge of the Afghan character; but I doubt whether such a course as this would be compatible with our own, or would be understood by the public. I think, however, that he might safely tell Shere Ali that any tampering with the Persians as respects Herat will lead us to give aid to his rival."

That shows the principle of the policy of Lord Lawrence at that time, and such

it continued to be—that is to say, we held the great object to be to exclude the influence of any foreign Power in Afghanistan. Well, then, there is the other point in Lord Lawrence's policy. The other point was, that we were not to be led by a fear of the advance of Russia into advancing beyond our own Frontier to meet her; and he argued that against those who said that it was desirable that we should counteract the efforts of Russia in Bokhara or the other Khanates by advancing ourselves into Beloochistan, Quetta, and other parts. Lord Lawrence always said—"That is a wrong policy. Wait until Russia comes nearer, till you see the real moment of danger has arisen, and then defend yourselves within your own Frontier." At the same time, he says in one of these letters—"I am not ignorant of the faults of our own Frontier." That was accordingly the policy England adopted. The hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs speaks of this policy as Lord Lawrence's second policy, and then asks me why I have changed my policy? If Lord Lawrence, who has spent all his life in India—and of whom no one can speak too highly for the great services he rendered to England, or for his knowledge of the Indian character, and especially of the Afghan character—was himself induced to lay aside his first policy and to take up his second, surely it may not be thought unreasonable that one who had come so recently to the study of Indian affairs might also be allowed to have a second policy. But I do not admit that it is a second policy. I say it is a development of the first, according to the change of circumstances. So long as the Russians were only moving in Central Asia, so long as their movements were confined to Bokhara, or Khiva, or any of those Khanates, although we might find reason for remonstrating against some of their proceedings, I think it was not a case for advancing beyond our Frontier to meet them. But when there was a Russian Mission sent to Cabul, and sent avowedly because there was an unfriendly feeling between England and Russia, avowedly because Russia thought that was a point at which we were vulnerable, I say all the circumstances on which Lord Lawrence founded his policy of inactivity, of not advancing, were so completely revolutionized that the very arguments which we supported in one case and in the one policy would, I think, have supported us—would certainly have supported me—in taking a totally different view of what was to be done in Afghanistan. This is a matter upon which there has been no inconsistency whatever. I do not wish to throw any blame upon the Russian Government for sending a Mission. The world was, as it were, turned upside down at that period; and when that happens you must not be surprised to find a few chairs and tables out of their places. No doubt when the state of our relations is considered, it was not unnatural that Russia should send a Mission to Cabul for the purpose of seeing what it could do there that might be injurious to us. But though not unnatural it was very significant. It showed that these bugbears were now becoming pretty tall bugbears. It was all very well, in 1867, to take up one ground on the understanding that the Russian advance in Central Asia would stop there. I believe we should have been acting very foolishly if we had advanced to meet it half-way. But it is a very different thing when the circumstances are changed. That is the explanation of the policy which Her Majesty's Government have pursued, and which, to a certain extent, has been, no doubt, a departure from the policy of the past. It has been a policy forced upon us by events. I can only say for myself that when we had to consider what was to be done when we heard the Russian Mission was at Cabul, the alternatives which presented themselves to me were these—If we had done nothing it would have been a weakening of our position and an alarm to our population. It is said—"Why not go to Russia?" Well, we remonstrated with Russia; but, as I have said, the grievance against Russia was one not easy to remove quickly. That, also, would not have met the particular difficulty with which we had to deal, which was the impression produced in India by these manifest advances of Russia. What would the people of India have known of your negotiations with St. Petersburg or Livadia, of all the notes passed and the explanations given, and the promises made, and the orders sent, and the delays which would have taken place in the reception of those orders, and all the while the Russian

Mission a fact, and received and made a great deal of in Afghanistan? If we had taken more peremptory measures for its withdrawal, that might have brought about a more serious conflict than that in which we are at present engaged. What we proposed to do was to meet in the most friendly and, at the same time, the most efficacious mode the difficulty in which we were placed. We thought we would send a friendly Mission to counterbalance the Russian Mission at Afghanistan. Had it been received—and we had every hope that it would be received—all the difficulty would have been got over without any quarrel whatever. Unfortunately, the matter had gone too far. We have been told that we have been vicariously punishing one man for the sin of another. The course we took was with no idea of punishing anybody at all. Our object was to counteract the move of Russia by that which we believed to be at once the most salutary, and, at the same time, the most efficacious course. So far as the Border Tribes are concerned, nothing can be clearer than our duty to them. We applied to them to give us a safe conduct. They gave it through their own territory, where the Ameer had no business; and when they had done that, they said—"Give us protection. We have for your sake incurred the wrath of the Ameer—he is our enemy," and we were bound by every consideration of justice and policy to give it to them. I thank the House for having listened to me with so much patience and at such an hour. There is much more that one could say; but I think I have said enough to make good my case. I will merely repeat that the views of the Government, and more particularly the personal views of my noble Friend, Lord Salisbury, and myself, might, perhaps, have been more charitably considered by those who remember what our views in former times have been. I was glad to see the noble Lord the Member for the Haddington Burghs (Lord William Hay), and hearing him speak in the House. I could not help remembering that the last time we crossed swords in an Indian debate was at a time when I was carrying out a policy initiated by Lord Salisbury, but somewhat coldly looked upon by Members of the Liberal Party, for the restoration of the Principality of Mysore to a Native Ruler. I think it is hardly from those who have held such views as that, that you would expect to find a policy of annexation proceeding. Nothing can be more contrary to our feeling, nothing can be more contrary to our principles, than such a policy as this. On the other hand, charged as we are, and still may be for some little time longer, in spite of the noble Lord, with the fortunes and the destinies of this great Empire, we intend to do our duty by it, and not to be deterred by any misrepresentations that may be made of us.

[Fourth Night.]

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, many Members who had had great experience of India, and who had held the highest offices there—such as the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing), the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), and others—had desired to speak. They would have an overwhelming case, if they asked for an adjournment; but he acknowledged that it would be most inconvenient, as that was the last day of the week. He hoped, however, it would be understood that those Members who could not do so now would have an opportunity of expressing what they now felt on the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett).

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 328 ;
Noes 227 : Majority 101.

AYES.

|                           |                          |
|---------------------------|--------------------------|
| Agnew, R. V.              | Bentinck, rt. hon. G. C. |
| Allcroft, J. D.           | Bentinck, G. W. P.       |
| Allsopp, C.               | Beresford, Lord C.       |
| Allsopp, H.               | Beresford, G. De la P.   |
| Anstruther, Sir W.        | Beresford, Colonel M.    |
| Arbuthnot, Lt.-Col. G.    | Birley, H.               |
| Archdale, W. H.           | Blackburne, Col. J. I.   |
| Arkwright, A. P.          | Boord, T. W.             |
| Arkwright, F.             | Bourke, hon. R.          |
| Assheton, R.              | Bourne, Colonel J.       |
| Astley, Sir J. D.         | Bousfield, Col. N. G. P. |
| Bagge, Sir W.             | Bowen, J. B.             |
| Bailey, Sir J. R.         | Bowyer, Sir G.           |
| Balfour, A. J.            | Brady, J.                |
| Baring, T. C.             | Brise, Colonel R.        |
| Barne, F. St. J. N.       | Broadley, W. H. H.       |
| Barrington, Viscount      | Brooks, W. C.            |
| Barttelot, Sir W. B.      | Bruce, hon. T.           |
| Bates, E.                 | Bruen, H.                |
| Bateson, Sir T.           | Brymer, W. E.            |
| Beach, rt. hon. Sir M. H. | Bulwer, J. R.            |
| Beach, W. W. B.           | Burghley, Lord           |
| Bective, Earl of          | Burrell, Sir W. W.       |
| Benett-Stanford, V. F.    | Buxton, Sir R. J.        |

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

|                           |                           |
|---------------------------|---------------------------|
| Cameron, D.               | Gilpin, Sir R. T.         |
| Campbell, C.              | Goddard, A. L.            |
| Cartwright, F.            | Goldney, G.               |
| Castlereagh, Viscount     | Gordon, W.                |
| Cave, rt. hon. S.         | Gore-Langton, W. S.       |
| Cecil, Lord E. H. B. G.   | Gorst, J. E.              |
| Chaine, J.                | Goulding, W.              |
| Chaplin, Colonel E.       | Grantham, W.              |
| Chaplin, H.               | Greenall, Sir G.          |
| Charley, W. T.            | Gregory, G. B.            |
| Christie, W. L.           | Guinness, Sir A.          |
| Churchill, Lord R.        | Hall, A. W.               |
| Clive, Col. hon. G. W.    | Halsey, T. F.             |
| Close, M. C.              | Hamilton, Lord C. J.      |
| Clowes, S. W.             | Hamilton, right hon.      |
| Cobbold, T. C.            | Lord G.                   |
| Cochrane, A. D. W. R. B.  | Hamilton, Marquess of     |
| Cole, Col. hon. H. A.     | Hamilton, hon. R. B.      |
| Coope, O. E.              | Hamond, C. F.             |
| Cordes, T.                | Hanbury, R. W.            |
| Corry, hon. H. W. L.      | Harcourt, E. W.           |
| Corry, J. P.              | Hardcastle, E.            |
| Cotton, W. J. R.          | Harvey, Sir R. B.         |
| Crichton, Viscount        | Hay, rt. hn. Sir J. C. D. |
| Cross, rt. hon. R. A.     | Heath, R.                 |
| Cubitt, G.                | Helmsley, Viscount        |
| Cuninghame, Sir W.        | Herbert, H. A.            |
| Cust, H. C.               | Herbert, hon. S.          |
| Dalkeith, Earl of         | Hermon, E.                |
| Dalrymple, C.             | Hervey, Lord F.           |
| Davenport, W. B.          | Heygate, W. U.            |
| Denison, C. B.            | Hick, J.                  |
| Denison, W. B.            | Hildyard, T. B. T.        |
| Denison, W. E.            | Hill, A. S.               |
| Dick, F.                  | Holford, J. P. G.         |
| Dickson, Major A. G.      | Holker, Sir J.            |
| Digby, Col. hon. E.       | Holland, Sir H. T.        |
| Douglas, Sir G.           | Holmesdale, Viscount      |
| Dyott, Colonel R.         | Holt, J. M.               |
| Eaton, H. W.              | Home, Captain D. M.       |
| Edmonstone, Admiral       | Hood, Captain hon. A.     |
| Sir W.                    | W. A. N.                  |
| Egerton, hon. A. F.       | Hope, A. J. B. B.         |
| Egerton, Sir P. G.        | Hubbard, E.               |
| Egerton, hon. W.          | Hubbard, rt. hon. J.      |
| Elcho, Lord               | Isaac, S.                 |
| Elliot, G. W.             | Jervis, Col. H. J. W.     |
| Elphinstone, Sir J. D. H. | Johnson, J. G.            |
| Emlyn, Viscount           | Johnstone, Sir F.         |
| Estcourt, G. S.           | Jolliffe, hon. S.         |
| Ewart, W.                 | Jones, J.                 |
| Ewing, A. O.              | Kennard, Col. E. H.       |
| Fellowes, E.              | Kennaway, Sir J. H.       |
| Finch, G. H.              | King-Harman, E. R.        |
| Floyer, J.                | Knight, F. W.             |
| Folkestone, Viscount      | Knightley, Sir R.         |
| Forester, C. T. W.        | Knowles, T.               |
| Forsyth, W.               | Lacon, Sir E. H. K.       |
| Foster, W. H.             | Lawrence, Sir T.          |
| Fremantle, hon. T. F.     | Learmonth, A.             |
| Freshfield, C. K.         | Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.    |
| Gallway, Sir W. P.        | Lee, Major V.             |
| Galway, Viscount          | Legard, Sir C.            |
| Gardner, J. T. Agg-       | Legh, W. J.               |
| Gardner, R. Richard-      | Leighton, Sir B.          |
| son-                      | Leighton, S.              |
| Garfit, T.                | Lennox, Lord H. G.        |
| Garnier, J. C.            | Leslie, Sir J.            |
| Gathorne-Hardy, hn. A.    | Lewis, C. E.              |
| Gathorne-Hardy, hn. S.    | Lewis, O.                 |
| Gibson, rt. hon. E.       | Lewisham, Viscount        |
| Giffard, Sir H. S.        | Lindsay, Col. R. L.       |
| Giles, A.                 | Lindsay, Lord             |

Lloyd, S.
 Lloyd, T. E.
 Lopes, Sir M.
 Lowther, hon. W.
 Lowther, rt. hon. J.
 Macartney, J. W. E.
 Mac Iver, D.
 M'Garel-Hogg, Sir J.
 Makins, Colonel W. T.
 Mandeville, Viscount Manners, rt. hn. Lord J.
 March, Earl of Marten, A. G.
 Master, T. W. C.
 Mellor, T. W.
 Merewether, C. G.
 Miles, Sir P. J. W.
 Mills, A.
 Mills, Sir C. H.
 Monckton, F.
 Montgomerie, R.
 Montgomery, Sir G. G.
 Moore, A.
 Moore, S.
 Moray, Colonel H. D.
 Morgan, hon. F.
 Morris, G.
 Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.
 Mulholland, J.
 Muncaster, Lord
 Naghten, Lt.-Col. A. R.
 Newdegate, C. N.
 Newport, Viscount
 Noel, rt. hon. G. J.
 North, Colonel
 Northcote, rt. hon. Sir
 S. H.
 O'Leary, W.
 O'Neill, hon. E.
 Onslow, D.
 Paget, R. H.
 Palk, Sir L.
 Parker, Lt.-Col. W.
 Peck, Sir H.
 Peel, rt. hon. Sir R.
 Pell, A.
 Pemberton, E. L.
 Pennant, hon. G.
 Peploe, Major D. P.
 Percy, Earl
 Phipps, P.
 Pim, Captain B.
 Plunket, hon. D. R.
 Plunkett, hon. R.
 Polhill - Turner, Capt.
 F. C.
 Powell, W.
 Praed, C. T.
 Praed, H. B.
 Puleston, J. H.
 Raikes, H. C.
 Read, C. S.
 Rendlesham, Lord
 Repton, G. W.
 Ridley, E.
 Ridley, Sir M. W.
 Ripley, H. W.
 Ritchie, C. T.
 Rodwell, B. B. H.
 Roebuck, rt. hn. J. A.
 Rothschild, Sir N. M. de Round, J.
 Russell, Sir C.
 Ryder, G. R.
 Salt, T.
 Sanderson, T. K.
 Sandon, Viscount Selater-Booth, rt. hn. G.
 Scott, Lord H.
 Scott, M. D.
 Selwin - Ibbotson, Sir
 H. J.
 Severne, J. F.
 Shirley, S. E.
 Shute, General C. C.
 Sidebottom, T. H.
 Simonds, W. B.
 Smith, A.
 Smith, F. C.
 Smith, S. G.
 Smith, rt. hn. W. H.
 Smollett, P. B.
 Spinks, Serjeant F. L.
 Stafford, Marquess of Stanhope, hon. E.
 Stanhope, W. T. W. S.
 Stanley, rt. hn. Col. F.
 Starkey, L. R.
 Starkie, J. P. C.
 Steere, L.
 Stewart, M. J.
 Storer, G.
 Sykes, C.
 Talbot, J. G.
 Taylor, rt. hon. Col.
 Tennant, R.
 Thornhill, T.
 Thwaites, D.
 Thynne, Lord H. F.
 Tollomache, hon. W. F.
 Torr, J.
 Tremayne, A.
 Tremayne, J.
 Trevor, Lord A. E. Hill-Turnor, E.
 Verner, E. W.
 Wait, W. K.
 Walker, O. O.
 Walker, T. E.
 Wallace, Sir R.
 Walpole, rt. hon. S.
 Walsh, hon. A.
 Walter, J.
 Warburton, P. E.
 Ward, M. F.
 Watney, J.
 Watson, rt. hon. W.
 Welby-Gregory, Sir W.
 Wellesley, Colonel H.
 Wells, E.
 Wethered, T. O.
 Wheelhouse, W. S. J.
 Wilmot, Sir H.
 Wilson, W.
 Woodd, B. T.
 Wroughton, P.
 Wyndham, hon. P.
 Wynn, C. W. W.
 Yarmouth, Earl of Yeaman, J.
 Yorke, J. R.

PELLETS.

Dyke, Sir W. H.
 Winn, R.

NOES.

Acland, Sir T. D.
 Allen, W. S.
 Amory, Sir J. H.
 Anderson, G.
 Ashley, hon. E. M.
 Backhouse, E.
 Balfour, Sir G.
 Barclay, A. C.
 Barclay, J. W.
 Barran, J.
 Bass, A.
 Bass, H.
 Baxter, rt. hn. W. E.
 Bazley, Sir T.
 Beaumont, Colonel F.
 Bell, I. L.
 Biddulph, M.
 Blake, T.
 Blennerhassett, R. P.
 Brassey, H. A.
 Briggs, W. E.
 Bright, Jacob
 Bright, rt. hn. John Bristowe, S. B.
 Brocklehurst, W. C.
 Brogden, A.
 Brooks, M.
 Brown, A. H.
 Brown, J. C.
 Browne, G. E.
 Bruce, Lord C.
 Burt, T.
 Cameron, C.
 Campbell, Lord C.
 Campbell, Sir G.
 Campbell-Bannerman,
 H.
 Carington, Col. hon. W.
 Cartwright, W. C.
 Cave, T.
 Cavendish, Lord F. C.
 Cavendish, Lord G.
 Chadwick, D.
 Chamberlain, J.
 Chambers, Sir T.
 Childers, rt. hn. H. C. E.
 Cholmeley, Sir H.
 Clarke, J. C.
 Clifford, C. C.
 Cole, H. T.
 Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
 Collins, E.
 Colman, J. J.
 Corbett, J.
 Cotes, C. C.
 Courtauld, G.
 Courtney, L. H.
 Cowan, J.
 Cowper, hon. H. F.
 Cross, J. K.
 Davies, D.
 Davies, R.
 Delahunty, J.
 Dickson, T. A.
 Dilke, Sir C. W.
 Dillwyn, L. L.
 Dodds, J.
 Dodson, rt. hon. J. G.
 Downing, M'G.
 Duff, M. E. G.
 Duff, R. W.
 Dundas, J. C.
 Earp, T.
 Edge, S. R.
 Edwards, H.
 Egerton, Admiral hn. F.
 Ennis, N.
 Evans, T. W.
 Fawcett, H.
 Ferguson, R.
 Fitzmaurice, Lord E.
 Fitzwilliam, hn. W. J.
 Fletcher, I.
 Foljambe, F. J. S.
 Forster, Sir C.
 Forster, rt. hon. W. E.
 French, hn. C.
 Gladstone, rt. hn. W. E.
 Gladstone, W. H.
 Gordon, Sir A.
 Gordon, Lord D.
 Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
 Gourley, E. T.
 Gower, hon. E. F. L.
 Grant, A.
 Gray, E. D.
 Grosvenor, Lord R.
 Hankey, T.
 Harcourt, Sir W. V.
 Harrison, C.
 Harrison, J. F.
 Hartington, Marq. of Havelock, Sir H.
 Hay, Lord W. M.
 Hayter, A. D.
 Henry, M.
 Herschell, F.
 Hill, T. R.
 Holland, S.
 Holms, J.
 Holms, W.
 Hopwood, C. H.
 Howard, hon. C.
 Howard, E. S.
 Hutchinson, J. D.
 Ingram, W. J.
 Jackson, Sir H. M.
 James, W. H.
 James, Sir H.
 Jenkins, D. J.
 Jenkins, E.
 Johnstone, Sir H.
 Kay - Shuttleworth,
 Sir U.
 Kingscote, Colonel Knatchbull - Hugessen,
 rt. hon. E.
 Laing, S.
 Laverton, A.
 Law, rt. hon. H.
 Lawson, Sir W.
 Leatham, E. A.
 Leeman, G.
 Lefevre, G. J. S.
 Leith, J. F.
 Lloyd, M.
 Lowe, rt. hon. R.
 Lubbock, Sir J.
 Lush, Dr.
 Lusk, Sir A.
 Macdonald, A.
 Macduff, Viscount

[Fourth Night.]

|                         |                          |
|-------------------------|--------------------------|
| Mackintosh, C. F.       | Rathbone, W.             |
| M'Arthur, A.            | Richard, H.              |
| M'Kenna, Sir J. N.      | Roberts, J.              |
| M'Lagan, P.             | Robertson, H.            |
| M'Laren, D.             | Russell, Lord A.         |
| Maitland, J.            | Rylands, P.              |
| Maitland, W. F.         | St. Aubyn, Sir J.        |
| Marjoribanks, Sir D. C. | Samuelson, B.            |
| Marling, S. S.          | Samuelson, H.            |
| Martin, P.              | Sheil, E.                |
| Massey, rt. hon. W. N.  | Sheridan, H. B.          |
| Matheson, A.            | Simon, Serjeant J.       |
| Meldon, C. H.           | Sinclair, Sir J. G. T.   |
| Middleton, Sir A. E.    | Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.   |
| Milbank, F. A.          | Stanton, A. J.           |
| Monk, C. J.             | Stevenson, J. C.         |
| Morgan, G. O.           | Stewart, J.              |
| Morley, S.              | Stuart, Col. J. F. D. C. |
| Mundella, A. J.         | Sullivan, A. M.          |
| Muntz, P. H.            | Swanston, A.             |
| Mure, Colonel W.        | Tavistock, Marquess of   |
| Noel, E.                | Taylor, D.               |
| Nolan, Major J. P.      | Taylor, P. A.            |
| Norwood, C. M.          | Temple, right hon. W.    |
| O'Beirne, Major F.      | Cowper-                  |
| O'Brien, Sir P.         | Tracy, hon. F. S. A.     |
| O'Connor, D. M.         | Hanbury-                 |
| O'Connor Don, The       | Trevelyan, G. O.         |
| O'Donnell, F. H.        | Vivian, A. P.            |
| O'Gorman, P.            | Vivian, H. H.            |
| O'Reilly, M.            | Waddy, S. D.             |
| O'Shaughnessy, R.       | Waterlow, Sir S. H.      |
| Otway, A. J.            | Weguelin, T. M.          |
| Palmer, C. M.           | Whitbread, S.            |
| Palmer, G.              | Whitwell, J.             |
| Parker, C. S.           | Whitworth, B.            |
| Pease, J. W.            | Whitworth, W.            |
| Peel, A. W.             | Williams, B. T.          |
| Pender, J.              | Williams, W.             |
| Pennington, F.          | Wilson, C.               |
| Perkins, Sir F.         | Wilson, I.               |
| Philips, R. N.          | Wilson, Sir M.           |
| Playfair, rt. hon. L.   | Young, A. W.             |
| Portman, hon. W. H. B.  |                          |
| Price, W. E.            |                          |
| Ralli, P.               |                          |
| Ramsay, J.              |                          |

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Address accordingly read a second time. [See page 88.]

Address agreed to:—To be presented by Privy Councillors.

SUPPLY.

Resolved, "That this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty."

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolved, "That this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty."

BURIAL GROUNDS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. WILBRAHAM EGERTON, Bill to give additional facilities for the provision of Burial Grounds, ordered to be brought in by Mr. WILBRAHAM EGERTON, Earl PERCY, Mr. HEYGATE, and Mr. BIRLEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 63]

BANKRUPTCY ACT (1869) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD, Bill to amend "The Bankruptcy Act, 1869," ordered to be brought in by Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD, Mr. NORWOOD, Mr. WHITWELL, and Mr. RIPLEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 64.]

House adjourned at half after Two o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 16th December, 1878.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Lewis Fry, esquire, for Bristol.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms (House of Commons), appointed and nominated.

PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered — First Reading—Bankers' Books (Evidence)* [65]; Dispensaries (Ireland)* [66].

Committee—Report—Disqualification by Medical Relief* [22].

QUESTIONS.

AFGHANISTAN (MILITARY OPERATIONS)—PRESS CORRESPONDENCE.

QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If newspaper correspondents with the Army in Afghanistan are allowed to proceed to the front, and to send letters and telegrams home without restriction; and, if not, what rules have been framed to govern their correspondence?

MR. E. STANHOPE: In consequence of the hon. and gallant Member's Question, we telegraphed to India, and have received the following reply:—

"(From the Viceroy, Lahore.)

"16th December, 1878.

"Following substance of rules issued by Government regarding Press correspondence:—

Approved correspondents allowed to accompany field columns, receiving carriage and camp equipage on same terms as other officers, and staff officer's rations on payment. No restriction or supervision over correspondence. Officers commanding columns empowered, if they think necessary, to require telegraphic messages to be submitted for inspection. Officers commanding at Frontier stations authorized on emergency temporarily to order stoppage of all telegrams relating to movements of troops, unless counter-signed by staff officer. Commander-in-Chief has further issued orders prohibiting staff officers writing for papers, as he considers their time should be fully occupied with their proper duties."

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY ACT, 1870—CASE OF MRS. M'CARTHY.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked Mr. Attorney General, If he has received any further information in regard to the case of Mrs. M'CCarthy, whose husband having taken away in her absence certain property belonging to her (she having a protection order as well as a decree of judicial separation, and all her property having been upon her marriage settled upon her for her absolute use), Mr. Headlam, stipendiary magistrate for Manchester, has decided adversely to her upon the ground that he "did not believe that section" (section 11 of "The Married Women's Property Act, 1870") "was intended to enable a woman to prosecute her husband for stealing her goods;" and, if he can now state whether the Government intend to propose any amendment of the Law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER), in reply, said, he believed the facts were correctly stated in the Question of the hon. Gentleman. It was not for him to pronounce any opinion on the correctness of the decision of the stipendiary magistrate for Manchester, because if it were incorrect it would, no doubt, be reviewed by a Court of Law. The section referred to, providing that a married woman should have in her own name the same remedies, civil and criminal, against all persons whomsoever, for the protection of such wages, earnings, property, and chattels as are hers for her own use, as if they belonged to her as an unmarried woman, was very plain and intelligible in its provisions, and no amendment of the Law was necessary.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES ACT, 1875— LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been called to the decision given by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Holt and the United Patriots Benefit Society, and to the remarks of the Judges on the construction of the Friendly Societies Act; whether the Friendly Societies had previously been informed by the Registrar that by section 22 they had the power to settle disputes by their own arbitration, and that section 30 only applied to societies receiving contributions by collectors, and at a greater distance than ten miles from their registered office; and, whether the Government intend to propose further legislation in consequence of the judgment of the Court?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that so far as he could understand the decision it was not in accordance with the intentions of the framers of the Act. It was not for him to dispute the decision referred to; but Friendly Societies had previously been informed by the Registrar in accordance with the intention of the Act, and, undoubtedly, if the decision referred to was right it would be necessary that some short amending Act should be passed.

MEDICAL ACT, 1858.—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any measure to amend the Medical Act of 1858; and, whether, in the event of any such Bill being brought in, it is proposed to deal with the constitution of the Medical Council?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: We hope to be able to introduce and pass this Session a measure amending the Medical Act of 1858. The constitution of the Medical Council is a matter of considerable difficulty and importance, in respect to which we think further inquiry is necessary before any legislation could be attempted.

EDUCATION ACTS—THE REVISED CODE—RETURNS.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he is now prepared with a scheme for relieving certificated teachers from the large amount of compulsory and unremunerated clerical labour imposed upon them by the Revised Code?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: We have considered the question, and shall be prepared after Christmas to state how we propose to reduce to a minimum the Returns necessary to carry out the Education Acts. It will not, however, be possible this year to dispense with the Returns required to be made on the 1st of January, 1879, to the local authorities under the Education Act, 1876.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL AND ZULULAND—THE BOUNDARY DISPUTE. QUESTION.

MR. WHITBREAD (for Mr. JAMES) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can inform the House when the Arbitration on the subject of the boundary between the Transvaal and Zululand will be completed; and, whether it is true that Colonel Wood crossed the disputed territory with a military force before the question of ownership had been settled?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH: The subject which is generally known as the boundary dispute between the Transvaal and Zululand was referred to three Commissioners, appointed by Sir Henry Bulwer, who were directed to hold an inquiry on the spot and report the facts of the case, but not to make any award or arbitration with respect to it. Their Report was sent to Sir Bartle Frere, who is now in Natal, the principal object of his visit there being to arrive at a decision upon this matter; and I understand that he has already informed Cetywayo that he is prepared to communicate that decision to him. I believe that the action taken by Colonel Wood was to the following effect:—The settlers at Luneburg, a place north of the Pongolo River, to which it does not appear that the Zulu King has any right whatever, and which is outside the disputed territory inquired into by the Boundary Commission, were reported to have received notice to quit their farms from a Zulu Chief. Colonel Wood took a small body of Her Majesty's troops to Luneburg for their protection, and in doing so may have crossed the territory which is now the subject of arbitration. I believe he acted on his own responsibility; but so far as the accounts which have yet reached me enable me to judge, I do not see how he could have taken any other course consistently with his duty.

Mr. Mundella

THE RAILWAY COMMISSION.—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. D. TAYLOR asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it is the intention of Government to increase the powers of the Railway Commission as suggested in the Report of the Royal Commission on Railway Accidents, and recommended by the Chambers of Commerce?

VISCOUNT SANDON: As I informed the House last Session, it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill next year for continuing the Railway Commission. I am giving my most careful consideration to the subject; but I must beg leave to be excused from stating what will be the provisions of the intended Bill until we bring the measure itself before the notice of Parliament.

ROYAL HIBERNIAN MILITARY SCHOOL (DUBLIN).—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Why the appointment of Commandant of the Royal Hibernian Military School, Dublin, is not subject to the five years' rule, this appointment being hitherto filled by an Officer of the Army unattached; and, is it to be understood, from a statement recently made in the "Irish Times" newspaper, that the present Chairman of the Irish Board of Works is to be transferred to the Command of the Royal Hibernian Military School?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Mr. Speaker—Neither of the posts to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman refers are in the gift or under the control of the Irish Government. I had not myself previously heard any rumour similar to that which the hon. and gallant Member mentions, and I cannot say if there is any truth in it.

JAPAN—CASE OF JOHN HARTLEY. QUESTION.

MR. MARK STEWART asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Report from Sir Harry Parkes, our Minister in Japan, in reference to Mr. Wilkinson's judgments in the case of John Hartley, accused on two occasions of smuggling opium into Japan, has been received; whether the judgment is confirmed or reversed; and, whether the Papers will be laid upon the Table of the House at this time?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, the Report had been received at the Foreign Office. The Foreign Office had no power to confirm or reverse the judgment. He did not believe there would be any public advantage in producing the Papers.

EGYPT—THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE DAIRA LANDS.—QUESTION.

MR. B. SAMUELSON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House any Papers showing the agreement between this Country and the Khedive of Egypt which enabled the Marquis of Salisbury, in his Letter to Lord Lyons of 24th October 1878 (Papers, Egypt, No. 2, 1878), to state that the person nominated by Her Majesty's Government as one of the Commissioners of the Daira Lands shall not be divested of his functions without their previous consent?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: There would be no objection to the production of these Papers when the Correspondence is complete, which it is not quite at the present moment. When it is the hon. Member can have them by moving.

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING — RE-APPOINTMENT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to propose the re-appointment of the Select Committee on Parliamentary Reporting after the adjournment for Christmas?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir; it is the intention of the Government to propose the re-appointment of that Committee after the re-assembling of the House in February.

TURKEY—RUMOURED ANGLO-TURKISH CONVENTION.—QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question, of which I have given him private Notice, Whether there is any foundation whatever for the report of a new Anglo-Turkish Convention? I would not have asked this Question if it were merely a rumour; but I am aware of the fact that the report is believed in foreign Embassies.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: There is no truth in the report, except, of course, so far as it may relate to the negotiations that have been going on with regard to the arrangements to be made in relation to Cyprus.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU KING. QUESTIONS.

MR. COURTNEY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether there was any truth in the statement made in a Reuter's telegram, published that morning, to the effect that Sir Bartle Frere had addressed an ultimatum to the King of the Zulus; and, if so, whether the right hon. Gentleman could give any information as to the nature of that ultimatum?

MR. WHITWELL asked, If there was no truth in the report, what were the present relations between the King of the Zulus and the Government of South Africa?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The present state of our relations with the Zulus is undoubtedly threatening, but not, I hope, quite of the nature that might be assumed from the telegram which has been referred to by the hon. Member. The last telegram which I received from Sir Bartle Frere was as follows, dated November 19:—

"We have desired Cetywayo to summon his councillors and send proper persons to receive the award regarding the disputed territory, and further communications regarding our future relations."

That, I think, must be the message which is described in The Times telegram of November 26 as an ultimatum. So far from bearing the character ordinarily attached to that term, I think there is good reason to hope that it may lead to a peaceful settlement of the questions at issue; but this, of course, greatly depends on the disposition of the Zulu King.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS—THE DEAN OF ARCHES.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Ministers to propose, after the adjournment for Christmas, any measure for reconciling the conflict of jurisdiction which has arisen between the Court over which Lord Penzance presided, the Court of Queen's Bench, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): The Court of Queen's Bench has, I understand, power to grant a prohibition such as that which has recently been issued by that Court. That prohibition is, I understand, to be brought before the Court of Appeal; and until the point has been decided it will not be necessary for the Government to take any proceedings in regard to it.

M O T I O N S .

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE GRAND DUCHESS OF HESSE (PRINCESS ALICE).

ADDRESS OF CONDOLENCE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, since we last met a great sorrow has fallen on the Queen and on the country, and I am sure I express the universal sentiment of this House when I propose that we should join in an Address of Condolence to Her Majesty on the lamented death of the Grand Duchess of Hesse—our Princess Alice. Sir, it has been, and is, the habit of this House to sympathize and to express sympathy with Her Majesty on all occasions of domestic joy or sorrow. There are, I do not doubt, many here—I know there are some—who can remember the Address of Congratulation on the birth of Princess Alice, and the Address of Congratulation on her happy marriage. Now, alas! it falls to me to ask for an Address of Condolence on her decease. I feel it would be superfluous—indeed, presumptuous—on my part to speak of one so well known to us all,

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

and so highly appreciated for the nobleness, tenderness, and true womanliness of her character. At the same time, one can hardly avoid lingering for a moment on the recollection of one whose life has been cut short so early, and, looking at human considerations, one would say so prematurely. Apart altogether from her Royal birth and her exalted station, Princess Alice had qualities to command love and admiration—whether we think of her as a daughter ministering at the dying bed of her father, as a sister exerting herself as a careful, affectionate, and skilful nurse to her brother when he lay almost at the point of death, as a tender mother who may be said to have sacrificed her life in her affectionate care of her own children, or whether we recall the time when she came forward to alleviate the sufferings of the sick and wounded of her adopted country. We remember how every English heart throbbed to know that these noble deeds were done by a daughter of England. Whatever may be the capacity in which we recognize that combination of qualities—that combination of warmth of heart, soundness of judgment, and practical energy which go to make up the type of a perfect woman—we feel that she is to be lamented for the sake of those she has left behind, especially in her own family, where we see that strong instinct of domestic affection which endears them so much to the people of this country. Most of all do we lament her death because of the blow that has fallen on the Queen. This is the first great domestic sorrow that has come upon Her Majesty since, 17 years ago, and on the same day, that one great blow of her life was given. We feel that before such a sorrow it is almost impossible to speak; and yet we know that words of sympathy are most valuable, and that by no one is the power of sympathy more valued than by Her Majesty, for we have her own example to show that no calamity falls upon any portion of her people but she is the first, by kindly words and kindly message, to manifest her own sympathy. I feel convinced the House will unanimously agree to an Address which will testify at once our personal affection for the Sovereign, our deep sorrow for her loss, and our earnest prayer that God may support her in her affliction. I beg to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to express the deep concern of this House at the great loss which Her Majesty has sustained by the death of Her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess of Hesse, Princess Alice of Great Britain and Ireland, second daughter of Her Majesty the Queen, and to condole with Her Majesty on this melancholy occasion; to assure Her Majesty that this House will ever feel the warmest interest in whatever concerns Her Majesty's domestic Relations; and to declare the ardent wishes of this House for the happiness of Her Majesty and of Her Family."

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I rise to second the Address which has been proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to say I feel that every man in this House will agree with every word that has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. There is no need of many words on such an occasion as this. The English people, I believe, feel deeply; but they are not prone to express their emotions loudly. There is something very grand and touching when an emotion either of joy or sorrow spreads itself over a whole people—when those deep and tender feelings which are excited by the events of human life, but which are generally and necessarily restricted within a narrow circle, extend to the utmost limits of a great Empire. Her Majesty and her children may be assured that when they rejoice, or when they mourn, the people of this country rejoice and mourn with them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has referred to that time, 17 years ago, when the first great calamity afflicted the Royal Family. Most of us can remember how at that time every man felt that he had suffered, not only a public, but a private sorrow. A few years later, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer has also reminded us, the whole nation watched, as it were, by the sick bed of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The memory of Her Royal Highness Princess Alice will always be associated with the recollection of these periods of mourning and suspense; and the devotion she showed as a daughter and a sister will never be forgotten by the people of this country. Sir, we do not desire to intrude on the grief of Her Majesty and the Royal Family; but if sympathy under such circumstances as the present be any consolation, Her Majesty may rest assured that the sentiments which are expressed in this Address are but the faithful reflection of the feelings which exist throughout the country.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to express the deep concern of this House at the great loss which Her Majesty has sustained by the death of Her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess of Hesse, Princess Alice of Great Britain and Ireland, second daughter of Her Majesty the Queen, and to condole with Her Majesty on this melancholy occasion.

To assure Her Majesty that this House will ever feel the warmest interest in whatever concerns Her Majesty's domestic Relations; and to declare the ardent wishes of this House for the happiness of Her Majesty and of Her Family.

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

THE RHODOPE COMMISSION.

WITHDRAWAL OF NOTICE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have now, Sir, to move that the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Expenses of the Military Operations in Afghanistan; and in making that Motion, which is but a formal one, I wish to take advantage of the opportunity to offer a few words of explanation with regard to a Notice I gave on Friday night, for the House to go into Committee of Supply for the purpose of granting a sum of money in aid of the sufferers in the Rhodope district. I need not detain the House by entering into any account of the circumstances which led to the appointment of the Rhodope Commission, or of the circumstances in which not one Report, but four identical Reports, were presented by four different Members of the Commission. In the circumstances in which those Reports were presented it was impossible for us, as I have stated to the House before, to take any political action without very serious consideration. I have also stated to the House on a previous occasion that, considering that those Reports concurred in representing the distress as very severe and beyond the reach of the charity either of private persons or of the Turkish Government, it had been recommended that some assistance should be given, and it was in contemplation by Her Majesty's Government to take steps, in communication with foreign Governments, for acting upon that suggestion in the Report. In order to do anything of that kind it was necessary to apply for the sanction of the House; but the Notice I gave on Friday has certainly produced a response which, though it has not been given in any formal manner, is sufficient to show that there would be very considerable difference of opinion on the subject. This, we think, is not a Vote which ought to be proposed if it is not to be generally accepted. Under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government have suspended their communications with foreign Powers on this subject; and it is not my intention to move that Vote. With regard to the position in which the House now stands, I do not know how long the discussion upon my hon. Friend's (Mr. E. Stanhope's) Motion, and the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), is likely to occupy. I am quite aware that there are many Gentlemen who take a great interest in the subject who wish to address the House, and I do not know whether it will be possible to close the debate this evening. If it should be, I hope the House will agree that after the debate is so closed, I should be allowed to move the adjournment for the Recess. If that should not be the case, and if the debate should be adjourned, then I shall give Notice to-night that to-morrow at the opening I shall move the adjournment. I should propose either to-night or to-morrow that the House, at its rising, do adjourn till Thursday, the 13th of February.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the unexpected and extraordinary announcement that has just been made renders it, I think, necessary that one or two remarks should be made upon the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, although I must say that I did not come down to the House with the slightest expectation that it would be necessary to take any course of this kind. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) characterized the other day the Notice which was given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer relating to the proposal for a grant in relief of the distress in the Rhodope district as "extraordinary." No doubt it did take the House greatly by surprise, especially after the fact that an announcement had been made a short time since by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the House should not, during this period of the Session, be asked to consider any other Business than that which related to the war which had broken out in Afghanistan. But extraordinary as that announcement was, a still more extraordinary one has been made this evening. We are informed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Government have had under their serious consideration the Reports of the Rhodope Commission, and that, having given them that serious consideration, they had resolved to make a proposal to Parliament. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has also informed us that Her Majesty's Government have entered into communications with foreign Powers on the subject. Now, I think we may be informed, at all events, whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make this proposition to the House without giving them some information—for we have received none as yet—as to the nature of these communications with foreign Powers and the answers which have been received from those foreign Powers? But, Sir, what is the reason that is given for the withdrawal of this Vote? It has been, as I have said, under the serious consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but on account of something that they have heard in the Lobby of this House, or some paragraphs which they have read in the newspapers, they have arrived suddenly at the conclusion that their serious consideration is altogether misplaced, and that the proposal should not be made. Sir, I do not think that I ever recollect an instance of a very grave and serious proposal being made so deliberately and being withdrawn with so much haste. I do think it is unfortunate that the withdrawal has taken place in a form which gives Parliament no opportunity of expressing an opinion on the conduct of the Government. I think the House is entitled to know whether the proposition is entirely abandoned, or whether it is merely suspended until further communications have been made with foreign Powers, or until some other temper be found to prevail in the public mind? I think that a little more explanation than has yet been vouchsafed to the House on this subject is required; and that we ought to make some protest against a proposal which is brought forward after serious consideration on one day being withdrawn, without any reason assigned, on the next.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. ANDERSON said, that the announcement which he had just heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken him as much by surprise as that which he had made on Friday last. The House would remember that not many days ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer answered a Question about the Rhodope Report in such a manner as to throw very considerable doubt on the veracity of that Report. Subsequently the right hon. Gentleman gave another answer, affirming the veracity of the Report; and, as if to emphasize that assertion, he came down on Friday night with the announcement that he was to move for a grant in aid of the distress in the Rhodope district. He now came down and withdrew that proposal, and so relegated them back to their old position in regard to the veracity of the Report. He (Mr. Anderson) regretted that the House was to be deprived of the opportunity of discussing the Report of the Rhodope Commission, because it was a Report which deserved some discussion. The origin of that Report was, to say the least, open to question. Her Majesty's Government invited Sir Henry Layard to select a Commissioner, and the Commissioner whom he selected was Consul General Fawcett; and these two facts were alone sufficient to throw doubts upon the veracity of the Report. ["Oh, oh!"] These facts tainted the Report, perhaps not in the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite, but certainly in the opinion of half the people of the country, who remembered perfectly who those two gentlemen were, and how they were steeped to the eyes in philo-Turkish prejudices. He believed that, under those circumstances, it was impossible for those gentlemen to give an unbiassed Report. Well, what the grant was intended to do they were still left in ignorance of. They did not know whether it was intended as a rebuff to Russia—which they that morning learnt was the opinion expressed in Constantinople—or whether it was a small sop to the great Jingo Party. They were deprived of the opportunity of knowing that. At all events, they did know that the proposal was most inopportune and almost unprecedented. But at the time when their country was in a state of the deepest distress, when factories and mills were standing, when iron and coal mines and other means of productive industry were at a standstill, that they should be asked to constitute themselves into a sort of International Committee for the relief of other nations in distress, was, he thought, rather too bad. He had looked carefully into the subject, and the only case in the shape of a precedent that he had been able to find was a very different one, and that was when a few shiploads of sea-stores were sent to the suffering inhabitants of Paris just after the siege. There was a famine in China a few years ago, where millions perished, and the Government did nothing; and when our fellow-subjects in India were in great need—one-third of the inhabitants of Orissa having died of starvation—the Home Government did nothing. As regarded the late Indian Famine the Home Government again did nothing. All these were left to voluntary beneficence. And were they now to go out of their way to grant a sum of money to a small district in Roumelia? The proposal was altogether preposterous and absurd. He regretted they had not had the opportunity of discussing the proposed grant fully, and, most of all, he regretted they had been deprived of the opportunity, before the Recess, of discussing the present condition of their own country, which the Government evidently failed to appreciate.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL wished to bring under the notice of the House and the Government a circumstance which came under his own personal notice. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that the distress in the Rhodope district was beyond the means of the Turkish Government, and he (Sir George Campbell) wished to ask whether the Government were aware that the Porte had found the means for purchasing large additional quantities of arms and ammunition in America? That great purchases of arms were made was shown by the fact that a ship which started from America loaded with arms for Turkey, stranded just after starting, and remained so to the present time. He wished to know if Her Majesty's Government realized that Turkey was spending money in that way whilst she was unable to help her own starving people? With reference to the selection of Consul General Fawcett as a Commissioner, he wished to say that he knew him to be an honourable and upright man, and thoroughly to be believed in regard to matters coming under his own personal observation. At the same time he also knew, as a matter of personal knowledge, that Mr. Fawcett was one of the most notorious Turkophiles and Russian haters in all Constantinople, and that was saying a great deal. As regarded that portion of Mr. Fawcett's Report which related to matters of opinion and not to matters of fact, he should receive it with the greatest mistrust.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am sure that the House will feel on both sides for the Government that sympathy which is always felt for persons who have placed themselves by their own fault in a very humiliating position. A more humiliating position I have never seen a Government placed in in my life. They receive the silent sympathy of their own Party, and the cordial approval in the course they pursue to-day of ours. Now, I think that the Government may have learned one lesson from this experience—that the ardent and somewhat vociferous supporters whom they have in the country and on that side of the House will do anything for the Turks except pay for them. The Government have avoided that test up to this time. They postponed payments, they borrowed money; but they did not ask for the means of paying. They seemed to have a suspicion that these Turkophile Gentlemen would not like to ask their constituents to pay for their opinions, and they were quite right. But in an evil moment they thought they would come down to this House and ask these Gentlemen to go to their constituencies and ask them to back their opinions, and then there was a rebellion. They said—"For God's sake do not send us to our constituency loaded with a claim for payment to the Turks," and so the proposal has disappeared. But what can we think of a policy conducted upon such principles as those? If it is merely a question of money, and you want to relieve these unfortunate people, I wonder why you (the Government) have not taken your favourite course. Did not this Rhodope affair arise out of your Eastern policy? But for your Eastern policy all these transactions which have occurred in European Turkey—this unfortunate and unhappy lot of misery—would not have occurred. But then your Eastern policy was a part of the defence of India, and why do you not propose to put this Rhodope grant on the Revenues of India? That would relieve you from the situation in which you are placed, because then the Tory Members would not have to ask their constituents to pay for Turkey. You can put it upon India as you put your other expenses for this policy, and that might reconcile them to it. I wish to ask a question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it is this—What are you going to do for the Rhodope sufferers now you have withdrawn the grant? My noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) has disappeared in this catastrophe. He was very loud in his cross-examination, almost menacing to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, upon the subject of the Rhodope district. Now you have got your Rhodope Report, and have made communications to foreign Governments, I want to know what foreign Governments will think when, after asking them to join you, you say you find the Conservative Members will not support you? A nice position that for a Government with a great foreign policy. But there remains the question—What are you going to do now? The answer to that question will interest the people of Rhodope; it will interest most of the foreign Governments whom you have solicited to join you; it will be very interesting to Eastern nations, and also to the constituents of Conservative Members.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he was a little surprised to find that no hon. Member on the other side of the House had got up to defend the policy of the Government, or to find a precedent for them. He certainly was not on other occasions accustomed to take that task upon himself; but it certainly did appear to him that the position of the Government was perfectly natural under the circumstances. He had in his mind a precedent that he thought might stand them in good stead. There were once two Americans who found themselves in great danger in a small boat at sea, and they thought the time had come for some devotional exercises. So as they could recollect no hymn, and they had forgotten all their prayers, they made a collection. It appeared to him that Her Majesty's Government had got into very great straits with their foreign policy, and recent elections gave them reason to believe they would soon be in difficulties at home, and so he was not surprised that, under the circumstances, they made a collection.

Sir George Campbell

MR. DILLWYN said, the policy of the Government could very well be understood on the ground that "the least said was the soonest mended." The questions put by the Leader of the Opposition ought, however, to be answered; there should be some explanation. He hoped that this affair would be settled finally and at once.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he had been perfectly astonished at the course taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and had been unable to find any precedent for such a grant. He believed both Sir Henry Layard and Consul General Fawcett to be honourable men, and incapable of wilful misrepresentation; but he must say it was impossible to read the Report without feeling that there had been a large amount of exaggeration and much looseness in the evidence upon which it was founded. He, as his votes showed, was anything but a Turkophile; but still he did not share with some hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House in admiration of the Russian Government, on whose conduct he looked with great suspicion. He wanted to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he meant by saying that he placed reliance on Consul General Fawcett? Did the right hon. Gentleman place reliance in every part of the Report, including the statement of facts, or only in some part of it? The Report, notwithstanding some exaggeration and a great deal of looseness, contained serious and grave charges against Russia. If these allegations were true, he appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to know whether the case could be met by a grant of money? Was the right hon. Gentleman going to confine himself to asking Parliament to pay for the misdoings of the Russian soldiery and Bulgarians; or was he prepared to announce what further action the Government would take?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: It appears to some of us sitting below the Gangway that the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt) made a great deal more of this matter than it really deserves. It occurs to me that the case might have been much more grave had the Motion been proceeded with. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has gracefully withdrawn the Motion, when he found upon inquiry—and it is only upon inquiry that the feeling of the House upon such a question can be ascertained—that the proposal would, in all probability, not meet with the general approval of the House. The hon. and learned Member made a statement to which not only I and many who sit near me demur, but upon which the House itself has already distinctly pronounced an opinion directly the reverse of that entertained by the hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the state of affairs in the Rhodope district was owing to the Eastern policy of the Government. Now, that must have been a mistake, because the Eastern policy of the Government had proved an entire success. [Laughter.] At all events, the votes of this House and the opinion of the country go to show that it is so. [An hon. MEMBER: Bristol.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer having withdrawn his Motion, when he found it was not met with general approval, the best course we can adopt is to put a stop to further discussion upon this small matter and to proceed with the other Business before us.

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot agree with the right hon. Baronet who has just sat down in thinking that the best mode of dealing with this subject is to make little of it, and at once to pass to the other Business of the evening. The question appears to me to be a very serious one indeed. I do not propose to widen the issue by discussing the very large question which the right hon. Baronet has raised as to the entire success of the Eastern policy of the Government, and as to the attainment of the objects with which they entered into the Berlin Congress. That may be a tempting inducement; but I think the present subject is important enough for consideration. The present proposal appears to me to have been a very unhappy mistake. The proposal of Her Majesty's Government, made on Friday and withdrawn on Monday, has not been the result of a sudden emergency, the Report having been signed by the Commissioners as far back as the end of August. Her Majesty's Government have had more than three months in which to consider this matter. The Report of the Rhodope Commission raises two points of the utmost importance: first, the conduct attributed to the Bulgarians and to the Russian soldiery as against the Mahomedan population of Rhodope; and, secondly, the alleged distress of the Mahomedan population of that district. It is very unfortunate that when the question of that distress is so prominently raised at the present time no step was taken by Her Majesty's Government with regard to it until so late a period; and that the proposal to make a grant for its relief should not have been included in the objects with which Parliament was summoned. It is evident that the idea of making that proposal was only born on Friday last—or, at least, on the day immediately before that day. It may be that there is a difference of opinion as to the propriety of the proposal and also as to the propriety of withdrawing it when it was made; but there can be no difference of opinion as to this—that in withdrawing that proposal Her Majesty's Government are morally bound to make known to us what their intentions are in reference to the matter. It has been alleged as a reason for withdrawing this proposal that the communications with foreign Governments with regard to Rhodope have been suspended; but we have been informed that the people of that district are on the verge of starvation, and the suspension of communication has no effect in arresting starvation. Her Majesty's Government, in dealing with this matter, are bound to take into consideration what course has been taken in reference to it by their friends, and by their Ambassador at Constantinople. Their friends have not only promulgated throughout the country—and they were perfectly right in so doing—the severity of the sufferings of the refugee Mahomedan population, but they have bestowed the most unmeasured and severe condemnation upon those who, as they have thought fit to say, have called the attention of the world to the sufferings of the Bulgarian Christians, but who do not care one rush for the sufferings of their Mahomedan fellow-countrymen. Sir Henry Layard has in the most unjustifiable manner embodied in a despatch, which was immediately published by Her Majesty's Government, a complaint of this kind; and our Ambassador at Constantinople, whose business it is to represent his country as a whole, has presumed to say that those who made the sufferings of the Bulgarian Christians the subject of public interest and discussion have remained coldly silent when the sufferings of their Mahomedan fellow-countrymen are in question. Having seen that extraordinary statement, I made a private and personal appeal—not without the knowledge of the Foreign Office—to Sir Henry Layard on the subject and pointed out to him the notorious injustice and the total and absolute untruth of the charge of silence which he had brought against us. Naturally, I concluded myself to be included within that charge; and I pointed out to him that on the first intimation of the sufferings that had been caused to the Mahomedans of the district I had published a letter addressed to the Christians of Bulgaria, in which I had stated that Christian cruelty was quite as bad, if not worse, than Mahomedan cruelty. Sir Henry Layard, in his reply, stated that he had not named me in his despatch, and that, therefore, he did not consider that I had any title to call him to account in the matter. That is the manner in which these things are carried on. Having pointed to the manner in which subjects of private concern are managed, let us see how matters which are of public concern are managed. The inquiry into the alleged atrocities in Rhodope commenced in a manner which may almost be called august. It arose out of statements made at the Congress of Berlin. A Commission was given by that Congress to the Representatives of the Powers at Constantinople, ordering and authorizing them to make inquiries on the subject. I confess I cannot think that the steps taken in the matter, so far as this country is concerned, were of the most judicious character. Consul General Fawcett, our Representative on the Commission, whatever his ability maybe, was marked in the most eminent degree with the character of a partizan. On a former occasion, when an inquiry was to be made into alleged atrocities in Bulgaria, Her Majesty's Government made in the person of Mr. Baring, a most careful selection of a gentleman who bore no such character; and, consequently, the Report of the Commission on which he had sat was received with absolute credence and carried the greatest weight. But, on the contrary, no sooner had the Report of the Rhodope Commission been published than it became the subject of the most severe criticism. But a heavy responsibility lay on Her Majesty's Government. It was for them to consider whether the evidence was credible or not. They did consider it, and declared it to be credible by adopting the Report of the Commission. The matter was of the utmost urgency, for the honour and character of a nation was involved in giving it effect, because it was a Report in answer to inquiries which were instituted on international authority. Her Majesty's Government having declared that they gave credence to the opinion, likewise gave Notice of a Motion in connection with which it was understood that they would explain their views to the House. That being so, how have we been met to-night by the Chancellor of the Exchequer? This matter cannot rest where it is. You cannot institute inquiries of this kind; appoint agents; declare that you have faith in them; receive from them statements which describe the most horrible sufferings, and which remark upon their continuance down, as we are given to understand, to the present time; announce, in consequence of all these proceedings, a proposal to Parliament for the relief of the sufferers; and then simply withdraw the proposal on the ground that communications with foreign Governments are suspended. I do not enter into the political part of the question at all. If I have referred to the proceedings of Sir Henry Layard, it is because I feel that he has exhibited a portion of his fellow-countrymen to the world in a most odious and offensive light. He advanced the charge against them that they were willing to excite feeling on the subject of Christian misery, but that Mahomedan misery appeared to be to them a matter of indifference. Sir, it is no matter of indifference to us. We can draw no distinction between Christian and Mahomedan suffering. I should have thought that Her Majesty's Government would have exercised a sounder discretion if, originally, in lieu of suggesting a grant of public money, a large proportion of which must have been paid out of the pockets of our own labouring population, they had adopted the means which were in their power, and which are still in their power, for instituting and recommending a voluntary subscription with the view of relieving the sufferings of these refugees. I do not know whether the consideration of that matter has been before them, nor whether it has met, or will meet with their favour. My view of the matter is entirely practical. It does not relate to the manner in which the Government or any particular section of the House will appear, but to the attitude in which the whole nation is represented if, after a solemn inquiry of this kind into the misery of a population has been instituted, and if, after a proposal has been made to Parliament, upon deliberation by the Government, the matter is allowed to be postponed sine die upon the mere statement that communications with foreign Governments are suspended. I hope, therefore, that the Government will satisfy the opinion which I cannot but think is general in the House—that this a matter with which both the interests of humanity, and the credit of the nation to some extent are concerned; and that if they do not think fit to persevere with the Vote which they proposed to submit to Parliament, they will let us know distinctly whether that Vote has been finally withdrawn; and, if so, whether they mean to take any and, if so, what measures with a view to the relief of these unfortunate people in pursuance of the Report of Mr. Consul Fawcett and his Colleagues, to which they have told us that upon consideration they give their credence.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have no wish to disturb the good humour of hon. Gentlemen opposite, or the amusement which they seem to have derived from what has just passed. Perhaps they wanted something to put them in a good humour after what has lately befallen them. But I must ask the House not to allow itself to be drawn into a general discussion of the Turkish and Russian question. We did not come here expecting such a discussion, but to transact other Business, and it would not be convenient for the House to drift irregularly into such a discussion. I do not take any exception to what has just fallen from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone). He may have had special reasons for wishing to say what he has done. But I hope the House will not permit itself to be carried into a discussion which might become animated, and which we could hardly enter upon with advantage at the present moment. The first question which has been put to me is, whether this proposal is altogether withdrawn? That is a question which may be fairly asked. In fact, this proposal has never been formally made, and there is no intention of making it. I am told that this is an extraordinary and unprecedented position for the Government to find itself in; but if we searched the records of this House, even for no distant year, I think we should find cases in which measures, even of much importance, have been brought forward with great solemnity, and have been elaborately introduced, and yet they have afterwards been quietly dropped out of sight, because it was not thought desirable to bring them to the test of discussion. But be that as it may, the position in which we really now stand is this—A Commission was appointed by the joint action of several Governments. The Commissioners held their meetings; they instituted an inquiry; but when it came to the time for reporting, it was found that they could not agree. The Report was prepared, not by Mr. Consul Fawcett—on whom rather unfair imputations have been cast—nor by Sir Henry Layard, but, I think, by the French Commissioner; and that Report was accepted identically by other Commissioners—namely, by the Italian and the Turkish Commissioners. The Reports were presented, not as one Report, but as identical Reports presented separately by the different Commissioners to their several Governments; three important Commissioners dissenting from the conclusions. In these circumstances the course to be pursued was obviously one which required considerable care and reflection. I do not think that we ought to be taunted or enticed into any discussion of that subject before we are really prepared to discuss it. At the present moment, and especially without a formal Notice and invitation to discuss the subject, I am not ashamed to say that I am not prepared to do so. But there was another matter, which stood apart or aside from the question in dispute between the Commissioners, and that was the undoubted fact, recognized by every one, that there was severe suffering, and suffering which it would be desirable, if possible, to relieve. It appeared to us that it might be a convenient and proper course to hold communication with other Governments, and, to a certain extent, such communication was opened; but in the particular case in which it was opened I do not think that the reception which the suggestion met with was such as entirely to make it clear that that course would have led to a successful result. And, at all events, when we made the proposal in this House we found there could be no doubt that there was a very widely-spread feeling that it was not desirable that such a proposal should be made and discussed. [A laugh.] It is all very well to raise a laugh, but we must look at these matters with the eye of common sense; and everybody must see that even if the Government should, at the risk of incurring ridicule, not make a proposal that would lead to repeated debates, and which, if it were adopted, would only be adopted by a majority, it is better that they should not persevere with a proposal which ought not to be accepted in a grudging spirit. I am quite prepared to take my share of any blame that may be cast on us for the manner in which we have acted, and I accept a considerable personal responsibility; but I hope the House will not now consent to be drawn into a wider discussion, and that we shall be allowed to proceed with the Business of the evening.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Expenses of the Military Operations in Afghanistan—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

AFGHANISTAN (EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS) — APPLICATION OF THE REVENUES OF INDIA.

RESOLUTION.

MR. E. STANHOPE, in rising to move—

“That, Her Majesty having directed a Military expedition of Her Forces charged

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

upon Indian Revenues to be despatched against the Ameer of Afghanistan, this House consents that the Revenues of India shall be applied to defray the expenses of the Military operations which may be carried on beyond the external frontiers of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions," said, that the discussions which had recently taken place both in that and the other House of Parliament had relieved him of a great deal of the difficulty which he must have felt in proposing the Resolution which stood in his name; and, therefore, in discharging the duty which now devolved on him, he assured the House that it would not be necessary for him to trespass on its attention at any considerable length. On the 21st of November last a Proclamation of War was issued by the Viceroy of India, and on the same day war against the Ameer of Afghanistan began. The duty which devolved on the Government in consequence of that act was a very simple one. They were bound, according to statute, to give Notice of it to Parliament within three months; or, if Parliament should not be then sitting, they were bound to give that Notice within one month after the date of its meeting. What the Government had really done was this—On the fourteenth day after the proclamation of the war Parliament was assembled, and the Government had made that announcement; and he now asked the House to enable it to fulfil the other Constitutional obligations cast upon it under the Act of Parliament. The section of the Act of Parliament on which his Resolution was founded was as follows:—

"Except for preventing or repelling actual invasion of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions, or under other sudden and urgent necessity, the Revenues of India shall not, without the consent of both Houses of Parliament, be applicable to defray the expenses of any Military operation carried on beyond the external frontiers of such possessions by Her Majesty's Forces charged upon such Revenues."

The history of that clause was very simple. While the Bill for the better government of India was going through that House, a clause was proposed by the right hon. Member for Greenwich, the effect of which was that, unless the consent of Parliament was given for the purposes of war, the Military forces of Her Majesty charged on the Indian Revenues should not be employed in any operation beyond the external

Frontier of Her Majesty's Indian possessions. That clause was accepted in that House. When the Bill reached the other House the late Lord Derby, then Prime Minister, explained a grave Constitutional objection to which it was liable in its existing form; and although he admitted that the case was very unlikely, yet he pointed out that under the law as it then stood, it was possible, if we happened to live under a Sovereign less Constitutional than Her Most Gracious Majesty, that it would be in the power of the Crown to employ the Indian Forces in war without ever obtaining the assent of Parliament. His Lordship proposed, therefore, that a financial check should be attached to such an exercise of power, and submitted the clause which he had just read, and which became law; the effect of it being that the consent of Parliament to the purposes of the war was required, not before the Indian Army could be employed beyond the Frontier, but before the Revenues of India could be applied in payment for such an expedition. In consequence of that provision application had been made to the other House of Parliament; its consent had been given by a unanimous vote; and the Government now asked the House of Commons to ratify that decision. When a charge on the Revenues of India was proposed, the first question every hon. Member would be disposed to ask himself was—"What is the real interest of India?" Were we, as the ruling Power in India, vitally interested in the results which we hoped by means of this war to secure? From the time of the Viceroyalty of Sir John Lawrence, when out of Indian Revenues we used to make contributions of arms and money towards the support of Afghanistan, down to the present day, it had been a cardinal maxim of Indian policy that the maintenance of Afghanistan as a strong Frontier Power—not, indeed, subject to our interference in its domestic affairs, but under British influence—was a vital necessity of our position. The whole Indian world had always watched the politics of that part of the country as a matter of the most pressing and vital interest. Successive Viceroys declared that the subject was one to which they attached the greatest importance; he might have said no Viceroy could possibly have neglected it. Governments at home had ratified that policy, which had been sanctioned over and over again by Parliament. That being the state of public opinion at home, and still more strongly in India, events had recently happened that were calculated to test the sincerity of the convictions which had been arrived at. We had suddenly found that British influence in Afghanistan, to which we attached the greatest importance, was not only upon the wane, but in danger of being absolutely extinguished. We had learned that the Ameer, not content with receiving a Mission from a foreign Government, in circumstances which gave its reception a decidedly hostile character, was also prepared to repel with insult, in the eyes of the people of India, a friendly British Mission. What was the result? From every part of India there came a cry that in these circumstances inaction was impossible. Native Princes had vied with one another in offering us troops and money, and in testifying their loyalty to the Government of India. They were prepared to take up arms and to make sacrifices in defence and in support of the Government of India by Her Majesty. In a word, Indian opinion, Native as well as British, declared without any hesitation that for the interest of India and for the defence of our North-West Frontier, it was absolutely necessary that steps should be taken by the Government of India to vindicate the honour of the country. The consent of the Home Government having been obtained, the Army was moved forward beyond the Frontier under the orders of the Viceroy of India; and, that step having been taken, the next question that came before the House was the manner in which the expenses of the war were to be met. He did not suppose many persons were prepared to take the sort of view which, judging from his Amendment, was taken by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). If what he (Mr. E. Stanhope) had just stated were true, it was impossible to say that India had no interest in the results of the present war. Yet that was what the hon. Member for Hackney appeared to be prepared to say. The hon. Gentleman's argument appeared to be that India was not only not to pay a single penny towards defraying the extraordinary, or the ordinary expenses of the war, but she was to receive a sum of money for having entered upon a Frontier war, and was to have an inducement to embroil us in the future in similar wars. That was a position which, he believed, hon Members generally would not for one moment support. But, as a criticism of the Resolution which he should presently have the honour to propose, it might be said—"Why do you propose, in that Resolution, to charge the whole expense to India? Has not England a sufficient interest in the matter to induce her to be generous and contribute a portion of the expenses?" That was a matter of the gravest importance, and it had been, and was now, under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. His Resolution did not prejudge this question in the smallest degree. If the House should think fit at any time to declare that a portion of the expenses incurred by the war—nay, even that the whole of them ought to be borne by the Imperial Exchequer, there was nothing in the action he now asked the House to take which would place any impediment in the way of the adoption of such a course. Certain opinions expressed by Members of the Indian Council had been referred to. They would be read with the attention due to the position of the writers. But in his opinion no proof whatever was needed that the Members of the Council of State for India were prepared cordially to support his noble Friend (Viscount Cranbrook) in the duty cast upon him by the Constitution of this country of watching over the interests and the Revenues of the people of India. It was said that the House could not regard this question fairly, because India was not represented in the House of Commons. A more gross illusion it was impossible to conceive. Ten years ago the hon. Member for Orkney (Mr. Laing) pointed out the growing disposition of England to regard fairly matters affecting India. There could be no doubt that the Members of the House of Commons considered themselves to be, as regarded India, trustees of that great country. They had shown on many occasions a scrupulous regard for the interests of the people of India, and they certainly could not be justly charged with neglecting that important consideration. The special duty of the Secretary of State for India was to watch over the interests of India in the Cabinet; and if his noble Friend should come to the conclusion that India was unable to pay these expenses, or that she ought not in justice to bear more than a certain proportion of them, his noble Friend was not the man to shrink from the consequences of that opinion, or from enforcing it with all the vigour of which he was capable on his Colleagues and the country. But looking at the character of this war and its reasonable and possible consequences, he confessed that, regarding it solely from an Indian point of view, he was induced to say

Mr. E. Stanhope

“Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.”

What was the character of the war? Was it at all like various precedents that might be adduced? In the first place, there was the precedent of Abyssinia. In that case there was the most conclusive testimony that India was well represented in the Cabinet, because the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was then Indian Secretary, succeeded in inducing Parliament to say that India should not contribute a single shilling towards the cost of that war. That, however, was a very different case from the present. Again, in the case of the Persian War, in which the interest of India was very much more remote than in the present case, Parliament decided that India ought properly to bear the whole of the ordinary and one-half of the extraordinary expenses of the war. But when they came to the present instance they found it was nothing more nor less than a mere Frontier war, not at all dissimilar in principle from many other Frontier wars in which India had been engaged. It might, perhaps, assume larger proportions, and in that event it would have to be considered from a totally different point of view. The Government hoped and believed, however, that it would remain throughout a mere Frontier war. He hoped the House would not for a moment suppose he was prejudging the matter; but he desired to submit one or two reasons why, from an Indian point of view, if a subsidy were offered to India, she ought to hesitate before accepting it. In the first place, India was not and had never been a financial burden on this country. Unlike other conquerors, we had never attempted to derive any revenue from the country we had conquered; while, on the other hand, in all her troubles and difficulties she had paid her own way. If this rule were broken through, a danger would at once arise of weakening the position of India in the eyes of the world, and altering in a very material degree the relations between India and this country. India while not imposing any financial difficulties upon England was one thing; but India as a financial burden was another. Not very long ago, in the course of the Famine in Madras, a strong feeling existed in this country that a contribution out of Imperial funds was not only desirable, but absolutely necessary. That temptation, most honourable to this country, was fortunately resisted, and the result was that India had not only been able to pay the whole cost of the Famine, but had been induced by it to make most laudable exertions for establishing a fund for insurance against similar calamities in the future. In the second place, the only true security for economical administration in India was the responsibility laid upon India to provide means for the payment of its debts. Once take away that security, let it be supposed that, save in exceptional circumstances, English assistance was forthcoming whenever needed, and the great check upon expenditure was lost. If Frontier troubles arose, there would be no financial considerations to counsel prudence. And, if unfortunately they were engaged in war, why restrict expenditure, when the English taxpayer was behind? It would be said, indeed, that with a subsidy it would be necessary to assume more complete control over Indian expenditure. That was a large question, upon which he would not now enter. He would only say, that men far wiser, and of very much greater experience than himself, had often pointed out, that there could be no greater danger to India than would arise from England usurping too much control over it, and so weakening alike the actual responsibility of the Government of India and the independence of action which had hitherto been used justly and wisely. He wished it to be understood that the whole question of the war was in no way prejudged by the Motion which he was about to move, the simple point involved in his proposal being that no shilling of the Indian Revenues could be expended for the purposes of the war until after the assent of Parliament had been obtained thereto. The House would next wish to know what was likely to be the cost of the war, and how far the Indian Exchequer was in a position to meet it. On this point he wished to give the fullest possible information; but in doing this, to the best of his ability, he must guard himself against being supposed to be able to give all the details. Only that morning he had received information from India by telegraph, and it was not so easy at short notice to understand and explain a communication of that kind as to deal with a more full and written despatch. If, therefore, any blame should attach to any one for any error in the statements he was able to make, let the House bestow the whole of it upon him. He was not able, as he had hoped to be, to give any statement as to what would probably be the monthly cost of the war—a point upon which the hon. and gallant Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock) had very reasonably and properly expressed a desire to have information. The Indian Government had made a calculation as to what the war was likely to cost; but their estimate did not extend beyond the present financial year, which closed on the 31st of March. It amounted in gross to £1,200,000; but a part of this sum would be carried forward to the next financial year, and the cost likely to be incurred before the 1st of April next was put down at £950,000, or say £1,000,000. He would now remind the House of the exact position, as far as he had been able to ascertain it, of the finances of India. In August last he stated that the Estimate of surplus, made up in the previous April, was £2,156,000 for the current year. Since that time many circumstances had occurred considerably to alter that position. In the first place, there had been a depreciation in the value of silver, which had caused, and was still causing, great anxiety; in the second place, there had been a large increase in the cost of the Army, owing to the enhanced prices of provisions; and, lastly, the depression of trade had very considerably reduced the receipts. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, he was compelled to reduce the Estimate of surplus at the close of the financial year from £2,156,000 to £1,550,000.

Mr. E. Stanhope

MR. FAWCETT asked, whether in this Estimate both productive and unproductive Public Works were included?

MR. E. STANHOPE was glad that the hon. Member had asked the question, because he had always succeeded in throwing the whole question of Indian finance into a muddle by mixing up matters of Revenue with questions relating to capital. The answer to the hon. Member's question was, that all ordinary Public Works were included in the Estimates; all extraordinary Public Works—called "productive," and in many cases likely soon to prove productive—were included in the capital expenditure. Did the hon. Member for Hackney suppose that we could maintain our position in India without engaging in any Public Works? The surplus being of the amount he had mentioned, it must be perfectly obvious that the Indian Government could pay the whole cost of the war during the present year without adding a shilling to the taxation or the Debt of the country; but it had been pointed out that we were pledged to form what was called a Famine Insurance Fund. His information on this point was very scanty, and he could not definitely state the amount we were bound to provide for the purpose out of the surplus of the year. We were bound to find £1,500,000, if the new taxes produced as much, towards the relief of famine, or insurance against future famines. A large sum had already been expended in the relief of famine, and the amount now due and to be provided out of the surplus to fulfil the famine insurance pledges was £700,000. These figures, he thought, contained nothing to cause very serious alarm. He knew the House would shortly hear a very desponding speech from the hon. Member for Hackney, and he would ask hon. Members not to believe either himself or the hon. Member for Hackney, but to look to the facts for themselves. As far as he was concerned, he had no desire to make any statement which would not bear the fullest examination; and he might say, further, that his statements were not made on his sole authority, but arose out of frequent conversations with the Indian Finance Minister, who was lately in this country, and whose services to Indian finance would, he hoped, before long be adequately appreciated. While he did not disguise from himself the dangers lying before them in the way of Indian finance, he could not admit that the state of affairs was at all unsatisfactory. During the past week the House had been discussing with some warmth, but in a most interesting manner, the question of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government towards Afghanistan. At the conclusion of that discussion the House, like the House of Lords, expressed, by a large majority, approval of the conduct of the Government. This being so, and the war having begun, he would only ask the House to accept the very wise advice tendered by the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington), in the course of the debate to which he referred, and say that, the war having been begun, they were now prepared unanimously to strengthen the hands of Her Majesty's Government to bring it to a satisfactory and speedy conclusion. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, Her Majesty having directed a Military expedition of Her Forces charged upon Indian Revenues to be despatched against the Ameer of Afghanistan, this House consents that the Revenues of India shall be applied to defray the expenses of the Military operations which may be carried on beyond the external frontiers of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions."—(Mr. Edward Stanhope.)

MR. FAWCETT, in rising to move, as an Amendment,

"That this House is of opinion that it would be unjust that the Revenues of India should be applied to defray the extraordinary expenses of the Military operations now being carried on against the Ameer of Afghanistan," said, although the speech of the Under Secretary of State offered him many temptations to go astray, he would endeavour, to the best of his ability, not to say a single word which should lead the House to loose its hold upon the issue which it now had to determine, and which he should be able to show was as important to England as it was to India. But there were some remarks in the closing sentences of the Under Secretary's speech which he could not pass over without some notice. He knew it would be said that the effect of passing this Resolution would be to stop Supplies, and to prevent the Government from bringing this war to an honourable and a speedy conclusion. Nothing could be more unjust than to attribute to him, and to those who were going to support him, any such intention to place the slightest obstacle in the path of the Government as regarded the expenditure hitherto incurred. Before Parliament met he declared to his constituents—and he repeated the declaration—that when war had once been commenced nothing was so idle as to suppose that the House of Commons could stop the expenditure which had been incurred. The duty of the Opposition when war was declared was stated with admirable force and admirable clearness by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, when he stated that, however anxious he might be to limit the scope of the war, he could be no party to any effort to stop the Supplies. The reason of this was obvious. The soldiers who were in the field must be paid; the stores procured or ordered must be paid for, unless the House was prepared to sanction an act of national repudiation; if bribes or promises of money had been offered to independent tribes, however greatly he might regret the fact on moral grounds, there was something which would be worse still—namely, a disregard of the promises so made. Therefore he desired, in the most emphatic way possible, to state that it was unfair, because they opposed this Resolution, to fasten upon them the responsibility of attempting to stop the Supplies. Indeed, so absolutely impossible, when a war had been once begun, was it to stop Supplies, that the House of Commons could practically exercise no control; and he felt this so strongly that he had no hesitation in saying that he did everything in his power to get Parliament summoned before war was declared; and he felt that had that been done, and if before the war they had only had the information they now possessed, this war would never have begun. The question they had to determine was not whether or not the money should be paid, but whether it should be paid by England, or, as was proposed by Her Majesty's Government, entirely by India. The Under Secretary had attempted to put a gloss upon the Amendment. The proposal of the Government amounted to this—that India should pay every sixpence of the ordinary and extraordinary expenses of the war, and that at some future time—it might be when the Greek

Kalends arrived—the Government would take it into their serious consideration whether the Imperial Revenues should not pay some portion of the cost. It was said his Amendment was not sufficiently specific. Then nothing would be easier than to introduce some words to make it more distinct. He did not, of course, propose that India should make money out of this war, or that the pay of soldiers, whom it would otherwise have to maintain, should be paid by England; but all that he did propose was to give a direct and absolute opposition to the Government. They declared that this war was for Imperial far more than Indian purposes; and therefore it was as unjust as it was ungenerous to come down and say—“India should pay everything, and some day we will take it into our consideration whether some slight contribution towards the expense ought not to be made by England.” This question was in no sense a Party one, and he said this not as an ordinary common place, but because the debate in “another place” had shown that many of those who were most strong in their support of the Government most strongly objected to the entire charge being thrown upon India. The Under Secretary had spoken of the unanimous decision of the other branch of the Legislature; but, as a matter of fact, every single Peer who spoke, whether he was a supporter of the Government or not, and who referred to the proposal to throw the entire charge of the war upon the Revenues of India, unhesitatingly condemned it. Therefore, so far as the opinion of the other branch of the Legislature was ascertained, instead of being unanimous in approval, it was one of unanimous condemnation. Further, a specific fact would show that, however much they might differ as to the justice or the necessity of the war, some of those who were strongest in supporting it were foremost in declaring that it was a great Imperial undertaking, and that it could not be fairly treated as if it were a purely Indian war. Another remarkable fact was that there were three Peers in the House of Lords who had all held high office in India. Two of them (Lord Lawrence and Lord Northbrook) opposed the policy of the Government; while Lord Napier of Ettrick, a former Governor of Madras, cordially supported it both by speech and by vote. Yet Lord Napier was, if possible, still more opposed than Lords Lawrence and Northbrook to throwing the charge for the war upon the Revenues of India. He thought this showed that the issues they had to discuss were entirely and absolutely distinct from the issue discussed on Friday. The Under Secretary stated that nothing would be more unfortunate to the financial stability of India than that she should receive subventions from England, and in that view he entirely concurred. Now, he wished to discuss this question as one of absolute justice, and not as one of honour and generosity to India. He was accused of taking a gloomy view of Indian finances; but he never took so gloomy a view of them as to suppose that if they were judiciously and wisely administered, India could not pay all claims justly made upon her Revenues. He was not expressing that opinion for the first time. It would be remembered that when last September twelvemonth the suggestion appeared to gain much approval that a grant should be made out of the Imperial Revenues for the relief of the Famine in Madras and Bombay, so great was his objection to subventions that he felt it to be his painful duty to oppose the movement in question. He should have occasion to show how entirely the Under Secretary had misstated the condition of the finances of India, and to call attention to the heavy burdens which were placed upon the people of India. The question before them must, however, be determined by a consideration of the character of the war. If this were an Imperial war, England was bound, both legally and equitably, to pay for it; and he based this opinion on the 55th clause of the Government of India Act, which had been read by the Under Secretary of State for India, and which clause especially said that—

“Except for preventing or repelling actual invasion of Her Majesty’s Indian Possessions, or under other sudden and urgent necessity, the Revenues of India shall not, without the consent of both Houses of Parliament, be applicable to defray the expenses of any Military operation carried on beyond the external frontiers of such possessions by Her Majesty’s Forces charged upon such Revenues.”

He did not raise the question whether it was legal to spend the Revenues of India before Parliament was summoned, which might be deferred to another occasion.

Mr. Fawcett

There could be no doubt of the meaning and purport of the clause, for it was introduced into the other House by the late Lord Derby, who had charge of the Bill, and who said he introduced it for the protection of the Revenues of India: that if the Indian forces were employed in a war beyond the Frontier of India it would be for Parliament to decide whether the war was an Imperial or an Indian one, and that if it were an Imperial war the money must be paid by England. This was the common-sense and the reasonable interpretation of the clause. What would be the position of the House and the country if it were possible to employ the Indian troops in Imperial matters, and maintain them out of the resources of India without first obtaining the sanction of Parliament? One of their greatest and most precious privileges would be swept away, and an Imperial war might be carried on without the sanction of the House, as the Government would be able to carry it on entirely out of the Revenues of India without asking for a single Vote of Supply. Therefore, this clause he considered as vital to the liberties of Parliament, and to the protection of the people of England. As to the interests of the people of India, nothing seemed to him more unfair than that the Government and their supporters, when they wanted to obtain approbation, represented to Parliament and the country that this war was a great Imperial war, and that, when on the other hand, they wanted to obtain money from the unfortunate Indian people, they should minimize the scope of the war, making it out to be a "mere Frontier war." They must have one thing or the other. For weeks the supporters of the Ministry on the platform and in the Press had been saying to their opponents—"You do not appreciate the true character of a great Imperial enterprize; you are such parochial politicians you won't understand that this is only a branch of the great Eastern Question." When Lord Lytton went to India he declared that, having had personal interviews on the subject with the Secretary of State for India, he went out determined to treat Indian Frontier questions as indivisible parts of a great Imperial subject, mainly to be determined by the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government. Nothing could be more distinct and precise than that. But supposing hon. Gentlemen opposite were to discover that this war did not simply concern a small cantonment, but that it was distinctly intended to maintain the influence and uphold the greatness of England in India, would not they be the first to say that nothing could be more mean, nothing more shabby than that the greatness and influence of England should be maintained by the money of the people of India? Lord Beaconsfield himself had said that this war was not merely one concerning the Khyber Pass, or some small cantonment at Dakka or Jellalabad; but that it was one which concerned the influence and character of England in Europe. How could they escape from that? If the war was to maintain the influence and character of England in Europe, could there be anything more unfair, more unworthy of this country than to use the moneys of the people of India to maintain that position and character, and to enable us to parade ourselves before the world as a great Imperial Power? Every cloud had a silver lining however, and in this matter there was something good. He did not think that that Imperialism would long survive, which was decked out in garments purchased with the money of starving ryots and the miserable peasantry of India. To support the view that India was prosperous enough to bear the cost of the war, it was said that when he spoke of Indian finances, he produced confusion by deducting extraordinary expenditure from the estimated surplus; but in doing so he was supported by the highest financial authorities in England, and it was almost a financial truism to assert that extraordinary Budgets and extraordinary expenditure had been in numerous instances the ready resort of embarrassed European Powers. In this case he asserted—first, that there was no surplus at all; secondly, that the money about to be taken was money that had been appropriated as a Famine Fund, and was obtained by some of the most onerous taxes ever imposed upon the Indian people; and, thirdly, that this was the most extraordinary proposal ever brought forward, as it was intended to show that India was so rich and England so poor that England must come like a suppliant pauper and ask India to relieve her in her necessities, and this was done by a Ministry which wanted to exhibit their country's influence and power. To make India pay for this war, instead of exhibiting England as a great European Power, would exhibit her as a mean, grasping, and selfish nation. He was not objecting now to expenditure on Public Works; but he contended that in order to arrive at the true financial position of India, that expenditure must be considered in estimating the surplus. To spend on Public Works £3,000,000 or £4,000,000, borrowed at  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and 'receive a return of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent was like a landowner forgetting that he had spent £10,000 on farm buildings. The late Secretary of State for India had stated that millions had been spent upon irrigation works in Bengal, borrowed at  $4\frac{1}{2}$  and 5 per cent, and that it was yielding to the Government a return of only  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent per annum. What was the good of ignoring the fact? It was beyond any possibility of dispute that this £1,200,000, which the Government was now about to apply to the purposes of the war, was money raised for a distinct object. It was raised by enormous taxation to provide a security against famine; but the latest news from India was that the public works in Bombay were to be stopped—that water which was to have been brought to the parched land was not to be brought; and why? Because the Government had not the courage to come to the House and ask for a special Vote. This money had been obtained by imposing a tax on incomes of 4s. a week, and raising the salt duty by 40 per cent on the famine-stricken people of Bombay and Madras. In the levying of these taxes they must remember that there were no exemptions on incomes of £150 a-year as in this country, the tax reaching £10 a-year. True, there were some exemptions in the case of the military and other professional men, Civil servants, and others, who went to the country clamouring for war, knowing full well that they would not have to pay for it, that part of the duty falling on poor carpenters and day-labourers. And the result of this appropriation of Indian money to Imperial purposes, according to the latest news from India, which the Under Secretary of State had judiciously avoided alluding to, was that almost all public works in Bombay were to be stopped—works which the Government themselves had declared to be necessary for the prevention of famine. They knew that not long ago no less than 2,000,000 of Indian people died from the most terrible of all deaths in Madras and Bombay; and what was the first news they heard when just able to lift their heads from the suffering which laid them low? That the salt duty had been increased to 40 per cent. They accepted that strain in calmness, in order to protect their country in future years from the terrible famines which came upon it; but did the people of this country think that the people of India would learn with calmness that it was intended to use that money to maintain our influence and greatness? The Government could not escape from the fact that the present Indian surplus had been obtained from the two taxes which he had described, and Lord Salisbury knew that taking this money meant taking it from the actually starving. In a speech on the subject of the Indian Famine, Lord Salisbury said—

“The recent mortality and distress were not due so much to a want of food or to a want of means of bringing that food to the people, but that distress and mortality were far more due to the people not having the means of buying food when it was brought within their reach.”

After such a statement as that, he proposed to take still more from these unfortunate people in order to enable himself to perorate in “another place” about our great Imperial policy, and the magnificent position occupied by England under the auspices of the present Government. The House should remember that the expenditure of £1,000,000 of Indian money was far more serious than the spending of £20,000,000 of English money. Though he was fully aware of the distressed condition of England at the present, he considered that that was the relative position. No doubt, additional taxation in England meant a diminution in the comforts of the people, and would be a serious burden upon many; but such taxation as he had indicated in India was altogether of a worse character. The financial condition of India had been so desperate that the Government did not know how to raise an additional £1,000,000. If they did, why were they so unjust as to impose such taxation as he had alluded to last year?

Mr. Fawcett

The only justification of the Government policy, then, was that the money must be forthcoming, and this was the only way in which it could be obtained. With regard to precedent, it was true that the former Afghan War was borne out of Indian Revenues; but two blacks did not make a white. The circumstances of that time were different from those of the present. The former war was not professedly undertaken as an Imperial enterprize; and India had a protection at the time of the East India Company, which she did not possess now. An authority whom hon. Members opposite would respect, speaking of that war, said—"If it had been undertaken to check Russia or to assert the Imperial position of England in Europe, he should like to know how England could possibly refuse to pay the bill?" The speaker was no less a person than Lord Beaconsfield, the present Prime Minister. Another point which had been lost sight of was that, even if the Resolution of the Under Secretary of State were rejected, a great part of the charges connected with the war must necessarily fall on India and not on England. If the war expenses came to £5,000,000, it would represent only an addition of about £160,000 per annum to England; but the expense to India in any case should be carefully considered. Lord Lawrence, and his Council, in a memorable despatch, said the "forward policy" would paralyze the finances of India. That despatch was important, not only considering the high authority from which it proceeded, but because it was endorsed by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government of which he was a Member. Lord Sandhurst, distinguished alike as a financier and soldier, said the forward policy would cost India not less than from £3,000,000 to £4,000,000 a-year. On Tuesday last the Under Secretary of State for India told them that before the war had lasted one month, the Native Army of India had been increased by 15,000 men. That increase amounted to about 12 per cent; and there was not a military authority, in the House or out of it, who would not be prepared to say that a proportionate increase of European officers would also be necessary. That would involve at least £1,500,000 a-year. If India was to bear the burden how was the money to be provided? Would they come forward with proposals to extend the income tax from incomes of 4s. a-week to incomes of 2s. a-week? Were they prepared to increase the salt tax from 40 per cent to 80 per cent? Increase of taxation in India was not to be regarded as a mere financial question; it was a political question of the greatest moment. Lord Mayo had said that an increase of taxation would produce discontent, which would create dangers the magnitude of which could not be exaggerated. Before the Committee last Session Lord Northbrook was asked a question with reference to this statement, and he said that, after careful inquiries, he had come to the conclusion that Lord Mayo was right. He (Mr. Fawcett) asked for justice, not for generosity, for India. It was a most serious thing for the House to throw on India the entire expense of this war—at any rate, until the Government were in a frame of mind to suggest some different proposal. It might appear hard to suggest that additional burdens should be thrown on England when trade was bad, employment scarce, and thousands could not find the means of maintenance. He believed the depression of trade would continue for some time longer. It was hopeless to look for a revival of industrial prosperity in the midst of wars and rumours of wars, and at a time when no one knew what new entanglement or fresh complication tomorrow might bring. He represented a district (Hackney) upon which additional taxation would fall as heavily, if not more heavily than upon others. No one could suppose that the inhabitants of the East End of London were anxious for additional burdens; but grievously as they would feel it, they would sooner bear it than be exposed to the reproach that they were relieved of the expense of maintaining England's influence and character by the starving millions of India. The Government were certainly not pursuing a popular course; it was a course characterized by meanness and the absence of everything like generosity, and he believed it would be repudiated by every constituency in the Kingdom. India, it was said, should not be treated in that House from a Party point of view, and if he thought of it solely as a Party question he would not attempt to prevent the Government doing as they desired; but to maintain our position in India we must, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, be just and strong, but strength without justice was nothing but despotism. His only desire was that this question should be considered as one of strict justice, not of generosity to India, and on principles laid down by that distinguished statesman, the Leader of the Constitutional—not the Imperial—Party, the late Lord Derby—namely, that, if an Imperial war, the charge ought to be borne by England; if solely, or chiefly, an Indian war, the charge ought to be borne by India. If the charge was to be apportioned between England and India, then why did not the Government come forward and let the House know what portion England and what portion India was to bear? If Her Majesty's Government would not produce such an estimate, they would set Parliamentary control at defiance. It was stated the other evening by the Secretary of State for India that it was not necessary to consult his Council on the subject; and if the House were to pass this Resolution it would virtually give the Secretary of State for India power to draw to an unlimited extent on the Revenues of India for the purpose of carrying on this war. This was a question which involved one of privilege, and if the Supporters of the Government asserted that it was never intended to allow India to bear the whole expense, he hoped some Member on the front Opposition Bench would rise and assert the Constitutional principle that a war could not be carried on without some Vote of Supply. As far as they were given to understand at present, if the cost of the war did not exceed £1,200,000, the whole of it would be borne by India. Feeling that the proposal of the Government would be looked on throughout India, as it would be in England, as one which could not be defended on any considerations of generosity or justice, he would ask the House to reject it. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Amendment.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise to second the Amendment of my hon. Friend, not regarding it as a Party question, but still regarding it as of great importance with reference to Parliamentary and Constitutional interests. I likewise think it of serious moment as to the basis on which we are to deal with India. The Under Secretary of State for India assumed in his speech that the Amendment was to exclude India from paying any part of the ordinary expenditure on the Military forces employed in the expedition against Afghanistan. That certainly is not my understanding of the Amendment, and my hon. Friend (Mr. Fawcett) has now altered the wording of it so as to make it more clear and explicit on that point. Therefore, it should be understood by the House that the Amendment intends to object to the charge to India, on this occasion, of war expenses connected with the expedition against Afghanistan. Now, Sir, with respect to the Motion itself, I do not think the Under Secretary of State satisfactorily explained to the House the great importance of the Vote we are called upon to give. He has laid before us an Estimate, which he says is a very inadequate one, and one which I will say is a very sanguine one. He says that it was up to the 1st of April; but the Vote he calls upon us to give is not limited to the 1st of April at all. The Motion thus modestly proposed by him is a Motion by which the House is invited to part with its entire control over the direction of the war, and whatever expense is incurred in connection with it. I do not know why that most important aspect of the question was never presented to us by the Under Secretary of State. On another subject I hold that the statement of the hon. Gentleman, which had all the appearance of being clear, ought to be cleared up. It is as to the bearing of this expenditure upon the finances of India in their present condition. According to the figures given by the Under Secretary of State, I understand the state of the case to be this—He says he had a surplus of £2,000,000. Unhappily, owing to various circumstances, he now stands worse by £600,000 than he did at the time when he stated to the House that amount as the estimate of his surplus. So from £2,000,000 we have got to £1,400,000.

MR. E. STANHOPE: It was originally £2,156,000.

MR. GLADSTONE: But I think that by some preliminary amputation it was reduced to £2,000,000.

MR. E. STANHOPE: My original estimated surplus was £2,156,000. I then said it was likely to be reduced by the reduction of the salt duty to £2,000,000. Since then it has been reduced, by other circumstances, to £1,550,000.

Mr. Fawcett

MR. GLADSTONE: Out of that sum, as explained by my hon. Friend, £1,500,000 is pledged to a Famine Insurance Fund. My hon. Friend has, indeed, said that only £700,000 remains due to the Famine Insurance Fund; if so, it must be because he has already spent £800,000 upon famine. If so, out of what fund is my hon. Friend to pay the £900,000 which, according to his very sanguine Estimate, is to be the charge for the war down to the end of the present financial year? On the one side my hon. Friend has got to his credit £1,550,000. On the other side he has applied £800,000, and is to apply £700,000 more to the Famine Insurance Fund.

MR. E. STANHOPE: I did not give the exact figures. So far as I was able to give the result, I said there remained due about £700,000 out of this Fund of £1,550,000.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am aware my hon. Friend has said that £800,000 has been already spent, and that £700,000 will be expended. But if his surplus is £1,550,000, and he has already spent out of that £800,000—

MR. E. STANHOPE: It was spent on the Famine, before we had the surplus at all. In estimating the expenditure for the year 1878-9, I included £550,000 for the relief of Famine. It was only when the expenditure had been reckoned upon that we arrived at the surplus.

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friend states that £550,000 out of the £800,000 had been provided for. How does he make up his £1,000,000?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am very reluctant to rise again, but the questions are put direct to me. I can hardly explain the matter fully in this way. The difference is only something like £200,000, and I believe I can give the right hon. Gentleman a satisfactory explanation.

MR. GLADSTONE: I quite agree as to the inconvenience of trying to settle these matters by a discussion across the Table. Probably some Member of the Government will, as early as possible in the debate, give us the exact figures, so that those who follow me may precisely understand the situation.

I will not detain the House with any further remarks upon this part of the case; but I must say some words on the subject of the Act of 1858, under which it appears that Her Majesty's Government consider they are performing a legal and Constitutional duty. I stated on a former occasion that, in my view of the case, the Government had already broken the Act of Parliament. That is my clear and deliberate opinion. In my view, it was the purpose of this clause to require the preliminary consent of Parliament to the issue of Indian money for the purpose of operations carried on by the Forces charged upon India beyond the Indian Frontier, except in certain special cases which were very carefully defined. It was, in fact, to prevent the use of Indian money for military operations. I remember this, for I myself was the author of the clause; and the present Lord Derby, who was Secretary of State for India at the time, completely concurred with me as to its object. It is mistakenly supposed that an essential change was made in the operation of the clause by the House of Lords; but it was nothing of the kind. It was not so in my view, and it was not so in the view of Her Majesty's Government of that day, who communicated with me upon the alteration before it took place, and who obtained my consent. I strongly felt that to place the restraining power of Parliament on the question of finance was a far better mode of proceeding than to place it in the shape of an absolute veto upon the war, though the Act of Mr. Pitt had already limited the Prerogative of the Crown by a stringent prohibition going far beyond anything I ever proposed. The real truth of the case is this—that that clause, as regards its main purpose, has been completely destroyed by the action of Her Majesty's Government. I am not finding fault with the Government, as distinguished from the majority of this House; but I do say that the construction of the Government, which has been supported by the majority of the House, is a destruction of the clause, so far as the main purpose of the clause is concerned. Those who refer to the debates will find that there were evidently two objects in contemplation—one to prevent, under the new system, any undue charge upon the Revenues of India; and the object of the clause is not brought out into great prominence in the debate, because we certainly believed that we were reposing in the hands of the Indian Council far more effective checks upon Indian military expenditure than those checks have been allowed to become in practice. But the main object of the clause was to restrain the action of the Executive Government in using the Indian Revenues for military purposes. I will read a few words from a speech by the late Lord Derby in the House of Lords. He said—

"The same constitutional check, therefore, was imposed on the Crown with regard to troops serving in India which was imposed with respect to troops serving in every other part of the globe. If the clause were not agreed to, it would be perfectly competent for any unconstitutional Sovereign—or unconstitutional Minister—to employ the whole of the Revenues and troops of India for any purpose which the Crown might direct, without the necessity of going to Parliament for the advance of a single shilling."—[3 Hansard, cli. 1697-8.]

Clearly what Lord Derby contemplated was a preliminary consent. What is any consent but a preliminary consent? It is stated that—

"The Revenues of India shall not, in the case of the war now pending, be applicable to defray the expenses of military operations in Afghanistan."

But they have been applied, and their application has been in course of operation ever since this military expedition was ordered. What is the answer? "Oh! this is a temporary operation, and does not require, therefore, that they shall be permanently charged to the Indian Revenues." But the Act of Parliament says nothing about "temporary operations." It says "shall not be used to defray." What is the usual meaning of the term "defray"? I will refer the House to that question, which any modern political dictionary will enable us to answer. It can only mean one of two things—either as to the issue of the money from the Exchequer, or to its ultimate allocation by authority on the final account, and in this Act there is not the least doubt that it refers to advancing the money. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State states that the Revenues have not been applied to defray these charges. I see the hon. Gentleman shakes his head; but I should like to know have Indian monies been applied or not? In this case I think I am entitled to an answer to that question. The Act of Parliament says they shall not be applicable; and Her Majesty's Government and their Friends have their own construction of the Act of Parliament. I want to know whether they have been applied or not. It is a singular thing that on the most elementary points of knowledge it is sometimes very difficult to extract information. In my opinion, the issue of the money is the only rational construction of the word "defray." Therefore, I have not the smallest doubt that the Act of Parliament has been broken by the application which has taken place, to a large extent, without the consent of either House of Parliament. Let us observe the practical effect of this. It destroys by far the more important of the two modes in which Parliament can act against a war of which it does not approve. The object of the clause, according to my view, was to enable Parliament to prevent such a war. And prevention is the mode by which Parliament ought to operate in any war of which it disapproves. I do not recollect any war in which this country was engaged for many years without the consent of Parliament. I do not remember any case in which the Government has gone forward to so great an extent without being well assured of the consent of the nation and the sanction of the people. I know we are in a condition where it does not matter to the Government one rush whether we approve or not. If instead of a minority we were a majority, if instead of 227 we were 328, we should have no power to resist, because it would not be in our hands, except by the exercise of that which, happily, is not yet taken from the House of Commons—what may be done I cannot say—namely, a Vote of Censure of Her Majesty's Government. I frankly admit that their conduct in bringing the Indian troops to Malta has been completely covered by the votes of the majority of this House; but we are left in this predicament—when war has been declared we know we cannot stop the Supplies or order the stoppage of the war, so we are reduced to the unsatisfactory alternative of censuring the Government who made the war. It is not desirable that we should sit here passing Votes of Censure on the Gentlemen who form the Executive Government. What we want is the power to stop mischievous wars; and I maintain that the power which Parliament gave us by the Act of Parliament for this purpose has been taken away by the action of Her Majesty's Ministers, and the sanction given to that action by the present Parliament. The object I intend to state is plain and palpable. The Government is entrusted with the disposal of the Home Army, but in that disposal it is restrained by the Votes for the Army in this House and the passing of the Mutiny Act; but over and above this restraint a wise Government, and Tory Governments in the days when they were wise—or at least when they were wiser—thought fit to secure the concurrence of Parliament, as Mr. Canning did in the case of sending his troops to Lisbon in 1826. Such, then, is the predicament, that while as regards the Home Army the statutory and customary regulations which have been laid down, and which have been found to work well, in India you have an independent and extraneous Army, over which there is no statutory limitations whatever, except those which are imposed by the Indian Government Act. The 55th clause has now been rendered utterly null and worthless, so far as regards its main object, with reference to restraining the Prerogative of the Crown. When this question was under discussion in the House of Lords, in 1858, Lord Ellenborough pointed out that, under the old system, it was within the power of the East India Directors to plant their foot and to say—"We will not give you money for making such and such a war;" but, according to the practice which now prevails, that restraint, which was formerly embodied in the Charter of the Company, has now been removed. The powers of the Council for restraining military expenditure are utterly null and futile, and the power reserved to Parliament resolves itself into this—that after the thing has been done and the charge incurred, the Government come down and ask for sanction to an expenditure which it is a great deal too late to recall. But, although the main purpose of the law has thus been frustrated, and although the Government have now at their disposal anywhere, except in the United Kingdom—and God forbid that wars should be carried on in the United Kingdom, they have not been carried on for many centuries—according to their doctrines, the doctrine of this Parliament, and the doctrine of the Law Officers opposite, 180,000 men and a Revenue of between £50,000,000 and £60,000,000, totally free from antecedent Parliamentary control, and liable to be employed for purposes of which Parliament has no knowledge whatever, yet there remains this—that, when in the good and gracious pleasure of the Government they determine it is right to submit to us a Motion, under the 54th clause of the Act, we have something to consider of the case as it stands between England and India. And what is the case as it has been put by the hon. Gentleman. He says—"I am not at all asking you to give a final pledge as to the imposition of this charge. Anybody may, in perfect consistency with the Motion which I now ask you to adopt, come forward and propose that the charge shall not be borne by India, but shall be met, if the House is willing, out of British Revenues." He seemed to imply that it was open to the Government to make some proposal of that kind. Well, I think we are entitled to know whether, so far as the Government are concerned, this is a definitive proposal to lay the expenses of the war upon India; or whether it is a proposal to hold over the whole question until they may find it more convenient to make some final proposal on the subject? I say it ought not to be held over; there is no reason for holding it over. We ought to decide, and decide now, whether India or England is to bear this charge. But how does the doctrine of the Secretary of State suit the terms of the Act of Parliament? What is the meaning of the word "defray" in his Resolution? We consent to defray the charges of this military expedition. I presume that they have not been defrayed as yet. The whole doctrine of the Government has been in contrariety to the intention of the law that the word "defray" does not mean the first expenditure, but that it does mean the ultimate imposition of the charges. Then what does the Resolution mean? The hon. Gentleman says it does not mean the final imposition of the charge. Well, if I understand it correctly, it means nothing at all; because, according to him, it does not give a final consent to spending the money, and it does not give the prior sanction to advancing the money, because that has been done already. Now, I admit the force of what fell from the Under Secretary of State in regard to the very serious and grave nature of the question as to the payment of Indian wars out of Indian, or other than Indian, Revenues. We have hitherto had a tolerable understanding on the subject. Up to the time of the Indian Government Act the East India Company were the official and proper defenders—and they were not very ineffective defenders—of Indian interests in such matters. Since the Indian Government Act I do not know that there has been any case which the Members of the House would look back upon as a case involving matter of scandal or gross disagreement. In the matter of the Abyssinian War, what was done was done with the full consent of Parliament. I am not willing to lay down any new doctrine whatever with regard to the payment of Indian or Eastern wars out of Indian or British money. I look at this case simply and solely by itself, as it stands upon its own grounds, and to draw from it no authority or to establish by it any precedent, excepting a precedent applicable to an instance which might in every substantial and important particular correspond. The Under Secretary of State says—"India has a great interest in this war." India, indeed, has a very great interest in it, just as a man has a great interest in the gambling table, in which he ruins himself. India has a ruinously heavy interest, I am afraid, in this war. The Under Secretary of State considers that this war is beneficial to India. In that case I cannot be surprised that he should say India ought to pay for it; but he ought to say so plainly, and not come down to the House on the part of the Government, when hostilities have advanced to a certain point, and ask you to come to a certain Resolution which will satisfy the law, but leaving it an open question as to who is really to pay for the war. That is not the course—that is not the language—of a man who has a firm conviction on any part of the question. If he really believes that the Russian Mission was received by the Ameer under circumstances which gave it a hostile character, and that Shere Ali rejected the British Mission with insult, he ought not now to be shirking the financial question and difficulty of the day; he ought not to leave it to the future to be solved, but he ought to be facing it like a man, and telling us how the expenses of the war are really to be met. My opinion is a very simple one. I consider that this war is an unjust, a guilty, an unreasonable, and an impolitic war—one of mischief to the fame of England—one of mischief to the future of India. God grant that its scope may be limited, and its issues speedy! so that the range within which these condemnatory epithets are applicable may be as narrow as possible; but, with that view of the war, I find myself thus circumstanced—the Indian people have had nothing to do with this war; they are wholly guiltless; they wash their hands in innocence, so far as this war is concerned. They have no Representative here, or elsewhere. The very powers which the law once gave to defend them, when the East India Company existed, have either been taken away by Parliament, or nullified by the action of the Government and the vote of the House of Commons. Under these circumstances, seeing a war before me to which I am compelled reluctantly to attach such a character as that, I ask myself, can I bring myself to vote that the expenses of this struggle, which is wholly our act, shall be placed upon India? I say, "No;" and I will go freely into any assembly of Englishmen and tell them I say "No," and appeal to them whether they will not say "No" also. Nay, I am persuaded—such is my opinion of their generosity—that when they thoroughly understand the facts of the case, they will say distinctly that those who make the war should pay for the war. Those who make war for purposes, whether they be or be not Indian purposes, are the right persons upon whom should rest finally the charges. I am not surprised that there is a difference of opinion upon this subject. It is a very puzzling one. Sir, I have heard of some who are disposed to say—"We have made our protest against the war, and, having done so, we will not now proceed to place the burden of it upon the people of England." Yes; but we, the minority, unfortunately do not for the time—although some day, perhaps, we hope we shall—represent the people of England. The people of England have chosen a certain majority. They have chosen to constitute a certain Government, which has chosen to make a certain war entailing certain charges; but with the making of that majority and the making of that war the people of India had nothing whatever to do. It is the people of England who have had all the glory and all the advantage which have resulted from the destruction of the late Government and the accession to Office of the present Administration, and it is they who must take the pros and the cons, and who must be content, after having reaped benefits so immeasurable, to encounter the disadvantage of meeting charges which undoubtedly the existing Administration will leave behind it as a legacy to posterity.

Mr. Gladstone

Mr. Gladstone

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House is of opinion that it would be unjust that the Revenues of India should be applied to defray the extraordinary expenses of the Military operations now being carried on against the Ameer of Afghanistan,"—(Mr. Fawcett.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, that although the right hon. Gentleman had used extremely strong language with reference to the war in which we were engaged with Afghanistan, denouncing it as unjust and impolitic, a large majority of the House had declared it to be their opinion that it was a war both necessary and just, and which, if waged successfully, would result in very great advantage to India. That majority might, of course, be entirely in error, and that was the view of the right hon. Gentleman, who, no doubt, thought that if he had an opportunity of appealing from them to the constituencies he would be able to convince the country that they were wrong. But he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that he had already brought to bear on the subject all his great knowledge and ripe experience, and all the powers of his impassioned eloquence; that he had been supported by the forcible arguments of other hon. Members; and yet that the war had been pronounced by the House, as he had already stated, to be just and necessary. If that were so, he, for one, could not see how it could be considered unfair that India, which would be greatly benefited by the war, should be called upon to pay some portion of the cost of its prosecution. He had not, however, risen to discuss that point at all, because it hardly came within his sphere; and there were in the House hon. Members who were far more competent to pronounce an opinion whether it was right and proper that India should bear a part of the expenses of prosecuting the war or not. He rose chiefly for the purpose of combating the views which had been put forward by the right hon. Gentleman with respect to the construction of the Act of Parliament with which the House had now to deal. He at once admitted that there were difficulties in the construction of this Act, whichever way they looked at it, and that it was not easy to arrive at what the intention of the Legislature was in framing it; but this was true of many other Acts passed by both Conservative and Liberal Governments. However, he understood the contention of the right hon. Gentleman to be, that before the Revenues of India could be made applicable to defraying the cost of the war, the consent of the two Houses of Parliament should be obtained before the war began. [Mr. GLADSTONE assented.] He was glad to have stated the contention of the right hon. Gentleman correctly. Now, that was a contention which turned on the construction of the 54th and 55th sections of the Act, in the first of which it was set forth that when an order was sent to India directing the actual commencement of hostilities, the fact of such an order having been sent should be communicated to both Houses of Parliament within three months after the sending of the order if Parliament happened to be sitting, and, if not, within one month after it next met. Then came the second section, where it was stated that, except to prevent actual invasion, or to meet some other sudden and urgent emergency, the Revenues of India should not be made applicable to meet the expenses of a war unless with the approval of both Houses of Parliament. Taking those two sections together, it was impossible to say that they meant what the right hon. Gentleman had laid down. The Act contemplated the commencement of a war before Parliament could be, or need be, acquainted with the fact, and no war could be carried on without expenses being incurred day by day. Then if a war might be commenced before the fact was communicated to Parliament, expenses must have been going on from time to time up to the date when such a communication was made; and one would think that it would be almost necessary that some part of the cost of that war would have to be defrayed. If that were so, how would it be possible, he would ask, to obtain the consent of Parliament to that expenditure before the war commenced? A war might be begun when Parliament was not sitting and might be carried on for a considerable time before Parliament met; and yet it was contended that a single shilling of the cost could not be charged on the Revenues of India unless the prior sanction of the Legislature had been obtained. That appeared to him to be a completely erroneous view of the question. In his opinion, section 55 of the Act was quite as applicable to the case of ratification by both Houses of Parliament as to that in which the previous sanction of both Houses had been obtained. As the right hon. Gentleman was aware, there was a maxim in law, as well as in politics, to the effect that ratification dated back, and was equivalent to prior consent and direction. As in the present instance, if both Houses chose to consent by Resolution to a war being carried on that amounted to ratification, went back to the commencement of the war, and was equivalent to a prior direction by both Houses. He saw the difficulty presented by the right hon. Gentleman. Supposing a war had been waged some time and the Revenues of India had been applied to pay the expenses, and that when the Government appealed to Parliament both Houses refused to sanction such application, those who so applied them might, he admitted, find themselves involved in a difficulty. There was no doubt of that difficulty, which arose out of the construction of the Act of Parliament; but there was, on the other hand, a much greater difficulty if the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman were correct, and that was that if the necessity for war existed great disadvantage might result from not commencing it at once. The expediency of beginning it before Parliament could be consulted was, therefore, contemplated by the Legislature; and if it was to be so begun, the Government must depend upon the ratification of their act when Parliament assembled. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich disputed the construction put upon the Act by the Government and the Law Officers of the Crown; but he did not know that the Law Officers of the Crown had had much to say with respect to it. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken as if the Law Officers of the Crown had delivered themselves upon this subject on previous occasions. For his own part, he did not say that they had; but even if they had, it did not follow that any opinion they might have expressed was the right one. Then the right hon. Gentleman said that the Government might avoid calling Parliament together. But they could not avoid coming to Parliament unless they wanted to be turned out for something which was contrary to law and the Constitution; because they were obliged within three months of the commencement of hostilities, if Parliament was sitting, or, if not, within a month after Parliament was summoned, to come down and explain the whole business to Parliament, and get the consent of both Houses to their proceedings. For these reasons, although admitting that the right hon. Gentleman had with great ingenuity raised difficulties, and shown that there might be some inconvenience, yet he contended, with as much confidence as it was in his nature to possess, that the view of the right hon. Gentleman was not the correct one; but that the true construction of the two Acts of Parliament taken together was this—that the two Houses of Parliament might, by consent given after war had been commenced, ratify that which had been done, and that such ratification was equivalent to prior sanction.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, it seemed to him that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich would lead to the conclusion that the Prerogative of the Crown in declaring war must be either taken away altogether or practically annulled by making Parliament participate in it. The right hon. Gentleman had said that when war was declared without the knowledge of Parliament the only remedy was a Vote of Censure upon Ministers, and that this was utterly unsatisfactory. But this was the Constitution of the country. A Vote of Censure would be followed by removal from Office or impeachment. If those checks were not sufficient, a previous restraint would have to be put upon the Prerogative of the Crown. Parliament was not always sitting, and it might be of the utmost importance to declare war before it was possible to summon it; and, therefore, the Prerogative of declaring war had been vested in the Crown and its Advisers, subject to the ex post facto control of Parliament. This was a fundamental principle of the Constitution. Was the right hon. Gentleman prepared to bring in a Bill to deprive the Crown of the power of declaring war without the consent of Parliament? And, if so, what did he mean by Parliament? Was it both Houses, or one only? He ventured to say that the right hon. Gentleman would not dare to face such an undertaking, which would effect a fundamental change in the Constitution of the country. This, however, would be the logical conclusion to which his argument would lead. The right hon. Gentleman had dwelt upon the 55th clause of the Act of Parliament; but that clause supported the Constitutional view. It put a restriction upon the use of the Indian Revenue, and not upon the use of the Indian troops; and even with respect to the application of the Revenue, it did not insist upon a previous consent of Parliament. The consent of Parliament might be given afterwards, in which case it had a retrospective effect, and was equivalent to a previous consent. Rati habitio retro trahitur et mandato equiparatur. It was not a new thing, as the right hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose, for Indian Revenue to be so applied without the previous consent of Parliament. When the Indian troops were brought to Malta the expense was, in the first instance, borne by the Indian Revenue, although it was afterwards recouped by England. The right hon. Gentleman had said a great deal upon the meaning of the word "defray;" but it seemed to him that he had been in error. The word "defray" was not an advance or loan, but a final payment. It could not be said, for instance, that the expense of bringing the Indian troops to Malta was defrayed by the Indian Revenue, because it had been recouped by England. A portion of the money in the present war with Afghanistan had been paid out of the Indian Revenue without the knowledge of Parliament; but Parliament, he had no doubt, would consent to that which had been done, and this consent would be equivalent to an original authorization. But the expense had not been defrayed by India until it had been decided that the payment was a final one. It had been maintained by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) that the present war was an Imperial and not an Indian war, and therefore that it ought to be paid for by England. There was a certain amount of speciousness in that argument; but the hon. Gentleman had not laid down any distinct principle to guide them upon this matter. Doubtless this war had its Imperial aspect as undertaken for the preservation of the integrity of the Empire; but it was mainly an Indian war, and, as such, India ought to pay for it. Had this country been in a high state of prosperity, and a handsome surplus was to be expected at the end of the financial year, he should have had no objection, as a mere matter of generosity, to our having taken upon ourselves a considerable portion of the expenditure incurred for the purposes of the war. But, as matters stood, trade being in a very depressed state, and a deficit, instead of a surplus, looming in the future, we should not be justified in taking any additional burdens gratuitously upon ourselves. He considered there had been a want of reality in the debates that had taken place with reference to the war. The war was to be dealt with as a fact; but the causes were matters of history and political speculation. The true reason why the Opposition had refrained from moving an Amendment to the Address was because they felt that certain defeat must result from adopting such a course. The effect of the Amendment, if carried, must have caused our withdrawal from the war, which would have been a great discouragement to our Army, and have been positively disastrous to our rule in India. The hon. Baronet was proceeding to discuss the Law of Nations with regard to war, when—

MR. T. CAVE rose to Order, and asked whether the remarks of the hon. Baronet were applicable, as the question under discussion was who was to pay for the war, not whether it was justifiable or not. That question was discussed last week.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had gone at some length into the matter, and he was simply answering the right hon. Gentleman. He (Sir George Bowyer) argued that the right to send a friendly Embassy to discuss matters with a foreign State was an indefeasible right, resting not merely on authority, but on the interests of mankind and the interests of peace. The refusal of that right to us by the Ameer, while conceding it to a rival Power, clearly gave us a cause of war against him. He also contended that the allegation, that due time had not been allowed the Ameer to give proper orders for the reception of our Mission, was refuted by the evidence contained in the official Correspondence, as was also the charge that the Government had excited the hostility of Shere Ali by changing their policy. The policy of the Indian Government had not been changed, although there had been a change in the application of that policy, which was required by a material alteration in circumstances. The advance of Russia in Central Asia and her position in regard to Afghanistan had become so menacing as to justify Lord Salisbury in desiring to place British Agents not at Cabul, but in certain other parts of the Ameer's territory; and if those Agents had been received, they would not have interfered with the authority or the independence of the Ameer, but might have cleared up those difficulties between him and our Government which might, from time to time, have arisen. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) was very unfair the other night in his accusation against Lord Salisbury.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Baronet that in referring to what had taken place in a debate during the present Session of Parliament he was quite out of Order.

Sir George Bowyer

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he would bow to the Speaker's authority. It had been stated somewhere that Lord Salisbury had made use of the words "create an opportunity." What Lord Salisbury plainly meant was that, as a misunderstanding existed, an opportunity should be found or made for explaining matters and clearing away misconceptions. That was perfectly fair and honourable, and what anyone would do in private life, without being reproached with acting in a tortuous or improper manner. All who knew Lord Salisbury must be well aware that he could never have intended anything unfair, or anything that was not English and straightforward. He had no doubt the campaign would end successfully; and the question—a very difficult one—would arise, what were they to do then? It would require wisdom and statesmanship to solve that question; but he confidently hoped that the Government would reject all idea of annexation. To maintain an army in Afghanistan to keep in order its very unruly and warlike population, would cost us in men and money more than that country was worth. To make war for the sake of getting possession of part of a neighbour's territory would be unjust; but, being now at war—justly as he thought—we had a right to exact such conditions as would secure our Frontier and prevent the recurrence of danger in future. We might seek, he would not say the rectification, but the improvement of our Frontier. He deprecated a Frontier that would require an army of 100,000 men to guard it. What we wanted was possession of certain strategic points which, while encroaching very slightly on the Ameer's territory, would enable us with an army of 5,000 men to defend our Frontier. He trusted the Government would confine themselves to that, and would have every consideration for the Ameer, who had not shown himself to be a bad man in any way, and who had been placed in a difficult position between two great Powers. If they took that course, the end of that campaign would be "peace with honour."

MR. LAING said, that having been in India, and seen something of the real conditions of that mighty Empire, it was with sadness that he found two-thirds of the time in this discussion of a great question of policy taken up with dissertations on passages of Grotius and clauses of Acts of Parliament. He would endeavour to break new ground by calling attention to the political aspect of the financial question. As to this, he should like to quote some few opinions of eminent men on the subject. For instance, Lord Mayo said—

“The increased taxation which has been going on in India is producing a most serious amount of discontent, and this discontent, if continued, will be a danger, the magnitude of which can scarcely be exaggerated.”

That was not by any means a solitary instance. There was the opinion of Lord Canning, who said—

“Danger for danger, he would rather hold India with 40,000 men without an income tax than with 80,000 with one.”

Another authority on this subject was Lord Salisbury himself, who had said—

“The difference between England and India in matters of finance is this—that in England you can raise a large increase of taxation without in the least degree endangering our institutions, whereas you cannot do so in India.”

Were these statements true or untrue? If they were not true, let them be denied; if true, how could responsible statesmen—statesmen responsible for the fate of that great Indian Empire—totally overlook this point? Taxes in this case were so mixed up with other considerations of policy that it was difficult to separate them, and especially in poor States the political aspect was dominated by financial considerations. It was the financial difficulty in Turkey which paved the way for the other complications which followed. These were not mere theoretical considerations, for everybody who knew anything of India acknowledged that Native opinion in India, such as it was, had been more frequently and more warmly excited about finance than it had upon any other set of questions whatever. When in India, 17 years ago, he found the country in a ferment upon the subject of the income tax, and at the present time the country was wonderfully sensitive upon this question of finance. Only the other day when the licence tax was imposed, meetings were held in Bombay and Calcutta and strong feelings were expressed against that impolitic tax upon Native incomes. Only that day they had found that upon receipt of the intelligence of this Motion a Petition had been forwarded to the Government by the British Association, which represented the public opinion of Bombay, protesting that it was unjust that the cost of the war should be borne by India. The only species of taxation which had not excited public opinion in India was the salt tax; and the explanation of that was that it only pressed upon the poor, who were too feeble to make their cry heard. But when the Government talked about their surplus, they must remember that it was obtained by the imposition of an additional 40 per cent on the salt tax upon a set of poor wretches, in order to save their finance from absolute bankruptcy. It was necessary to look at Indian finance broadly; and looked at in that light, its present condition would be found to be one of extreme tension. The history of Expenditure in India since the time of the Mutiny showed that it gradually got ahead of Revenue until Lord Mayo went out, and he, by great effort, managed to restore something like a balance. Two great calamities, however, occurred—one was the recurrence of famines, and the other the depreciation of silver. The first caused an annual expenditure of £1,500,000, and the second a loss of £3,000,000, making thus £4,500,000 a-year to be provided for in a state of finance in which it was already difficult to adjust the balance. To show the extreme distress, he referred to the licence tax, and asked if any Government would have imposed a tax upon incomes of only 4s. a-week unless they had been in the greatest straits to find money? Did they suppose that, unless that was the case, statesmen of ordinary ability and of ordinary humanity would have done that? He wondered how Conservative Lancashire would like that state of things. The fact was the limit of taxation in India had been reached, and its revenue was singularly inelastic. As an illustration of how the taxation had been served up, he pointed to the fact that on the items of land, opium, salt, Customs, and direct taxation there was an increase from £24,000,000 sterling 20 years ago to £36,000,000 in the present. The land tax could not well be increased. As regards opium, that depended upon China; and as to the Customs, Manchester would not permit an addition; and he believed, if an addition were proposed, there would be such an outcry in this country that the Secretary of State would at once telegraph to the Viceroy to stop such a proposal being put into operation. When they came to direct taxation, no one without a knowledge of the country could imagine the jealousy and fright caused by a suggestion of inquiring into their private affairs. He remembered the case of a man who hanged himself from sheer fright on the receipt of an income tax assessment notice. The income tax was not only unpopular in India, but it would never produce more than £1,000,000. This all pointed to the necessity of economy; and he agreed with Lord Canning that it was better to decrease the army and be without an income tax than to increase the army and have an income tax. Economy meant military reduction; and, in his time, out of a saving of £5,000,000, £4,000,000 were effected by military reduction. Out of the £40,000,000 of regular Indian expenditure, £20,000,000 was a fixed charge, which could not be touched; and for the remaining £20,000,000, £15,000,000 or £16,000,000 consisted of the cost of the military. If they wanted to govern India satisfactorily to the people of India, and to escape the great and increasing political discontent which advanced in proportion with the spread of education, the advance of commerce, and extension of railways, that could only be done by following the course of Lord Canning in reducing taxation. It ought to be borne in mind that what was known in, and might perhaps suit, this country as an "Imperial policy" was altogether unsuited to the circumstances of India—he meant a policy of a showy, restless, sensational character. He believed that if India had been ruled by statesmen who knew India from having lived there, and whose only thoughts were for the good of the country, considered by itself, the present unsatisfactory state of things would never have sprung into existence. He was quite sure the licence tax would never have been necessary, and the salt tax might have been levelled down instead of levelled up. The expenditure on the Indian Army had increased by £2,000,000 since the time of Lord Canning, although the Army was 15,000 men less now than at that date. The removal of the troops to Malta—although the mere expense of their removal had been paid by this country—had necessitated a large Reserve. With respect to the present Afghan War, to what was it due? Would it have been likely to occur if the policy of masterly inactivity had been continued? He thought not. Lord Salisbury, however, reversed that old policy; but, for his part, he preferred a policy of masterly inactivity to a fidgetty, restless policy. They remembered the line of the poet—and he could not but think that the brave man in India who at the recent crisis would have stood still would have avoided taking measures to ward off a possible contingency to arise 15 or 20 years hence. He would not, after the lengthened debates that had taken place, go into the question as to the policy of the war. Her Majesty's Government told them that the war would cost this financial year about £1,200,000. Well, he had seen Estimates of two China Wars, and the Estimate for an Abyssinian War, and in every case the reality exceeded the original Estimate—not only twice, but four, five, and even six times. It was his opinion that the present war would show a like increase over the Estimate. The first step in the war now commencing involved an increase of the Native Army by 15,000 men, costing £270,000 a-year. That was a serious matter for a country suffering from financial distress; but it was a mere tithe of what would follow. He assumed that they did not intend to depart from the salutary rule which had been laid down by successive Viceroy, that for every two Natives added to the Indian Army they should add one European—or 60,000 Europeans as against 120,000 Natives; or, as at present, 7,500 Europeans to 15,000 Natives—to preserve the normal proportion. It was not, therefore, a question of £270,000 a-year; but it would involve one of £1,000,000 or £1,500,000 a-year. The policy of increasing the Native Army was a subject of great delicacy, which he would not dwell upon at length; but he could not help saying that the increase of the number of Native Troops, and the inspiring of them with a love of campaigning and military adventure, was, in his mind, the most dangerous policy they could pursue, having regard to the future interests of India. The Indian Army was just now, beyond all doubt, thoroughly well affected, and a large proportion of them were zealous in the matter of this war, for the Afghans were their ancient foes. But our difficulty in respect of the Native Army arose, not in time of war, but in time of peace. How was it, he asked, that they would not trust the Native Army with artillery? Everybody knew that we kept 60,000 European troops in India to guard against possible risks arising from the Native Army. By the policy now adopted, the Government were not only encountering the enormous dangers of political discontent arising from financial depression, but were also making more dangerous in the future that Native Army which had already shaken the Indian Empire to its foundations. What was the prospective result of the policy of the Government on the financial condition of England? He hoped sincerely that our troops would be speedily victorious, and that the war would soon terminate—as it only could—in the present Ameer, or some one placed in his stead, suing for peace. And on what conditions would peace be established? He supposed that the first condition would be the sending of an English Resident to Cabul, to be supported by an armed force. Seventeen years ago Lord Canning carefully considered the advisability of such a course, and had decided against it, on the ground that it would inevitably lead us into further interference with Afghan complications; and such action, if taken now, would practically mean an assumption of a Protectorate of Afghanistan. Then there would be a rectification of Frontiers; and so they would go on step by step, until they arrived at something very like an annexation of the country. Now, the hon. and gallant Member for Kincardineshire (General Sir George Balfour), who was a great authority on these matters, told them it would take 15,000 European and 35,000 Native troops to keep the country in time of peace, to say nothing of what they would have to do in the event of war with Russia, or, still worse, in the event of internal insurrections. But what did this mean? It meant bankruptcy for India? Was Afghanistan worth purchasing at that price? Was it worth while to go to so great an expense for the purpose of obtaining mere prospective contingencies? He was perfectly certain that if this question were to be decided in India by Indian statesmen, acquainted with the Indian public opinion, it would have been decided differently, and that this action had been forced upon India by Lord Salisbury. The noble Lord sent out Lord Lytton, an incompetent man, as diplomatist, who had had the worst possible training for such a post, to inaugurate his policy, and to do his bidding. He did not wish to deal with the political question; but, as a matter of fact, we were dealing with Russia in this war, and not with Afghanistan. There was, no doubt, a vast amount of dislike to Russia in this country; but it arose from other causes than the fear of a Russian invasion of India. Indeed, when we were on the point of going to war with Russia recently, Her Majesty's Government, so far from despatching troops to India to defend our present "unscientific" Frontier from invasion, actually brought troops from India to Malta. This dislike to Russia dated from the time when Russia was the advocate of absolutism and the soul of the Holy Alliance, opposing England everywhere as the champion of liberty and free thought, and checkmating her wherever she could. But in India the case was very different. He had the authority of the Prime Minister for saying that we might be very good friends with Russia there. The fear of Russia was not a plant of Indian growth. It had been planted and nurtured in England. The truth was, that we had been led into our present position with respect to Russia by the showy and sensational policy of Lord Beaconsfield. As far as India was concerned, our policy was to cultivate a good understanding with Russia; and having thus made sure of our Frontier, to devote ourselves to Indian internal reforms. But a different policy had been chosen. The Government were working up the vast Native distrust of Russia; and if it occurred to any poet of the future to write an account of the present time, he might, in imitation of the Horatian line—

Mr. Laing

"Then shrieked the timid and stood still the brave;"

"Quidquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi"—wind up with the following:—"The Jingo bluster and the ryots pay."

MR. SMOLLETT said, that at the commencement of the present year he had occasion to address his constituents at Cambridge, and he took the liberty of telling them that the recent victories of the Russians in Asia Minor and in Turkey, coupled with their advance in Central Asia, would at an early period lead to trouble, and the result which he had pointed out had taken place in Afghanistan. But he did not know at that time that the Russian Governor of Turkestan had engaged in vile and atrocious intrigues with Shere Ali, or that the latter had been estranged altogether from his English connection. The present position of affairs, therefore, if somewhat prematurely brought about, did not surprise him. Both Houses of Parliament having approved the policy of Lord Lytton by overwhelming majorities, the question now before hon. Members was, who should pay the piper? The war had been undertaken to punish the treachery of an Asiatic Prince, with whom the Government of India had entered into a friendly Treaty and a distinct alliance; and so long as the war was local—that was to say, confined to Afghanistan—he held that India should pay the entire cost of it. The Indian Exchequer, in his opinion, was amply sufficient to provide the requisite funds for a purely Afghan War, provided only that Indian finances were managed with anything like propriety, and that economy was enforced in every department of the Indian Government. That had not hitherto been done; but he hoped that the result of the present war would render it necessary. The debates in that House during the past week were, in his opinion, singularly dull and uninteresting. They were replete with personal attacks, and everything was said except what affected the real question at issue. It was repeatedly asked why we were engaged at war? and he did not think the question had ever been distinctly answered. [Opposition cheers.] He was prepared for those cheers; but he did not think hon. Gentlemen opposite would cheer him when he came to the end of his discourse. The causes of the war were not far to seek; and, as he was untrammelled by any official connection, he would tell them what they were. The war was not undertaken by Lord Lytton from any desire to acquire territory, or because Sir Neville Chamberlain was refused admission to Cabul. It was undertaken—first, because in July last the Russian authorities in Turkestan sent a Mission to Cabul well knowing that it was the settled determination of England to let no Power obtain a footing in Afghanistan except herself; second, because the Russian authorities, in sending that Mission, broke a solemn and honourable engagement; and third, because Shere Ali received their Mission, which he knew would give mortal offence to England, with a salute of 115 guns. In thus receiving the Russian Mission Shere Ali, in his opinion, courted his own fate. The war at present was local, and he hoped it would remain so; but if Russia interfered by sending men, arms, or ammunition to the Ameer, he trusted that England would come forward in her might to protect her Indian Dominions, and bring the Czar to a proper sense of his situation. The war had been described by hon. Gentlemen opposite as unjust and immoral because, it was said, Afghanistan was an independent State, and the Ameer was an independent Ruler who could choose his own society, who might hob-nob with a Tartar and insult a British officer. He denied entirely that Afghanistan could be called an independent State, in the true sense of that word. Afghanistan was a poor, impotent, weak, and sterile country; it was incapable of defending itself against foreign aggression by a strong Power; for many years the Ameer had admitted that he could hardly defend himself against domestic foes; and for many years, on account of his helplessness, he had been receiving subsidies of men, guns, and ammunition from the protecting State, for Afghanistan had been protected by the Indian Government. More than this, the Ameer had been importuning the Viceroy in India to protect his personal rule in Afghanistan against his own subjects; he had been demanding that our Viceroy should give him a guarantee that any son, heir, or member of his family he might designate should be acknowledged as his successor. For many years he had been importuning our Viceroy to ratify a Treaty, offensive and defensive, which should protect Afghanistan from invasion, and he had particularly pointed out that it was from Russia he expected to be invaded. Of late years every Viceroy had humoured this savage;

Lords Mayo, Northbrook, and Lytton had been ready to enter into engagements of that sort, provided only he would permit the Government which was thus to protect him to have officers stationed on the Frontiers of Afghanistan to see that he did not embroil himself and us in quarrels with other Powers. These demands were rational, modest, just; but the Ameer would not hear of such terms, and would give us no security at all. Neither Lord Northbrook nor Lord Lytton would concede his demands, and there was no change of policy at all, except that Lord Lytton went further than Lord Northbrook in humouring the Ameer, who every day became more insolent and morose. The only excuse for him could be that he was mad, and was not capable of ruling at all. At last he threw over the allegiance of Great Britain and allied himself with the Russians; and, of course, he must be brought to reason and submission. This would probably be done without any very great expense; it was likely that we should soon hear of the termination of the war, which he trusted would be short, sharp, and decisive, restoring peace to Central Asia and our Indian Dominions. It had been said that Shere Ali was the victim of a bastard Imperialism—a charge that was utterly absurd and perfectly ridiculous. Contrast the moderate treatment Shere Ali had received from the present Government with the insolent manner in which his father, Dost Mahomed, was treated, not many years ago, by a Liberal Government! Men spoke of a return to our traditional policy towards Afghanistan, as if this were our first expedition into that country, forgetting that our first entanglement occurred in 1838, when Lord Palmerston was the Foreign Secretary, and Sir John Cam Hobhouse, a noted Radical, watched over the interests of India as President of the Board of Control. At that time the nearest Russian station to Afghanistan was 3,000 miles distant, and our own territories were separated from it by a distance of 500 miles at least, and one would have thought there was very little danger in that direction; but the Liberal Government had authentic proofs in their possession that intrigue was rife in Cabul for the overthrow of British interests in India. Lord Palmerston thought that the intrigues carried on by Russian and Persian Agents must be counteracted, and he instructed the Government of India accordingly. The first step taken by Lord Auckland was to send a Mission to Cabul, selecting as its head Sir Alexander Burnes, of the Bombay Army, a man of very great ability and of uncompromising political integrity—a man, in fact, who was a great deal too honest to be a successful diplomatist, for diplomacy was a very rascally trade. The Ameer, Dost Mahomed, had no objection to receive an Envoy from any country on the face of the earth. He had at his Court a Russian Agent, and he professed to receive Sir Alexander Burnes with great friendship and much favour; in fact, Sir Alexander Burnes and the Ameer became fast friends. In every despatch sent to Calcutta Sir Alexander Burnes spoke of the Ameer in the best terms, and represented him as anxious for an English alliance, and as having no faith in the Russians. All he wanted was money, guns, and ammunition; but Sir Alexander Burnes was not authorized to give him anything more than moral support, and moral support did not go a very long way in Afghanistan. The last thing that Sir Alexander Burnes hoped for was that Dost Mahomed should be driven from his Throne; but Lord Palmerston and Sir John Cam Hobhouse were persuaded that he was a tool in the hands of Russia, and Lord Palmerston accused Sir Alexander Burnes of being beguiled by an Afghan Prince. Orders were sent out to dethrone him, and Lord Auckland carried them out with reluctance. It was necessary, however, to have some puppet to succeed to the Throne, and we selected Shah Soojah, who had been driven from it for incapacity, and was a fugitive at Loodiana. Lord Auckland sent an army with Shah Soojah to place him upon the Throne, and he was also given a guide, philosopher, and friend in Sir William M'Naghten, Chief Secretary to Lord Auckland. Our army marched to Cabul with very little opposition. Dost Mahomed fled to the mountains, was hunted down, and taken prisoner, and sent to Bengal. If he was an independent Sovereign that was very remarkable treatment for a Liberal Government. This was Imperialism with a vengeance. It was insolent and violent; it was characterized by what people now called Jingoism, which was attributed to the Conservative Party, Jingoism being, he believed, a cant word for ruffianism. This policy was not even successful. In the course of 18 months, when the British Army had been reduced in numbers, an insurrection broke out; the insurgents put Shah Soojah to death; Sir William M'Naghten was barbarously murdered; while our small Army, badly handled and treacherously led into mountain defiles, under promise of a safe conduct, miserably perished in the Jugallic Pass. Compare, therefore, the treatment which Dost Mahomed, the Ruler of Afghanistan, received from previous Governments—Liberal Governments—with the forbearance that was shown in the present day to Shere Ali. He left unnoticed the history of the second expedition to Cabul, undertaken by Lord Ellenborough to avenge the betrayal of the British Army, in 1842. He had introduced this matter mainly to show that these two campaigns, undertaken at the instance of a Liberal Administration, without the knowledge of Parliament, had cost, at least, £15,000,000, and that these charges were wholly borne by the Indian Government. No Liberal Member came forward then to ask that the cost should be charged to the English Exchequer, and yet that took place under the Liberal Government of Lord Melbourne. There was one other point on which he would say a few words. The arguments of hon. Members opposite, in discussing the conduct of the Government with regard to this war, had turned a good deal on alleged manipulation of official Papers. The right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had stated that the Papers produced had been manipulated in a manner and to an extent he had never known before. The right hon. Gentleman had, it appeared, a very convenient memory. He would, however, tell him of such a case. In the year 1861, when the right hon. Gentleman was Chancellor of the Exchequer, a Motion was brought forward about the trickery and falsification of official documents under Lord Palmerston at the Foreign Office. The Papers which were manipulated were the Afghanistan Papers. In 1840 the despatches of Sir Alexander Burnes were laid on the Table by the Foreign Office, in order to show that Sir Alexander Burnes had recommended the dethronement and deposition of Dost Mahomed, while he had always represented him in the best possible light. The fact was not discovered for 20 years afterwards, when the Papers were published as originally written. Then, in 1861, a Motion was made in the House of Commons by a Liberal Gentleman—Mr. Dunlop, Member for Greenock—inculpating the Government and denouncing the trickery. A Colleague of the right hon. Member for Greenwich—the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright)—supported Mr. Dunlop, and showed that the Papers had been grossly falsified, and denounced the forgeries. A division was taken on the question, for the manipulation was not and could not be denied. He had voted for that Motion on the 19th of March, 1861; but he would undertake to say that the right hon. Member for Greenwich did not vote for it, although the Papers were strangely falsified. In conclusion, he begged to say he would support the Motion of the Under Secretary of State for India, that the whole expense of this war should be charged to British India.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he had been struck with the change which had come over the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite. Last week when they were endeavouring to rouse the war feeling of the House, the war was one undertaken to maintain the prestige and integrity of the Empire. This week, when it had become a question of paying the bill, it was a war waged to punish an Asiatic Prince and to protect an Indian Frontier. Speaker after speaker last week had concluded his speech by appeals to the honour and patriotism of Englishmen. What had become of their honour and their patriotism to-night? It was very easy to be patriotic at other people's expense. He could not conceive anything more delightful than to cut open one's newspaper in the morning and to read of the brilliant achievements of our troops, and to feel all the time that come what might our own pockets were perfectly safe. It reminded him of that patriotic individual—

“ Mr. Brown, who of his great bounty, Built a bridge at the cost of the county.”

Now a word about the Act of Parliament. He had no doubt that the letter of the Act required that the Government should obtain the consent of Parliament before doing what they had done; for the consent of Parliament was made a condition precedent to the outlay which it was admitted had been made. If so, could they doubt that there had been a breach of the law? But if they turned from the letter to the spirit of the Act, was it not plainly the object of the section to preclude the possibility of applying Indian Revenues to Imperial objects? But the war had been described, over and over again, as an Imperial war, the outcome of events in Europe—a war, according to one hon. Member, as Russian as the Crimean War itself. It might be true that, thanks to a Revenue swollen by the most nefarious traffic which the world ever saw—the opium traffic—and thanks also to the stoppage of their public works and to their having trenched upon the Famine Fund, which they had pledged themselves to maintain, they had this year something which the Under Secretary of State called a surplus in India. But during 16 out of the last 20 years they had had not a surplus, but a deficit. And to whom did that surplus belong? Why, it belonged to the people of India. What did we do in this country when we had a surplus, or rather, what had we done when we had had one, for unfortunately surpluses with us had become matters of history? Why, we gave it back to the taxpayer in the shape of a remission of taxation. Were there no taxes to remit in India? Had hon. Members forgotten the salt tax, that dire impost on the first necessity of life, which, within the memory of men who were but lately living, had produced the most terrible revolution which the world ever saw? He had lately read an article in The Nineteenth Century, entitled The Bankruptcy of India, and if one-tenth of what the writer stated was true, the ryot of India was the most heavily-taxed person on God's earth. The writer said—

"The natives say, and have said for years, that, as a whole, life has become harder since the English took the country. They are right; it has become harder, and will become harder still if we proceed on our present lines. They say also that the taxation is already crushing. That is true too; and it has become yet more crushing in this present year. There is evidence enough already and to spare, while we are staggering on with our committees and commissioners to a catastrophe which, unless facts and figures utterly lie, will be unequalled in the history of the world. When poverty-stricken cultivators in one part of India are taxed—permanently taxed—to support famine-stricken ryots in another, who in their turn are to be taxed again for the like service, the whole country being drained all the while by enormous military charges, home charges, interest, remittances, and loss by exchange, it needs no great economist, no far-seeing statesman, to predict that a crash is inevitable. The famines which have been devastating India are, in the main, financial famines. Men and women cannot get food, because they have not been able to save the money to buy it. Yet we are driven, so we say, to tax these people more."

It was said that this was to be a cheap war; but no war could be called cheap until it was over. Let them look for a moment to the future. The Under Secretary of State for India had laid it down that without a "strong and friendly" Afghanistan, there could be no peace or prosperity or retrenchment for India. Did they make men friendly by burning down their villages and shooting their fellow tribesmen? Recollect that an Afghan never forgets. He was the most Oriental of Orientals, the most vindictive of men. They were sowing the seeds of a blood feud which might survive to remote posterity. Then did they think that the war would give them a "strong" Afghanistan? Why, one thing was quite certain—that the war would destroy even the semblance of Government which Shere Ali had established, and hand the country over to anarchy and rapine. What would they do then? Could they stop where they were? Would they burn their fingers with another Shah Soojah? Why, in mere self-defence, they would have, in some form or other, to occupy Afghanistan; for, if they did not do so, they might be sure that Russia would do it. But how was the cost of the occupation to be met? They did not suppose that Afghanistan, like Cyprus, would be "self-supporting." The brother of an hon. Friend of his who sat in the House—one of the few survivors of the Afghan War—had described the country to him as a limestone desert peopled—as far as a desert could be said to be peopled—by the greatest scoundrels on the earth. Now, scoundrels and deserts were not, as a general rule, self-supporting; and it was this prospective expenditure, calculated by Sir Erskine Parry, in his very able protest, at between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 a-year, which, of course, would be thrown wholly on the Indian Revenues, which rendered it especially hard to charge the whole of the burden of this war—for that was the Motion before the House—upon that country. He was as much averse to increasing the burdens of the country as any man in that House. He had voted on every occasion since he had entered it in favour of reducing those burdens. He believed that one great cause of the depression, which had invaded every industry in the country, was the reckless additions which the present Government had made to the military expenditure of the country. But when it came to wringing their last anna from a population which only the other day were dying by millions for want of the price of a handful of rice, in order to pay for our wars, he felt inclined to exclaim with Marcus Brutus in the play—

“By Heaven! I would rather coin my heart, And drop my blood for drachmas, than to wring
From the hard hands of peasants, their vile trash
By any indirection!”

Talk of a “shabby war!” What were they to say of the mode of paying for it? Let them not forget that the people of India were in an exceptional position. Alone among the dependencies of the British Crown they had not even the semblance of representative institutions. They had not even liberty of speech. We had gagged their Press. They were as dumb as the sheep before his shearer. To whom, then, were they to look for protection? Was it to Viceroy and Financial Secretaries and that knot of highly-paid European officials to whom increase of territory meant increase of patronage, increase of promotion, and increase of pay? No! it was to the British House of Commons, who were not only the Representatives of the free and generous British nation, but the duly appointed and accredited guardians of the people of India, that they alone could look for help; and it was under a deep and full sense of the responsibility thus imposed upon him that he, for one, would never consent to claim for the richest and strongest country in the world the glory and the gain of this war, and to leave the burden and the cost to be borne by the poor starving ryots of the Deccan.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT thought the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) would have done better if he had not made out so extreme a case. When talking of the sufferings of the people of India from famine, he forgot to mention the liberality that had been shown by the people of this country to those famine-stricken people. The hon. Member looked upon this altogether as a question which ought not to affect the expenditure of India; but he and hon. Gentlemen on the other side had forgotten to tell the House what they would have done in the circumstances in which the Government were placed. Considering that Russia had an Envoy at Cabul—that Envoy being an European—and that it was because our Envoy was an European that he would not be received, he did not think any hon. Gentleman would say that Russia ought to have a predominant influence in Afghanistan. That was the question which had been settled last week. It was settled then that there was nothing this country would not do that Russian influence should not prevail in Afghanistan. Therefore, though, in the first place, this might be an Indian question, it was an Imperial question also. He would venture to ask the Government to look at it in its broadest point of view; because, though the Russians had tried to get their Agents into Afghanistan and to have supreme influence there, they would not have done so at so early a period had it not been for complications in Europe. We should not forget why Russia had an Envoy at Cabul, and why she was marching an army in three columns on Afghanistan. It arose, no doubt, from the possibility, nay, at that particular time, from, he might say, the probability, of war with Russia, and also from our bringing certain Indian troops to Europe. Look at it as we might, we must acknowledge that this war would not have occurred had not these complications in Europe arisen. If that were true—and no one in that House would deny it—he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to state distinctly that they would consider the matter in a fair and candid spirit, and would ask this country to bear its fair proportion of the expense, leaving only that portion which India ought justly to pay to be borne by the Indian Revenues. Some hon. Gentlemen seemed to think that India should pay nothing; but it should not be forgotten that, in the first instance, this war was undertaken to protect the Indian Empire. The House had heard of Shere Ali sulking, but why should England think about sulking Afghanistan? Shere Ali had been faithless to this country, and the Ruler of Afghanistan, be he who he might, ought to be thoroughly under our control. He hoped, whatever might be the result of this war—and no one could tell where the war might extend to—the country would recollect that it had to deal with Russia, and that we ought to have some absolute and definite Treaty, and not trust to Russia's words and promises. England must know how far Russia was to be allowed to advance, and would then be able to decide where we were to stop. He believed Russia would never cease to advance until she found herself face to face with British sentinels. In conclusion, he said, he felt that only a little pressure was required to induce the Government to place a fair proportion of the cost of the war on this country, and a fair proportion on India.

Mr. Osborne Morgan

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he might have been surprised at the sanguine statements of the Under Secretary of State for India were it not for the fact that Under Secretaries were always sanguine. India had never paid its way, but had always borrowed its way, and was continually adding to its Debt. The House was always told that there would be a surplus in India if something did not happen; but something always did happen. The something, in the present instance, was the war against Afghanistan. He had not determined to support the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) without some hesitation. He could not support him on the general grounds he had alleged, for he (Sir George Campbell) was one of those who thought the interests of the mother country ought to be considered in her relations with India and her Colonies; and that the cost of all wars, great and small, ought not to be thrown upon her on the ground of Imperialism. In some wars England must pay, and in others India should. He was prepared to say that if the matter had been fairly dealt with, and a fair representation allowed of the interests of India in this matter, he should not have voted with the hon. Member. But after mature reflection he was prepared to vote with his hon. Friend, for this reason—that India had not been fairly treated in accordance with the law, and the interests of India had not been fairly represented. He was inclined to throw the expense incurred upon England, for much the same reason that the damage caused by the Alabama was thrown on England. The Government and Lord Lytton in this respect stood, in his eyes, in the same culpable position as the shipbuilders of Liverpool, and the Law Officers of the Crown did in the Alabama affair, and we must be responsible for them. He believed that the fault was chiefly the Viceroy's, and that, with the exception of the clear breach of the 55th section of the Act of 1858, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had pointed out, the Government at home had kept within the limits of the law, though it was a bad law. The law of 1858 had emasculated the Council of India so far as they were the custodians of the finances of India, for it enabled the Council to be completely overridden in practice. The Council of India having been emasculated, in this House the interests of India did not evolve great interest, except when important Party or personal concerns were involved. Towards the close of last Autumn, when we sent a Mission to the Ameer, there was an evident foreshadow of the war that was now progressing; but, unfortunately, the matter was not then discussed in that House as it ought to have been. But, however the Liberal Leaders had been wanting on former occasions, he was glad to acknowledge that the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition had spoken out like a man with reference to this war. The noble Lord had not flinched from the right issue, and it was not very doubtful what the result of an appeal to the country would be. He quite agreed with the noble Lord's remarks on Lord Lytton's conduct in India. The appointment of Lord Lytton as Governor General, he was willing to admit, was honestly made; but he believed he expressed the opinion of every man connected with India, when he said that that appointment was a failure, and the first step towards the peaceful solution of the difficulty would be to substitute a capable man, on whose judgment and discretion more reliance could be placed. The presence of Lord Lytton in India constituted a grave danger to this country. It was difficult to apportion the blame rightly between the Government and Lord Lytton in recent transactions, many Papers necessary to the elucidation of this matter being conspicuous by their absence. From all that he had learnt from India he was disposed to believe that Lord Salisbury had, as a matter of fact, restrained Lord Lytton, and that a very large portion of the blame which he was disposed to lay at the doors of the Government took the form rather of their being responsible for the appointment of that noble Lord as Viceroy than of any direct attempt on the part of Lord Salisbury to do all that had been attributed to him. When Lord Salisbury came back from Constantinople he found Lord Lytton was straining at the leash, and trying to go farther than the Government would allow him. Lord Lytton had been subsequently loud in his complaints that Lord Salisbury would not sufficiently support him. Lord Lytton managed, however, to force the hands of the Government, the Cabinet being divided between the Leaders of the Jingoës, and such prudent men as the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He felt, he might add, bound to protest against the idea which had been broached, among others, by the Under Secretary of State for India—that we were to suppose that country was more contented, because of the inspired telegrams which had been received with respect to the loyalty of the Indian Princes and troops. No man practically acquainted with Oriental customs could be misled by anything of that kind. He was quite willing to believe that the conduct of the Government had not yet succeeded in alienating them; but it was not safe to conclude, from those inspired manifestations, that Lord Lytton had been a successful Ruler in our Indian dominions. In the Mutiny the Native Chiefs rendered loyal service, and he believed they would do so again; still, he warned the Government that it was not the Native Chiefs that first offered their assistance who were most to be trusted. His impression was that some of the Native Princes, struggling to increase their armies, would be delighted to aid us in this war while we were prosperous; but they might possibly turn against us if unhappily we incurred disasters. As to our military successes, he would say that, although he did not believe we had many troops of the first quality in India, yet there were, in his opinion, a certain number who could do the work in which they were now engaged—or, indeed, any work—as well as the best troops in the world. The House had, however, been informed that evening that the correspondents who attended the Army were only the approved correspondents; so that they were not, perhaps, to be relied upon for telling the whole truth; and he had noticed that morning certain remarks about suffering among camp followers, which showed that everything was not of that coulour de rose which some persons seemed disposed to imagine. There was another point of very great importance to which he wished to call attention. On looking at the Correspondence, he found that the despatches from home were generally addressed—and rightly so—to the Governor General of India in Council. There was, however, a despatch of February 28, 1876, which was not so addressed, but addressed to a person not known to the law—the Governor General, without his Council. He would not demand the head of Lord Salisbury for this; but he wished to say he considered it a gross illegality. The Viceroy, on the receipt of that despatch, had concealed it from his Council; but had acted upon it all the same, telling the Council that he had the authority of the Queen's Government for sending an Envoy into Cabul. That was a very important step, for no Mission had gone there since the year 1841. From a Minute of the 19th of June, it was clear that the Councillors had been discussing the absence of Instructions at that time before the despatch of February 28 was shown to them. The Council had been kept in the dark, so that Lord Lytton was able to establish a personal rule, which was the cause of all our troubles. From that time he had acted, not through the usual channels of communication, but by agents of his own; indeed, the Papers in the Blue Book contained no mention of any Member of the Council of the Governor

Sir George Campbell

General, but chiefly of Colonel Pelly and Colonel Burne, as the advisers of the Governor General. The result of that policy of personal government was the resort to mischievous activity and coercion of the Ameer which had been attempted. As for the position of Russia, he, for one, was inclined to deprecate the strong language that had been used with respect to her on that side of the House, but he was far from trusting to Russian assurances. He would mention a Paper in the Central Asian Blue Book, in which they would find a very important despatch from Lord Augustus Loftus, our Ambassador at St. Petersburg. This despatch was dated September 27th, 1878, and explained the views of the Russian Government with regard to the Russian Mission to Afghanistan. It seemed strange that the Government should have taken the House so far into their confidence as to publish it, without giving something more, for it contained an assertion of the Emperor's right to send such a Mission if he pleased. That was a claim on the part of Russia to which we certainly could not submit. His view, however, was that Russia's action in this matter might to some extent be justified by the excessive partisanship of our Government with regard to the whole course of the Eastern Question. He believed there was no Oriental Power on which we could place less reliance than on Russia—but at the same time we ought to deal fairly by Russia; he thought we had not done that, and that Russia was to a certain extent justified in the reprisals she had made. In his opinion, the great blunder the Government had made was in exhausting all their energies in aiding the Sultan to re-enslave the unhappy Bulgarians. If we had pressed Russia a little less with regard to Bulgaria, we might easily have made an arrangement with her to prevent this interference with Afghanistan. Russia was not likely to go to war on the question of Afghanistan; she only wished to induce us to coerce the Turks to carry out the Treaty of Berlin. Until a settlement had been made with regard to lines of demarcation in Central Asia as well as in Europe, Her Majesty's Government would not have achieved peace, honour, or safety. He was prepared to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney, but only on this special ground—that the Government had in his opinion broken the law and the Constitution in regard to India, and had rendered themselves responsible for what had occurred. He did not agree with the hon. Member for Hackney that a great saving could be effected in the Indian Army, which was as small as our great interests in India permitted it to be, and the Government were of the same opinion, for they had recently decided to increase it by 15,000 men. The 55th clause of the Act of 1858 was not the only one that had been treated unsatisfactorily by the Government. Their conduct was also open to question with regard to the 41st section, which provided that the Indian Revenues were not to be expended either in India or elsewhere without the consent of the Council. That provision had been completely overridden by successive Secretaries of State, and no satisfactory explanation of their conduct had been given. It was impossible to estimate the ultimate cost of the war from the expense that had already been incurred, because the Government had hitherto been using up their accumulated stores, the value of which was not taken into account. He believed that if it should be unhappily necessary to conquer Afghanistan the cost would have to be counted, not by hundreds of thousands, but by millions. His advice to the Government was to make peace as soon as possible, before the contest had been embittered by too much bloodshed and by too far an advance into Afghan territory. Her Majesty's Government had succeeded in making a certain advance into Afghanistan and in frightening the Ameer, and would be able to make peace speedily, provided they did not make their terms too stringent. The basis upon which peace should be made was, that the Ameer should consent to receive our Mission with every formal parade in his capital, that he should engage never to receive another Russian Mission, and that he should only communicate with Russia for the future through ourselves. We ought to be paramount and supreme in Afghanistan in comparison with Russia, but in no other sense, and we should bear in mind that the Afghans were a nation of soldiers whose subjection would be very difficult. The Prime Minister had spoken of the rectification of our Frontier.

Men of the greatest experience were entirely opposed to our taking possession of the defiles and passes of Afghanistan. But there was one rectification of Frontier which we might make without breach of faith and by keeping within our right. He alluded to the position of Quetta. He had never committed himself about the occupation of Quetta; but he thought they must either put a stronger force than they had there, or withdraw it altogether. Inasmuch as we had already gone so far, and we had now the right to maintain a force at Quetta, the right thing to do would be to establish ourselves there, constructing a railway, and making the place a base of operations both in a political and a military sense. He would not recommend, as General Hamley recommended, the occupation of Candahar, which would be completely inconsistent with the maintenance of a great Afghan State. With regard to the attempt to impose European Residents on the Ameer, in India a European Resident in a Native State was always regarded not as an Ambassador, but as a man who overlooked and over-rode the Native State. That was the light in which the Ameer and the Afghan people viewed a European Resident, and they could not persuade them to the contrary. Moreover the absence of a European Resident did not imply, the absence of diplomatic communication altogether. We had had a regularly equipped Mission in Afghanistan, of which the members were Natives. The Afghans were ready to admit as many Native Missions as we liked; but it would always be a source of extreme embarrassment if we insisted on their receiving European Residents, whom they regarded as supervisors who were imposed on them. He thought the demand that they should receive them was uncalled for and unreasonable. With respect to Merv, it was separated from Herat by a great mountain chain. The real road was through the Meshed district in Persia. There was only one demand of that sort which we should make. We should ask permission to keep a Mission at Balkh. In conclusion he earnestly trusted that in any arrangements which might be made, the Government would be indulgent towards the Afghans and would remember the provocation which they had received, otherwise they would never have peace in that country.

Sir George Campbell

Mr. J. G. HUBBARD wished to appeal to the Government to extricate him from what appeared to him to be a considerable difficulty. Anxious as he was to vote for Her Majesty's Government, he could not vote for the Resolution proposed by the Under Secretary of State for India. The hon. Gentleman would pledge himself only within a considerable margin, and had endeavoured to show that the words of his Resolution were merely a protection by Act of Parliament to the proceedings of the Indian Government, and were required to put the action of the Indian Government upon a Constitutional basis. It appeared to him that the words of the Resolution meant a great deal more. The words as they stood bound the House to consent to the Revenues of India being applied to defray the expenses of Military operations which now were, and could be, carried on beyond the external Frontier of Her Majesty's Indian territory. The words further imported that the whole of such expenditure was to be defrayed, and it must be paid by the persons who defrayed it. Therefore, the Indian Government was to be at the costs and expenses of the present expedition. That was the logical interpretation of the words as they stood. If that were not the correct interpretation, he would be glad if the Government would say so. It had been said that the Indian Revenue showed a surplus; but that was no reason why this war expense should be put upon it. To judge whether the expense of sending an expedition into Afghanistan should be placed upon the Revenues of India it was requisite to keep two considerations in view. First, who made the expedition? and, secondly, who profited by it? He did not wish to trust to his own judgment on these questions, but would quote the opinions of Members of the Indian Council. A Paper was circulated on Saturday signed by five Members of the Indian Council, and they all concurred that the war in Afghanistan was a part of the Imperial policy of this country, and could only be ascribed to the action of our own Government. With regard to the particular point as to the incidence of the charge for the Army, there was a difference of opinion. Three Members of the Council—Sir Erskine Perry, Sir Robert Montgomery, and Sir Barrow Ellis—thought that none of the expenses should be borne by India; while Sir William Muir and Mr. Dalryell considered that some portion of the cost, at all events, should be defrayed by this country. Those gentlemen were, from their experience and position, capable of forming an intelligent and independent opinion on the subject; and he felt himself fortified in his own convictions that the whole charge for this expenditure ought not to be thrown upon the finances of India. He looked with a great repugnance upon a division of the interests of India and England. There ought to be no difference of interest between them; India was so integral a portion of the possessions of this country that what were her interests ought to be ours, and what was her prosperity ought to be ours also. Her finances should be husbanded with the same vigilance and administered with the same economy as those of Great Britain. There was yet another matter that should be remembered, and that was that India had a separate organization for taxation from this country, and that any increase in her expenditure would have the effect of increasing burdens which already pressed heavily upon her. It was because he believed India was very heavily taxed at the present time, that he demurred to any increase of that taxation by throwing upon her a portion of the expenditure to be incurred in this war. He would appeal to Her Majesty's Government to give an assurance that the extraordinary expenses of this expedition should not necessarily be borne entirely by India; but that they should be treated as expenses incurred by the Home Government, to be shared between India and England. If Her Majesty's Government would give him that assurance, he would vote for the Resolution, which he would then take to mean nothing more than that India was, in the first instance, to advance funds.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR, remarking that several hon. Members on his side of the House wished to take part in the discussion, moved the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Lyon Playfair.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I had hoped earlier in the evening that it would have been possible to close this debate to-night; but I can entirely recognize the justice of the observation of the right hon. Gentleman, and I feel that the matter is one of such great importance to others, besides ourselves, that it would be undesirable that the debate should be, so to speak, huddled up; therefore, I will consent to the Adjournment to-night. I do not wish at the present moment to enter into any discussion of the arguments; but to prevent misunderstanding, it is as well that I should say, in answer to the question of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Hubbard) as to the intention of the Government in this proposal, it is not intended that the whole of the expenditure of the military operations should necessarily be thrown on the Revenues of India. That will be a matter for consideration; and I think it will be undesirable to attempt to lay down any rigid principle as to the amount of aid which the Imperial Exchequer should give till we know a little more of what the war is likely to cost. I wish to explain that it is not intended that India should bear the whole of the expenditure.

MR. CHILDERS wished to make a suggestion which he thought of some importance. In the course of the debate that evening the Under Secretary of State for India had quoted part of a very important telegram in relation to the finances of India. Certain figures were given which had a very important bearing upon the present financial position of India, as compared with the Budget Statement. He wished to ask whether, under these circumstances, as this telegram had been referred to in debate, the Government could have it printed and placed in their hands by 4 o'clock the next day. Considering the extreme importance of knowing exactly what was the financial position of India, he hoped the Government would not make any objection to the production of the document.

MR. BULWER observed, that he did not understand that the proposal of the Government was that either the whole cost of this war, or any definite portion of it, should certainly be defrayed out of the Indian Revenues; but they only asked at the present time that the decision as to what portion, if any, should be defrayed out of the Indian Revenues, and what portion out of the Imperial Exchequer should be left to them. He had listened with surprise to many speeches which had been delivered that evening, and many of them, it seemed to him, might very well have been delivered in the preceding week. He could not understand what the finances of India had to do with the question now before the House. It seemed to him that the decision of the amount to be paid by the Indian Revenues should, for the present, be left with the Government. The House had not before it the materials to decide that question, and were only asked now to settle the principle that the Indian Revenues should, if the Government deemed it necessary, contribute to the expenses of the war. Surely the House was not going to say that the whole expense must necessarily be borne by the Imperial Exchequer.

MR. HERSCHELL said, that no doubt his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Bulwer) would be quite content to take the decision of Her Majesty's Government upon the question of paying the sum out of the Indian Revenues, or upon any other question. But those sitting on that side of the House were not so willing to leave the matter in their control. Up to the present time the Government had not pledged itself that any portion of this expenditure should come out of the Imperial Revenues. According to the terms of this Resolution it would be in the power of the Government to throw every penny of the expenditure upon the Revenues of India.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the real question was, whether the Government considered that, under the circumstances of this war, they had by law any right to apply the Revenues of India in payment of the expenditure incurred for it? He did not go into the question, because the debate was to be adjourned; but perhaps he might say that it appeared to him to be a very grave Constitutional question, whether, under the circumstances of this war, and considering its nature and character, the Government was justified in throwing the expenditure for it upon the Indian Revenues.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON hoped that it would not be understood that hon. Members were debarred on this Motion, by any supposed understanding, from questioning the policy of Her Majesty's Government in undertaking the war. It appeared to him that the debate raised the question of the whole policy of the war.

Mr. Bulwer

MR. E. STANHOPE observed, that he did not quote from any one particular telegram. The India Office had been in frequent communication with the Indian Government recently, and several telegrams had passed between them. If in any one of the telegrams there were facts which they could fairly put before the House, he had no doubt the Government would be able to assent to what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) proposed. Having regard to the form of the telegrams, so far as he remembered there was nothing which could be laid upon the Table of the House.

MR. CHILDERS asked, whether, if that was so, the Government had any objection to give the House the substance of the financial information which they had received?

MR. FAWCETT rose upon a point of Order. The Under Secretary of State for India, in his opening remarks, had made certain statements with regard to Indian finances from private information derived from telegrams. He had always considered it to be the rule that Ministers were not allowed to quote from documents which were in their possession, and not in that of hon. Members, without producing such documents, in order that they might be compared with the statements made. It was absolutely impossible for them to arrive at any clear opinion on this matter, however anxious they might be with regard to the position of the Indian finances. The Secretary of State for India, on Monday last, made certain statements as to the Indian finances, and then the Under Secretary, without presuming to lay a single document on the Table, came down to that House and stated that he had received a series of telegrams, the effect of which, as he understood, was to reduce the anticipated surplus of Monday last from £2,100,000 to £1,500,000. He wished to ask, whether it was not the invariable practice that, in financial debates, Ministers should lay upon the Table of the House the documents from which they quoted?

MR. SPEAKER: The practice of the House is, that if an official document is quoted by a Minister it shall be laid before the House. At the same time, if the public interest should be opposed to that proceeding, that would be accepted by the House as a reason for withholding the documents.

MR. E. STANHOPE thought the hon. Member for Hackney was somewhat mistaken as to the effect of the telegrams referred to. They had received a good many telegrams on the subject, and there had been some difficulty in working out exact amounts, with the figures supplied from India in addition to those already known at the India Office; but the work had been done with the greatest possible industry and care. He did not wish to lay imperfect information before the House, and he felt that it would not be advisable to produce the confidential telegrams which had been received.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he hoped that the Government would be able to-morrow to state the grounds on which they based their estimate that the expenses of the war would amount to £1,200,000. No one who had listened to the debate, or who remembered their experience of the Abyssinian War, could believe that there was the slightest real ground for thinking that the expense would be limited to that amount. He objected to be led into a trap of that kind by such vague statements. He was bound to say that he thought the cost of the war would far exceed £1,200,000; and it was absolutely impossible that the necessary provisions made for many months in advance, in the arrangements made for commissariat and ammunition stores, could be met by anything like that amount. Under these circumstances he thought the country was entitled to know the grounds on which the Government made that confident statement.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, if there was any information which the Government thought contrary to the interests of the public service to produce they had every right to keep it back; but the position was quite a distinct one when they first quoted the information and then refused to give the document on which it was founded. A similar question was raised in the Denmark Debate of 1869, and, if his memory served him rightly, one of the things insisted on most strongly on that occasion by Gentlemen sitting on the front Bench opposite, was that Mr. Layard, then Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, should produce the documents he referred to. If Sir Austen Layard was asked to produce those documents in the Denmark Debate, it seemed to him to be on all fours with the present position, when the Under Secretary of State for India used information which he might have kept back and then stated it was not in the public interest to produce the documents on which it was based. There might be statements in it which it would not be well to produce to the House, but, looking at it from a common-sense point of view, he could not see that, with the numerous and efficient Staff of the India Office, they were not in a position to give them almost immediately the information relied on by the Under Secretary of State to warrant the statement he had made to the House.

MR. DILLWYN suggested that the Government might give substantially the information which was required. In whatever form they gave it, so long as it was substantially correct, it would be sufficient.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, the Government did not desire in the least to keep back any information; they only desired that any information they gave should be in a form that would be satisfactory to the House, and that its publication should not be injurious to the public service. He would, therefore, look into the documents to-morrow morning and see if there was anything in them that could be given. In any case, the House might be assured that every satisfactory information should be given when it was received, and that there was no hesitation on the part of the Government in laying it before the House.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that what had fallen from the Under Secretary of State clearly showed that there was no desire on the part of the Government to put the House into a false position. If the Government were not able to give more than had been stated that day, it would be satisfactory to have the figures before them in a printed form.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

DISQUALIFICATION BY MEDICAL RELIEF BILL.—[Bill 22.]

(Mr. Rathbone, Sir John Kennaway, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Ritchie.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Rathbone.)

Mr. SERJEANT SPINKS said, that he did not wish to delay the progress of the Bill; but he thought it right to say that he had received communications that convinced him that before the House went into Committee upon it there ought to be a longer opportunity afforded the country for considering its provisions. He would therefore appeal to the hon. Member for Liverpool not to attempt to push the Bill through that night; he had already achieved a great success in getting his Bill to a second reading so soon in the Session; and, therefore, he did hope that he would be good enough not to press it through that night.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Serjeant Spinks.)

Mr. COURTNEY said, he had not the privilege of being present when the Bill was read a second time, but he understood that discussion of its principle had then been deferred, and the Government appeared still unwilling to say anything about it. He thought it would be much better for the Government to state its opinion of the Bill, rather than to wait until it went into Committee. It struck him as harmless; but as already indicated by the hon. and learned Member for Oldham, there might be some difference of opinion entertained. He hoped it was not asking too much to request the Government then to state what opinion they entertained of the Bill.

Mr. SALT was of opinion that a general assent had been given to the principle of the Bill, and did not wish on behalf of the Government to oppose the Bill; but he thought that the object of the promoters of the Bill would be best carried out if they would consent to go into Committee pro forma, in order to give time for further consideration. The Bill touched some very important questions, upon which opinions, and perhaps interests, in large towns in various parts of the country differed. With no wish to delay the progress of the Bill, he yet hoped the promoter would be content with going into Committee pro forma.

Mr. RATHBONE would be very glad to meet the suggestion, if he were sure of obtaining an opportunity of taking the sense of the House on the question. It must, however, be in the knowledge of the House, that in the course of Business last Session, after a certain period of the Session had arrived, it was perfectly possible for one single Member to defeat the wishes of the House with regard to the Bill. Under those circumstances, he did hope that the opposition to the Bill going into Committee would not be pressed, though he should be perfectly willing to concur in any opinion of the House if against the Bill. He thought it would be better to go on now rather than to sit up night after night, with the chance of carrying the Bill being liable to be defeated by a single Member, as was the case last Session.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

BANKERS' BOOKS (EVIDENCE) BILL.

On Motion of Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bill to amend the Law of Evidence with respect to Bankers' Books, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Mr. HERSCHELL, Sir CHARLES MILLER, and Mr. RODWELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 65.]

DISPENSARIES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BRUNN, Bill to give facilities for providing Dispensary houses and dwelling houses for Medical Officers of Dispensary Districts in certain parts of Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BRUNN, Mr. DOWNING, Mr. MULHOLLAND, and Dr. WARD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 66.]

KITCHEN AND REFRESHMENT ROOMS
(HOUSE OF COMMONS).

Ordered, That a Standing Committee be appointed to control the arrangements of the Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms, in the department of the Serjeant at Arms attending this House:—Mr. ADAM, Mr. DICK, Sir WILLIAM DYER, Mr. EDWARDS, Mr. GOLDNEY, Captain HATTER, Lord KENSINGTON, Mr. MUNTS, Mr. RICHARD POWER, Mr. STACPOOLE, Sir HENRY WOLFF, Lord HENRY TYNNE, and Mr. MOWE:—Five to be the quorum.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 17th December, 1878.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE GRAND
DUCHESS OF HESSE (PRINCESS ALICE).

ADDRESS OF CONDOLENCE.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, when last I had the honour of addressing your Lordships it was in the warm controversy of public life. I little thought then that before we dispersed I should have again to appeal to your Lordships. The subject to which I have to refer on this occasion is one on which there will be unanimity—but, alas, it is the unanimity of sorrow. My Lords, you are too well aware that a great calamity has fallen on the Royal Family of this realm. A Princess, who loved us though she left us, and who always revisited her Fatherland with delight—one of those women the brightness of whose being adorns society and inspires the circle in which she lives—has been removed from this world, to the anguish of her family, her friends, and her subjects. The Princess Alice—for I will venture to call her by that name, though she wore a Crown—afforded one of the most striking instances that I can remember of richness of culture and rare intelligence combined with the most pure and refined domestic sentiments. You, my Lords, who knew her life well, can recall those agonizing hours when she attended the dying bed of her illustrious Father, who had directed her studies and formed her tastes. You can recall, too, the moment at which she attended her Royal Brother at a time when the hopes of England seemed to depend on his life, and now you can remember too well how, when the whole of her own family were stricken by a malignant disease, she had been to them the angel in the house till at last her own vital power perhaps exhausted, she has herself fallen. My Lords, there is something wonderfully piteous in the immediate cause of her death. The physicians who permitted her to watch over her suffering family enjoined her under no circumstances whatever to be tempted into an embrace. Her admirable self-restraint guarded her through the crises of this terrible complaint in safety. She remembered and observed the injunctions of her physicians. But it became her lot to break to her son, quite a youth, the death of his youngest sister, to whom he was devotedly attached. The boy was so overcome with misery that the agitated mother to console him clasped him in her arms—and thus received the kiss of death. My Lords, I hardly know an incident more pathetic. It is one by which poets might be inspired, and in which the artist in every class, whether in picture, in statue, or in gem, might find a fitting subject of commemoration. My Lords, we will not dwell at this moment on the sufferings of the husband whom she has left behind and of the children who were so devoted to her; but our immediate duty is to offer our condolence to one whose happiness and whose sorrows always excite and command the loyalty and affectionate respect of this House. Upon Her Majesty a great grief has fallen which none but the Queen can so completely and acutely feel. Seventeen years ago Her Majesty experienced the crushing sorrow of her life, and then she was particularly sustained by the Daughter whom she has now lost, who assisted her by her labours, and aided her by her presence and counsel. Her Majesty now feels that the cup of sorrow was not then exhausted. No language can express the consolation we wish to extend to our Sovereign in her sorrow—such suffering is too fresh to allow of solace; but, however exalted, there are none but must be sustained by the consciousness that they possess the sympathy of a nation. My Lords, with these feelings I beg to propose for your Lordships' acceptance the following Motion:—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to express the deep concern of this House at the great loss which Her Majesty has sustained by the death of Her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess of Hesse, Princess Alice of Great Britain and Ireland, second daughter of Her Majesty the Queen, and to condole with Her Majesty on this melancholy occasion.

“To assure Her Majesty that this House will ever feel the warmest interest in whatever concerns Her Majesty's domestic relations; and to declare the ardent wishes of this House for the happiness of Her Majesty and of her family.”

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I feel your Lordships will expect, and indeed wish, me to join in the declaration which the noble Earl has made with so much feeling of the heartfelt loyalty and deep sorrow with which we all desire to approach our gracious Sovereign on the occasion of this Address. My Lords, the accidents of a political career gave me some opportunity of observing the domestic life of the Royal Family during the course of eleven years. At the beginning of that period Princess Alice was a singularly attractive child of seven years old. I doubt whether any childhood or youth was ever more joyous and bright, or ever gave a livelier promise of that which was afterwards so amply fulfilled. At the end of that time I had the honour of proposing an Address in this House on Her Royal Highness's marriage—a marriage which seemed founded upon all the best securities for wedded happiness. The child had grown into womanhood with all those personal, moral, and mental qualities which the noble Earl has so well described. The principal characteristics of the married life of the Grand Duchess appear to have been—first, absolute devotion to her husband and children; next, a course not merely of benevolence, but of unceasing thoughtful beneficence to all depending upon her; and, lastly, a remarkable talent for acquiring the sympathy and attracting the regard of some of the most gifted of the intellectual country which she had adopted, and to whose interests she was devoted without ever breaking a link in the chain of memories and associations which bound her to the country of her birth. The noble Earl has already alluded to the singular coincidence of three dates which will never pass from the pages of English history. My Lords, I trust that neither the writer nor your Lordships will think it indiscreet if, instead of trusting to my own language to impress your feelings as to the loss which has on this last 14th of December befallen the Royal Families of England and Darmstadt, I read to you a few words extracted from a letter written on the day of the sad tragedy by a brother passionately devoted to his sister, and who left England last night to pay the last sad tribute of affection and respect to her beloved memory—

"So good, so kind, so clever. We had gone through so much together—my father's illness, then my own; and she has succumbed to the pernicious malady which laid low her husband and children, whom she nursed and watched with unceasing care and attention. . . . The Queen bears up bravely, but her grief is deep beyond words."

My Lords, I will add nothing. I only ask to be allowed to second the Motion which has been made.

On Question, agreed to, nemine dissente.

Ordered, That the said Address be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, to Thursday the 13th of February next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 17th December, 1878.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Ancient Monuments [52].
Considered as amended—Disqualification by Medical Relief* [22].

QUESTIONS.

POOR LAW—METROPOLITAN UNIONS
—OAKUM PICKING BY FEMALE PAUPERS.—QUESTION.

MR. COLE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that in the Poplar and other Metropolitan Unions a rule has been adopted and acted upon that every female adult pauper, not suffering under temporary or permanent infirmity of body, who shall be relieved in the workhouse, in return for such relief shall, as a task, pick four pounds of unbeaten oakum per day; and, if so, whether he approves of such rule, or whether some other and less severe work could not be substituted?

MR. SCLATER-BOTH, in reply, said, the rule in question was sanctioned by the Local Government Board, and the Guardians had exercised their own discretion in putting it in force. He saw no reason for disputing the exercise of that discretion in the present instance. In the neighbourhood of Poplar, oakum picking was pursued by women and children as a regular industry.

CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY—THE PREVALENT DISTRESS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can correct or corroborate the report that we are almost face to face with such a crisis of distress as this generation has never known; a distress affecting even the Metropolis, but operating with greater intensity in the cotton, coal, and iron districts?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I presume my right hon. Friend's Question refers to distress among the poor inhabitants of the localities he has mentioned, and not to any commercial distress? [MR. J. G. HUBBARD: Yes.] Everyone—and no one more than myself and the Government, and, in fact, this House—sympathizes with the poor inhabitants of all the great centres of industry in their present distress; but from all the inquiries I have been able to make I think the statement contained in the Question of my right hon. Friend, is a considerable exaggeration and does not agree with the true facts of the case. Therefore, I hope that, at all events, no unnecessary alarm will be excited as to the state of distress that undoubtedly exists. I have here a letter which I have received from a highly respected gentleman, the Chairman of the Board of Supervision at Edinburgh. He says—

"So far as I am able at present to judge, I am not apprehensive that the distress will be beyond the ordinary means of relief."

The Mayor of Liverpool telegraphs—

"There is considerable distress here, and in this respect we anticipate a severe winter; but it is not likely to be greater than we have experienced before with a depressed state of trade in the cotton districts."

Another telegram, from the Mayor of Manchester, says—

"There is scarcity of work and consequent distress, beyond doubt increased by severity of weather; but local sympathy is actively aroused and charitable efforts abound. There is no wish for Government aid. Manchester is quite able to bear the strain."

I am quite sure that everyone who has it in his power to relieve distress will very willingly do so.

MR. MUNDELLA asked, if there was any statement from the authorities in the coal and iron districts—Sheffield, for instance?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I have not had time to inquire into the state of the coal and iron districts since Notice was given of the Question. The right hon. Gentleman's Question was only put on the Paper last night.

MR. ANDERSON asked, if any communication had been received from Glasgow?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS answered in the negative.

Afterwards,—

MR. HANBURY TRACY asked the President of the Local Government Board, If, in the present state of severe distress in some parts of the country, he will consider whether it may be necessary in any cases to modify the rules ordinarily governing the administration of poor relief, in order to tide over the emergency?

MR. SOLATER-BOTH, in reply, said, that no evidence had as yet been brought to his notice of such severe distress as to require exceptional measures. On the contrary, he found that in 20 of the largest Lancashire Unions, the increase of paupers in the first week of December was 13,482. In 15 of the West Riding Unions it was 3,063; in the whole of Durham, 196; in seven Unions in Staffordshire, 1,141; in South Wales, 727; in the Metropolis, 52. Without wishing to depreciate the distress which undoubtedly prevailed, he might illustrate these figures by a comparison with a period of severe pressure on the rates. In Manchester there were at the end of November, 1862 (the period of the cotton famine), 39,023 paupers; there were now 6,243. He would add that the General Regulations of the Local Government Board, contained numerous exceptional provisions to enable Boards of Guardians to deal with extraordinary emergencies. These provisions had quite recently stood the test of severe distress in the South Wales iron and coal districts.

THE SLAVE TRADE—ZANZIBAR.

QUESTION.

Mr. WHITWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any information has reached the Foreign Office regarding a renewal of the Slave Trade from Central Africa through Zanzibar; and, whether any measures can be taken or are in contemplation to check this traffic at its source in the interior of Africa?

Mr. BOURKE, in reply, said, a despatch had been received from Dr. Kirk in November last, stating that a caravan of 300 slaves was said to have reached the coast of Zanzibar. These slaves were conducted, not as usual by Arabs, but by Natives of the interior. One of the Governors of the Sultan behaved very well, and refused to allow the slaves or any part of the caravan to enter the villages on the coast. They were taken into the interior, and placed under the protection of the Abdallah. When the Sultan heard of the circumstances he sent for the Governor, and they have been detained by the Sultan ever since. The Government had no means of stopping the traffic at its source, which was a long way in the interior of Africa. All they could do was to do their best to make it unremunerative by stopping it at the coast.

TURKEY—RUMOURED GUARANTEED LOAN.—QUESTION.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON, asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any communications have passed from Sir H. Layard to Her Majesty's Government containing references to a proposed guarantee of a Loan of a considerable amount to be raised by the Turkish Government; and, if so whether he will lay them, or any part of them, upon the Table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, a letter relating to a proposed guarantee of a loan of a considerable amount, to be raised by the Turkish Government, had been received from Sir Henry Austen Layard by the Foreign Office and the Treasury. He had not had time fully to examine it, but he might observe, that as far as Sir Henry Austen Layard was concerned, he stated that he had not held out any hopes to the Sultan that the proposed loan would be guaranteed by Her Majesty's Government. No such engagement or guarantee would be entertained by Her Majesty's Government without the previous approval of Parliament.

THE WAR IN AFGHANISTAN—INDIAN FINANCE—BOMBAY.—QUESTION.

Mr. MUNDELLA asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If it is true, as stated in the "Times" telegram of yesterday, dated Calcutta, December 15th, that, having regard to the cost of the war in Afghanistan, the Bombay Government have issued an order directing "that, in view of the immediate importance of avoiding or deferring expenditure where it is possible till next year, no new works are to be commenced, and all allotments provided for them are cancelled; all works in progress are to be suspended, except in cases of urgent necessity; nor are any repairs to be effected beyond such as are absolutely essential, repairs of that description having, moreover, to be reduced to a minimum. No further purchases of tools or plant are to be made, and all applications for grants for public works are to be retained until such time as the state of the finances will permit," and, if it is true, will he lay such Order upon the Table of the House?

Mr. E. STANHOPE: We have no information on the subject beyond that contained in the telegram in The Times. I think it most probable that the Government of Bombay is taking steps to restrict expenditure as much as can reasonably be done. The hon. Member assumes that it is done with regard to the war in Afghanistan; but I find no such statement in the telegram.

TURKEY—COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

QUESTION.

Mr. WHITWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any and what Commercial Treaties are in progress by which British productions and manufactures will be admitted on satisfactory terms into the states made independent, or newly constituted, in what was recently European Turkey; and, whether the eight per cent Import Duty said to be charged on goods imported into Cyprus will be charged on British goods?

Mr. BOURKE, in reply, said, that no Commercial Treaties were being negotiated with the States to which the Question of the hon. Gentleman related—unless Roumania were referred to. A Treaty with that country was, as he had previously stated, in process of negotiation. The commercial relations with the other States were regulated by the Berlin Treaty, and those with Servia were prescribed by a clause in that Treaty. As regarded Cyprus, things remained as they were.

AFGHANISTAN—NORTH-WEST FRONTIER—LORD NAPIER OF MAGDALA.
QUESTION.

MR. LEITH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, with reference to the use which has been made by the Government of the opinion, by telegram, of Lord Napier of Magdala in favour of the alteration and rectification of the north-west frontier of India, the Government have obtained any other opinions of military men on the subject, either in favour or against the alteration; and, if so, whether the Government will lay those opinions upon the Table of the House; and, whether they will also lay upon the Table the telegram sent by the Government to Lord Napier, and to which his telegram was a reply?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, the hon. Gentleman would, perhaps, allow him to answer the Question, although, as he had become aware that it was to be put only within the last hour, he was afraid he had not been able to acquaint himself so fully with the matter to which it related as he otherwise would have been. The last part of the Question, he might add, showed that some misapprehension existed in the mind of the hon. Gentleman on the subject. He (Colonel Stanley) had been informed by General Dillon, who was now Assistant Military Secretary at the War Office, and who formerly served on the Staff of Lord Napier, that the latter had telegraphed to him to say that he was most anxious to be present at the discussion on the Afghan Question in the House of Lords; but, not being able at the last moment to make arrangements for the purpose so as to be in time, Lord Napier sent to General Dillon by telegraph a Memorandum, which he desired him to place before the Commander in Chief, with a request that His Royal Highness might make of it any use he might think fit. The message was communicated to His Royal Highness; but as he did not take part in the debate in the House of Lords, he handed the Memorandum to the Prime Minister. He understood that Lord Napier was anxious, as a Peer of Parliament, that his views should not be misrepresented; but he wished to add that no telegram asking him to express them had been sent to him on the part of the Government, and that his telegram was not to be considered in any way as a reply to one from them. As regarded the opinions of military men on the question of the rectification of Frontier, he had to state that the Government, as a Government, were not in possession of any such opinions at the present moment; but, of course, in the exercise of his office, he was in communication with various military authorities on all questions of military interest. He did not, however, deem it to be consistent with his duty to lay such communications, which were necessarily of a private and confidential character, on the Table of the House; but, at the same time, he should not use in debate any memorandum which was not of a public nature.

PARLIAMENT—QUESTIONS—STANDING ORDERS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD, who had given Notice to ask the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether his attention has been directed to the reports in the newspapers of the 13th July and the 3rd of August, of a case wherein a complaint was made against the London Street Tramways Company by a private resident to enforce penalties for having failed to keep in good condition and repair, and so as not to be a danger or annoyance to the ordinary traffic, the rails of their tramways and the substructure on which the same rested, in the Hampstead and Kentish Town Roads, and in High Street, Camden Town, and in which the fact of the non-repair was admitted, but the magistrate decided that the Act of Parliament referred to gave no remedy to a private inhabitant but to the Metropolitan Board of Works, who only had power to enforce penalties of five pounds per day; whether in consequence any and what steps had been taken to enforce the law against the Tramway Company, or to recover such penalties; and, what had been done by the Metropolitan Board in consequence of the receipt of a Letter from a Correspondent to the Chairman of the Board, of May 1st, 1878, and the subsequent Correspondence thereon, was proceeding to put his Question accordingly, when—

MR. CHILDERS rose to Order. Prima facie the hon. Gentleman was acting in violation of the Standing Orders of the House in putting a Question which was addressed neither to a Minister of the Crown with reference to public matters, nor to a private Member with regard to any Bill or Motion before the House. On the other hand, he believed it had on a previous occasion been ruled by the Speaker, that it had for some time been the practice to permit Questions relating to matters of public interest to be addressed to the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, who, although not a Minister, might, perhaps, become one, and who meanwhile discharged very important public functions. These Questions had always been confined to matters of public importance. The point involved in the Question of the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark, however, referred merely to an action which had been brought by some person against a Tramway Company and to a letter from an anonymous correspondent, and he did not think the Chairman of the Board ought to be called upon in his place to answer a Question of that kind. If the Rules of the House were to be violated in that way, Questions might be put to every Mayor or Chairman of a Local Board who happened to have a seat in it with respect to the affairs of that municipality or local authority.

MR. WHITWELL said, it was not customary to put Questions such as that of the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark to private Members.

MR. SPEAKER said, the right hon. Member for Pontefract had stated quite accurately what the Rules of the House were with regard to putting Questions. He was also correct in saying that it had for some years past been the practice to make an exception in enforcing those Rules in the case of Questions addressed to the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, in consideration of the magnitude of the interests which he represented. That practice, which had been the practice of his Predecessors in the Chair, he had followed by permitting Questions to be put to the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board on matters of public importance. He must, however, say that the Question now addressed to the hon. and gallant Member seemed to him to be against the spirit of the Rules of the House; and if his attention had been previously called to it he should have pointed out to the hon. and gallant Member for Southwark that it would be scarcely proper to put it.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL HOGG asked the permission of the House to state his readiness to answer that or any other Question which might be put to him by any hon. Member.

INDIA—FINANCIAL CONDITION.

QUESTION.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he can give the House any information with respect to the telegram to which he had referred on the previous evening relating to the condition of Indian Finance?

MR. E. STANHOPE: In consequence of what occurred last night, I have looked over the recent financial telegrams, and found that they would have conveyed very vague information to hon. Members who are not conversant with the Finance Accounts of India. But as I understood that what right hon. Gentlemen opposite really wanted was the best information we have at our command, I have had a short statement printed giving all the details as clearly as we can; and copies of it are in the Vote Office.

ARMY—THE AUXILIARY FORCES.

QUESTION.

COLONEL KENNARD asked the Secretary of State for War, If the Committee that sat last summer on matters relating to the Volunteer Force had concluded their inquiries; and, if so, when the Report was likely to be issued?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that the Committee had reported, or were just about to sign their Report. He would be happy to lay all the Papers connected with the subject on the Table of the House.

Colonel Beresford

AFGHANISTAN (EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS).—QUESTION.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he could give any definite information as to the intentions of the Government in relation to the distribution of the expense of the Afghan War between Great Britain and India?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is difficult within the limits of an Answer to reply satisfactorily to the Question of my right hon. Friend, because the matter involves very serious considerations, affecting, as it does, both England and India, and requires more discussion than I can now venture upon. I hope to be able to refer to the Question at more length in the course of the evening. We should certainly not assent to any principle upon which the military operations of the war would be conducted by one Government—the Government of India—on the understanding that the expenses would be defrayed by another—the Government of England—and the same objections would equally apply to any fixed proportion being arranged, as my right hon. Friend suggests. I believe that that would lead to extravagance, and would throw more, rather than less, of the burden on India in the long run. Nevertheless, I fully admit that the subject is one which requires special consideration, and by-and-by I shall be prepared to enter on it, and to state my views. This, however, is not the proper time for doing so; for without knowing the extent or the expense of the war, I am not able to say what fixed sum, or what proportion, ought to be borne by the Indian Revenue.

M O T I O N .

—o—o—o—

A D J O U R N M E N T .

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House will, at the rising of the House this day, adjourn till Thursday the 13th day of February next."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

THE RHODOPE COMMISSION.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. RYLANDS said, he thought the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman fully justified the remarks he was about to make. He thought that before they agreed to the Motion for the Adjournment of the House, they were entitled to more information than had been afforded respecting the charges of the Afghan War. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that the question of apportioning the expenses raised very grave issues. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, that there was an Order on the Paper for a Motion dealing with the subject, which was to be discussed at a later period of the evening. The observations of the hon. Member were, therefore, irregular at that time.

MR. RYLANDS said, the object of his rising was simply to ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell them, before they passed this Motion for Adjournment, whether the Government had come to a determination to charge any portion of the expenditure in connection with the war upon the Imperial Exchequer?—because, if so, it had always been the practice of previous Governments, when making a charge upon the Exchequer for such a purpose, to take the earliest opportunity possible to come forward and lay upon the Table a Vote of Credit for the purpose they proposed. He hoped he should not be considered out of Order if he impressed upon the Ministry the necessity of giving the House some information on this point before they adjourned——

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Gentleman was altogether out of Order in the remarks he was making.

LORD ELCHO wished to make a few remarks on a subject which had been debated on the previous day, but on which he had not been able to give his opinion at the time. On a former occasion he had asked, but had some difficulty in getting an answer to his Question, whether the Government believed or did not believe in the trustworthiness of the Report of the Rhodope Commissioners?

MR. DILLWYN rose to Order.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the ruling he had just given in the case of the hon. Member for Burnley did not apply to that of the noble Lord, who was not debating a subject ordered to be taken into consideration on that day. At the same time, he doubted whether the subject could be introduced conveniently on a Motion for the Adjournment of the House.

LORD ELCHO said, he thought he should be in Order in referring to a subject which had been debated on a previous day—he meant the Rhodope Commission. He was in the House when the Question came up; but he took no part in the debate, partly because he had not the necessary documents with him, and partly because he was not very well satisfied with the course that had been taken by Her Majesty's Government. It would be in the recollection of the House that on a former occasion he asked a Question on the subject, and had considerable difficulty in getting an answer. He wanted to know, whether the Government believed or not in the trustworthiness of the Report of the Rhodope Commissioners?

MR. DILLWYN said, that as his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley had been called to Order for alluding to the Afghan War, he wished to ask, if the noble Lord was in Order in alluding to the Rhodope Commission?

MR. SPEAKER said, he had ruled the hon. Member for Burnley to be out of Order, because he was anticipating the discussion of a subject that would come on later in the evening. That objection did not apply to the remarks of the noble Lord; but, at the same time, he reminded him of the inconvenience of the course he was pursuing.

LORD ELCHO said, that it would be the last thing he should wish to do to intrude himself upon the House; but he was very anxious to say a few words now, because he might not have the chance of introducing the subject in the subsequent debate. The authenticity of the Rhodope Report was questioned by several hon. Gentlemen opposite, although it was the result of a Commission appointed by the Berlin Congress, and it had been signed by four out of the six Commissioners appointed. When the "Bulgarian horrors," as they were called, took place, no sooner was there a notice of anything in the newspapers than Questions were asked in Parliament concerning them. Thus, he found that when a voice—an almost solitary voice—sounded over sea and land, the voice of a newspaper Correspondent—when that voice sounded in The Daily News of the 23rd of June, on the 26th and three days afterwards, the Duke of Argyll in the House of Lords, and Mr. W. E. Forster in the House of Commons, asked Questions regarding it. On the 8th of July another notice appeared in The Daily News, and on the 10th, Mr. Forster renewed his inquiries. On the 17th Mr. Baxter, revived the interrogatories. On the 16th of August, the question of the cruelties to the Bulgarians was again raised, and further attempts were made to penetrate the mystery in the official mind on the 6th, 7th, and 9th, and the 11th of August. The writer of the pamphlet from which he was reading said on the 5th of September that he was still depending upon a foreign source for any official information, and that foreign source was Mr. Schuyler. That pamphlet was dated Hawarden, the 6th of September, and it was entitled "Bulgarian Horrors," by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P. Now, he had quoted that pamphlet to show that no sooner was the question of those "Bulgarian Horrors," raised in an anonymous way in the columns of the Press than five, six, seven, eight, eleven times was the subject immediately brought before the House by the hon. Gentlemen opposite, having no evidence whatever of the trustworthiness of the Report, except what the pamphlet contained and a foreign writer supplied. On the other hand, what happened with regard to the Rhodope Commission? As he had said—it was appointed by the Berlin Congress. It went into the inquiry—it took evidence in the way that the Commissioners had agreed upon among themselves, and the inquiry went on until the evidence became unfavourable to the Russian soldiery. No sooner did that take place than the Russian Commissioner objected; and his objection was backed by the Austrian Government, who said in a telegram—"The evidence of most of the refugees concerning the atrocities committed by the Russian soldiers is unanswerable." The Russian Commissioner wished to stop these accusations, and threatened if they went on he would retire, and so put an end to the Commission. But in spite of the remonstrance of the Russian Commissioner it did go on, and the Report had become a Parliamentary document. Now, hon. Gentlemen opposite declined to admit that evidence. They looked upon as trustworthy the anonymous evidence which appeared in The Daily News and other papers. Now, Consul General Fawcett, in his Report, had said that Mr. Baring's evidence was taken in precisely the same way as the evidence taken by the Commission. He also stated that he knew that, for atrocities committed at Batak, Mussulmans had been hanged upon no other evidence than that of these Reports. He (Lord Elcho) had addressed a letter to Lord Shaftesbury—who had been Chairman at one of the meetings at St. James' Hall, and who was not the least intelligent man or the least accustomed to deal with public affairs—with reference to the Rhodope horrors. In his letter in answer, Lord Shaftesbury said—

Mr. Speaker

"I share the belief that the atrocities reported by the Rhodope Commissioners are strictly accurate. No one, I think, can read that document without coming to the conclusion that though it has not the usual cold and stilted tone of official papers it has a character of authenticity, and that the Russian Commissioner, aided by the German Commissioner, endeavoured in every way to suppress or evade the evidence. Probably, since the days when the Goths and Huns and Vandals overran Christendom, there is nothing to equal what is now recorded against the armies of the Czar."

This was the ground upon which he ventured to bring this subject before the House. He would make no comments upon the inconsistencies of hon. Gentlemen or right hon. Gentlemen opposite. They no doubt shared the horror of Lord Shaftesbury and himself with regard to these atrocities; but it was to be regretted they showed so much anxiety to bring justice home to Mussulmans who had perpetrated horrors upon Christians, and so little desire to bring it home to Russian soldiers, who were guilty of horrors upon Mussulmans before which those other horrors paled.

MR. E. JENKINS rose to move the adjournment of the debate until after the debate upon the expenses of the Afghan War had been concluded. He supposed he should not be out of Order if, without referring at all to the substance of the debate, he pointed out that in the position in which the House was now placed, after the declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was impossible [that they could separate without having received from the right hon. Gentleman some more specific statement as to what was the intention of the Government with regard to the apportionment of the expenditure.

MR. SPEAKER said, that it was not competent to the hon. Member to make this Motion, there being at this time another Motion before the House.

MR. HERSCHELL said, he could not allow the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire to pass in silence. No doubt, it was extremely inexpedient to enter upon a discussion of the subject, because it was impossible to exhaust it on that occasion. He had himself gone into the matter very carefully, and was prepared to discuss it at the proper time with the noble Lord or with anyone else. Nothing could be less chivalrous than to vent any ill-feeling they might have against Russia by too great an eagerness to believe reports against her troops. The evidence was not of such a nature as they themselves would be willing to be condemned on. For the present, however, he would merely enter his protest against the views of the noble Lord, believing that when the time came he should be able to show that the Report, though it might have some foundation, was not to be accepted as absolutely to be relied on. He deprecated the raising of a question by the noble Lord as to the humanity of those who sat on that side of the House. It was not their custom to regard such matters from a religious standpoint. They were all at one in denouncing any cruelties that had been clearly established; and he did not think it a pleasing mode of commencing a discussion to cast aspersions upon one another or claim a monopoly of humanity.

LORD ELCHO explained that he had not accused hon. Members opposite of inhumanity. He had no doubt they had as much humanity as hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House; but the inconsistency of their conduct required to be pointed out.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had been about to make similar remarks upon the subject; but what he intended to say on the subject of the Rhodope Report had been much better expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Herschell). He thought it would be extremely inconvenient to discuss the matter then; but he had examined the whole question, and should at some other time be prepared to enter into a discussion upon it. What he had risen to say was upon a totally different question. He could not avoid feeling very strongly, from the reply given by the Home Secretary earlier in the evening, that the Government did not appreciate the real gravity of the industrial prospects of the country. The right hon. Gentleman quoted telegrams to prove that the country was not in a very bad state; but those telegrams were in no case from industrial centres. If he had gone to Glasgow, or to the coal districts, or to Sheffield, he would have found a very different state of things indeed. He (Mr. Anderson) had learned from Glasgow that there were 25,000 people there who were on the brink of starving, and who were only saved by the action of temporary relief. That state of affairs would become worse and worse; and the Government, before they knew where they were, might have to consider the wants, not of a small number of Rhodope refugees, but of the starving millions of this country. He desired that the Government would consider what the state of the country was at the present moment. He did not mean to charge the present Government with having brought it about—he did not believe that they had done so—but he did believe that their policy had immensely aggravated it. He believed that by the state of irritation in which they had kept the world, keeping them always on the brink of war, and then plunging into an unjust war by way of variety, they had entirely prostrated the commerce of the country, and had ruined its industrial prosperity. He did not believe that they would see any remedy or any improved state of things as long as the present Government were in Office.

Mr. H. SAMUELSON said, that those who had taken action with reference to the horrors in Bulgaria would be equally ready to take action in the case of the alleged Rhodope horrors, if those horrors should be proved. But he did not exactly see what Government could do in the matter. They had already proved their incapacity to make the Turks, their sworn allies, punish convicted offenders, as in the case of Cheket Pasha, who, after Lord Derby had categorically demanded his punishment, had received promotion and reward, and was at that time occupying a high official position in Thessaly. Under these circumstances, it was not likely that the Russians, even if guilty, would submit to their dictation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN moved the adjournment of the debate on the question of the adjournment of the House, because he understood that that was the only way in which, in strict Order, he would be able to ask the House whether it would not be better to adjourn the discussion on the main Question until Her Majesty's Government had furnished them with the information which they had promised to lay upon the Table. Her Majesty's Government had themselves to blame if the House was unwilling to put so much confidence in them as to separate before the promised information was given. They had deliberately left the country in the dark; and he did not feel inclined to assent to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman until full information on this large question had been laid before the House. He begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
 (Mr. Chamberlain.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am afraid, from what has fallen from the hon. Member for Birmingham, that he and others are under a misapprehension in assuming that I have promised to give the House some further information on this question. I made no such promise. I merely said that I wish to state my views, and the views of Her Majesty's Government, with regard to the main principles which should be observed in the arrangement and the distribution between England and India of the burdens connected with the military operations. The propriety of those views will, of course, be open to argument. What Her Majesty's Government have all along proposed, and what Lord Cranbrook proposed in "another place," is that the House should now pass the Vote which is necessary to give legality to the application of the Indian Revenues towards the expenses of the military operations now going on in Afghanistan, and without which the application of a single rupee of such funds to that purpose would be illegal. I have already stated that this Vote is not intended in any way to prejudge the question with regard to the ultimate apportionment of the cost and burden of the war between the two countries; and I stated last night, and I do so again now, that we regard this as a case with exceptional features, such as may render it desirable, when we know to what extent the matter has grown, to come forward and make some proposal that this country should give assistance to the Indian Exchequer in the matter. On the other hand, Her Majesty's Government cannot accept the theory that in a case of this sort the Revenues of this country are to be placed—so to speak—at the disposal of the Administration of India, because we believe that such a course would lead to extravagance. With regard to the present position of the discussion, I understood that a common understanding had been arrived at last night that the debate on the main Question should be finished to-night, and that the House should then adjourn until the 13th of February, and I should regret if the House were to desire to go back from that understanding. To prolong the present discussion, however, would merely have the effect of shortening and, perhaps, crippling the debate upon the main Question. With regard to the question raised by the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) relating to the Rhodope Report, I earnestly press upon the House the fact that it is one which is connected with an important and delicate subject, which can be more conveniently discussed, if at all, at another opportunity.

Mr. Anderson

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that if he shared the belief that appeared to be entertained below the Gangway, that Her Majesty's Government was about to give the House any additional information on this subject, he should be much disposed to agree to the course proposed by the hon. Member for Birmingham. He confessed, however, that he was rather sceptical as to the amount of information they were likely to receive from Government. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), that if what had been said were correct—that Her Majesty's Government intended that any portion of the expenses of this war were to be borne by the British taxpayer—they should present an estimate to Parliament, and ask the sanction of the House to the expenditure. But that could not now be done before the adjournment. The House was now sufficiently aware that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to lay such an Estimate upon the Table before the adjournment, neither did they intend to ask for a Vote of Credit on account of the war. In adopting the course they had done, Her Majesty's Government had assumed a great responsibility; and, in his opinion, they should not have deferred to a future occasion the question whether the whole cost of the war was to be borne eventually by India, or whether the burden was to be shared in this country. The expediency of the course which Her Majesty's Government had taken was one which the House would have to consider hereafter. At present they could not hope to receive from the Government any further information which might alter their views on the subject. In these circumstances, he thought that the hon. Member for Birmingham would gain nothing by persisting in his Motion for the adjournment of the debate. He must confess that he could not appreciate the object of the noble Lord (Lord Elcho) in raising the question of the Rhodope Commission. No doubt it was quite open to the noble Lord to take any action in the matter he thought fit. He thought the noble Lord's intention was to put some questions to the Government in reference to the course they took on Friday and yesterday; but that did not seem to be his object, which was rather to shake the Report in the face of hon. Members on this side, and to demand why they did not take the same course as they had taken in the case of the Bulgarian atrocities. The warm interest which had been felt by hon. Members on that side of the House in the Bulgarian atrocities was due to the fact that they felt that those atrocities, committed by the Turkish authorities, ought to have exercised a strong influence upon the policy of this country; but he did not see how that policy was to be affected by the Report in question. If the noble Lord believed that, in consequence of the Report to which he had referred, war ought to be declared against Russia, or any other course adopted, he should bring the matter before the House by a distinct Motion. As it was, he must protest against the noble Lord introducing this subject without notice and without warning, and probably in the absence of many hon. Members who might have something to say in reference to it, and against his taunting them with having refrained from taking any action in the matter, when it was evident that Her Majesty's Government themselves did not intend to take any action in reference to it.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that after the observations of the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition, and especially after the remark of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he intended to state his views without giving the House any information on the question, he begged to withdraw his Amendment for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put.

Resolved, That this House will, at the rising of the House this day, adjourn till Thursday the 13th day of February next.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ANCIENT MONUMENTS BILL.

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Beresford Hope, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Sir Richard Wallace.)

[BILL 52.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that as the House had on several previous occasions affirmed the principle of the Bill, he thought hon. Members would not wish him to enter into the subject at length on the present occasion. He would only observe that the principle of the Bill was that, after proper notice had been given, an owner of one of the monuments comprised in the Bill who wished to destroy it should, at least, give the country the option of purchasing it at a fair price. As regarded the constitution of the Commission and other details, he did not ask the House to commit itself, though, for his part, he believed the Bill in its present form would work well; but he should be most ready to consider any suggestion with reference to it in Committee.

The Marquess of Hartington

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY asked, whether that was the same Bill as the hon. Baronet had introduced in previous Sessions? He had understood that the hon. Baronet was prepared to make considerable modifications in its provisions.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he had adopted all the recommendations of the Select Committee which sat on the measure, and also other suggestions, in order, as far as possible, to remove objections.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday 13th February.

AFGHANISTAN (EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS).

ADJOURNED DEBATE RESUMED.

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment proposed to Question [16th December],

"That, Her Majesty having directed a Military expedition of Her Forces charged upon Indian Revenues to be despatched against the Ameer of Afghanistan, this House consents that the Revenues of India shall be applied to defray the expenses of the Military operations which may be carried on beyond the external Frontiers of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions."—(Mr. Edward Stanhope.)

And which Amendment was

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House is of opinion that it would be unjust that the Revenues of India should be chargeable with the extraordinary expenses of the Military operations now being carried on against the Ameer of Afghanistan,"—(Mr. Fawcett.)

instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: The Under Secretary of State for India asks power to defray the cost of the war in Afghanistan from the Revenues of India. But he has frankly and fairly explained that the £1,200,000 now foreseen form no estimate of the real cost of the war. This sum only represents that portion of the cost which is likely to occur before the 1st of April, and for which about £1,000,000 must be found by that date. The House must recollect that the Government has never given us the slightest estimate of the cost of the war. Indeed, the permanent increase of annual expenditure by the augmentation of the Army and of the rectification of our Frontier, is likely enough to be as much as is at present put down as the cost of the war. But the Government has given us no information, probably because they possess none, as to the actual and total cost of the war. All that the Secretary of State has said in "another place," and the Under Secretary of State in this House, is that £1,200,000 will be spent by the 1st of April. The war, if it extend into operations next spring, will cost an unknown quantity of money; so the Government, remembering how widely the Abyssinian Estimate differed from the actual expenditure, are prudently reticent on the subject of the costs of the war in Afghanistan. Hence the questions before us are two in number—First, is it just or politic to defray the extraordinary costs of the war from Indian Revenues? Second, can the Revenues of India, without increased taxation, pay the £1,000,000 or £1,200,000 in the present financial year, and the future unknown costs, and necessary permanent charges? At present I defer considering the question of justice, and deal with the financial considerations. The Secretary of State "elsewhere" told us that he had recently given the subject of Indian finances careful consideration, and that in consequence of the new taxation, and especially of the unexpected large increase of the tax on opium, amounting to £1,245,000, he found the clear surplus of Indian Revenue was no less than £2,156,000, so that the realized Revenue had exceeded the Estimate. Under these circumstances, Indian Revenue could readily be charged with £1,200,000, and still there would be a surplus of £500,000, which Sir John Strachey told us was the smallest balance he could do with for unexpected expenditure in ordinary years. Several of my hon. Friends, who with myself take an interest in Indian finance, heard this statement with amazement, but with gratification. It seems to have excited equal amazement in India, for the telegraphs have been busy, and already the Under Secretary of State corrects the sanguine surplus of his Chief, and cuts it down to the more modest dimensions of £1,500,000.

MR. E. STANHOPE: My noble Friend, when he stated the original surplus at £2,156,000, expressly intimated that recent information had caused considerable reductions to be made from that surplus.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR admitted that he had not heard the speech of the noble Lord; but in the report of The Times, which he held in his hand, there is no such statement. Nor, indeed, was it compatible with the argument of the Secretary of State, who wished to show that not only could the war costs be met, but that there would be a surplus after that of £500,000. In any case, the total alleged surplus now is about £1,500,000. Well, that happens to be exactly the sum stated to be requisite for a Famine Insurance Fund, and is derived from the increased taxation levied this year for that specific object. It ought to be kept sacred for such a purpose. I could not understand clearly the Under Secretary of State when he spoke on this subject. But so far as I did understand him, I presume he admitted the sacredness of this Fund, for he said that £700,000 was still to be paid in respect to it. In that case his available surplus has dwindled down from £2,136,000 of the Secretary of State to £1,500,000, less £700,000, or really to an available surplus of £800,000. Well, at this rate of decrease, this surplus is likely to vanish by new and unexpected charges not yet brought into the account. Unless, then, you encroach upon the Famine Insurance Fund, and break faith with the Indian taxpayer, I deny that you have in the surplus of Indian Revenue, even for the present financial year, resources from which you can pay the expenses of the war. Now, let us remember the words of the Secretary of State uttered in "another place."

"I am bound to say, after looking carefully into the financial condition of India, that I believe it will not be necessary, at least in the initial steps, to call on the Revenues of England."

If this means anything, it means that India is to defray the expenses of the war without the aid of England, unless the war assumes proportions beyond those then in the contemplation of the Government. It does not mean participation between England and India in the present financial year, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Hubbard) would fain hope that it does mean, in order that he may cast his vote with the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, frightened no doubt by the rapid contraction of the alleged surplus, stated yesterday that the Resolution of the Government did not "necessarily" mean that England should not aid in defraying the costs; but the Secretary of State for India distinctly declared his opinion that, in the present condition of Indian finance, he did not think that it would be necessary "to call on the Revenues of England." We must, therefore, take the Resolution as we find it, and presume that we are placing by our vote the cost of the war on the Revenues of India. Under ordinary circumstances, I think the principle of the Government is just. As a general principle of policy, it is obvious that Imperial Revenues should not be charged wholly at least with the expenses of local wars in any Empire, Dominion, or Colony of the Crown. If local revenues are not to be charged with the costs of local wars, there will be continual aggression and annexation of weak neighbours on frivolous pretexts. We all recollect the cry of anger when the Imperial Government left New Zealand to its own defence; but now the quarrels of Colonists and Natives are few in number and far less costly than they once were. If local revenues were generally made chargeable with local wars, even our dominions in South Africa would find means of living peaceably with their savage neighbours. I would make no exception in the case of India if I felt that its taxation had a fair incidence on those classes of the population who can influence public opinion, and who are responsible in some degree for peace or war. But this is not the case in India. Our highly-paid officials in the Civil Service engaged in Indian administration and the officers of the Army pay no income tax, and feel no result of the oppressiveness of war. The rich Native merchants and bankers of India contribute nothing of their earnings by direct taxation, except in the insignificant tax recently established of a licence on trades, a miserable sort of income tax which falls mainly on the poor, and affects only infinitesimally the rich. The main sources of the taxation, excluding opium, are derived from the 200,000,000 of Natives who have no representative voice to express how heavily taxation falls on the poorest classes of the Indian people. One-third of the Revenue is derived from land, and this ultimately becomes a tax on the food of the people. One-tenth of the Revenue is got by a poll tax of the worst description—by means of salt, an impost which lowers the health and diminishes the scanty comforts of the people, and prevents the development of the manufactures and industries which might better their position. The chief tax beyond these—for the salt tax produces more than the Customs and Excise combined—is the Revenue got from opium. This, of all sources of taxation, is the most precarious; because if China takes to growing opium itself—a likely enough incident—where would be the £6,000,000 or £7,000,000 of Revenue derived from it? We have lately seen countries—such as Holland and Turkey—suddenly cut off from a staple product of their land—the crop of madder—by a sudden withdrawal of the demand for it. The Revenue from opium can scarcely be deemed a permanent source of Revenue. I confess, therefore, that I am one of those who look at the state of Indian finance with serious apprehensions. You cannot increase the tax on land or on salt without hazarding the only protest which an unrepresented people can make—namely, insurrection. You cannot impose an income tax on the richer Natives without raising a clamour and discontent which may extend itself to the masses of the population, who already feel taxation keenly. It may ultimately be right to expose ourselves to this danger, because such a tax is just and right in political economy; but we are dealing with a country which knows nothing of political economy—one which simply views taxes as property derived by Government through conquest, and which is, to a certain extent, tolerant of unjust taxes, and yet fiercely intolerant of new taxes, though they are just. No wholesome check on local wars can at present be obtained by burdening Indian Revenues with the costs of a war beyond the Indian Frontier.

Mr. Lyon Playfair

Nevertheless, if this war were necessary for India, the costs should be borne by India. But it is a war avowedly undertaken for purposes of Imperial policy. One might say, in the words of Lord Lytton, that it is a war of the British Cabinet, were it not that Parliament, by a large majority, had sanctioned the war and made it one of Imperial policy. It is a war which proximately rose as the Russian answer to thrusting the Sepoy into the politics of Europe. Parliament approves of the war, and the country ought to be prepared to pay for that approval. At all events, I think it would be far better for this country to pay a large part—if not all—the extraordinary expenses of the war than to create dangers in our Indian Empire by increasing taxation in India. The costs are not known, but it is certain that the extraordinary costs must far exceed £1,200,000, while the fixed annual expenditure can scarcely be under £1,000,000, if the increase of the Army be maintained, and the scientific Frontier be secured. I have shown that unless you encroach on the Famine Insurance Fund there is no surplus available to meet this temporary or permanent expenditure, either this year or in subsequent years, with a Revenue so inelastic and unsound as that of India. India can only obtain the money either by loans, or by the increased taxation of the people. But the most able Viceroy and Finance Ministers see the dangers of increased taxation, and know not how to impose it. The taxation from which we derive our Revenue in this country is, no doubt, largely derived from the people; but it is levied on their luxuries, and not on their necessities. But the Indian people are struggling for existence in the sense that they live on a minimum of what is necessary to support existence, and have no surplus of wealth as fit subject for taxation, and yet we raise our taxes on the very necessities of life. You cannot proceed further in this direction without creating dangers far more serious to our Indian Empire than those which are threatened by an unsubstantial Muscovite spectre looming over the Frontier mountain ranges, like the spectre in the Hartz mountains. Why is it that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not more distinct in his assurances that English Revenue will be brought in aid of Indian Revenue for a war which has been brought on by Imperial policy? He knows well that if he gave such an assurance in positive terms, he is encroaching on the authority of Parliament by borrowing money from India to meet an expenditure for which no Supplies have been voted by Parliament. I am sure that he knows India too well to throw ultimately all the burdens of this Imperial war on its impoverished people. He knows, also, that this country is ill-fitted at present to bear increased taxation. He felt yesterday how sensitive it is on this subject, when he proposed to ask for a small sum in aid of distress in Turkey. There is distress at home nearly as keen, and growing in alarming proportions. Our industry is paralyzed, and our commerce is stagnant. We on this side of the House believe that the wars and rumours of war in which the Government indulge, as part of a spirited policy, prevent the revival of industry, and depress the condition of the people. It is sad, therefore, to join in a Vote which, if carried, will add to the burdens of the people of this country. But it is they who will it. The majority of their Representatives approve the policy of the Government, and the increasing Expenditure which this policy entails. Our people are still better able to pay the costs of war than the half-starved ryots of India; because, with us, all classes share in taxation, while the rich in India refuse to lighten the heavy burdens with the tips of their fingers. It is, then, because I believe it to be just that we should pay the costs of Imperial policy, and because it is dangerous to our Indian Empire to increase its taxation, that, with a sad heart, I record my vote for throwing the costs of the war on the Revenues of England.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON wished to say a few words to the House, for the reason that the right hon. Gentleman who had last addressed it entered somewhat into detail in reference to Indian finance, upon which his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State could not speak again. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that the principle contained in the Resolution was a sound one; but because a Conservative Government was in Office, he seemed to think that that principle must be reversed. Was it to be assumed that if a Liberal Government had been in power, and had the misfortune to become engaged in a war with Afghanistan, it would not contemplate placing any portion of the expenses of the war on the Revenues of India? The right hon. Gentleman had asked several questions—he wanted to know whether it was just and politic that India should pay the costs of the war; and, secondly, whether India could pay for it? With all deference to the right hon. Gentleman, the first question to be considered was, whether this was an Indian war? If it was an Indian war, India, as a matter of justice, ought to pay for it. He thought he could show that it was an Indian war. If he could prove that, then came a question which was quite distinct and separate—namely, was it expedient and politic that the whole cost of the war should be placed upon the Revenue of India? Upon that question many considerations would naturally arise. But was it an Indian war? Every Member of the House would, he thought, say that the Afghan War of 1837 was an Indian war. There was a Liberal Government in Office at that time; but he believed that they did not throw any portion of the cost of that war on the Revenues of England. On that occasion our Government deliberately and intentionally interfered with the internal affairs of Afghanistan, and the policy they pursued was so Indian that the whole cost of the war was defrayed by that country. Since that time we had advanced until our Frontiers touched those of Afghanistan; we had consolidated our power, and the Indian Revenues had passed more directly under the administration of the Crown; but that did not mean that India had lost all concern in the questions which had led to the present war. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) said that Lord Lytton stated that the Frontier question was an indivisible part of the great Imperial question to be decided by the foreign policy of the Government; and the hon. Member, therefore, assumed that the whole cost of the war should be borne by the Imperial Exchequer. But who made it an Imperial question? It was Lord Lawrence, whose policy, which had failed, was this—that if we kept perfectly still the Afghan Ruler would incline to us, not from love of us, but from greater fear of Russia. But, unfortunately, in 1869 Lord Lawrence suggested to the English Government that they should remonstrate with Russia, and receive assurances from Russia as to what she intended doing in Central Asia; and it was then that the question of the Frontiers of India came into prominence. But no one would contend that the interest of India was less in having a secure Frontier, because the Imperial Government had exercised its moral influence in order to obtain a certain assurance from Russia. The present war was, he considered, nothing less than a purely Indian question. Did anyone suppose that we should be now at war with Afghanistan if we did not possess India? He would go further, and say that we should not have taken the interest we had done for the last 20 years in the Eastern Question if we had not possessed India. He believed that if they were to strike a balance between the expenditure England had borne for India, and that which India had borne for England, the result would be very much to the advantage of India. The Crimean War arose, to some extent, from our being a great Eastern Power; and from that time until the present we had constantly, both by expeditions and otherwise, incurred expenses which we should not have incurred if we had not possessed our Indian Empire. Well, it had been assumed that the Indian Revenue would be unfairly dealt with if it were made to bear the cost of the war, as the cost of this war ought, in some degree, to be shared by the Home Government. Those who held to this assumption ought not to forget the heavy price England paid every year for the maintenance of India. England maintained India mainly for the benefit of India. The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), some time ago, described the position of India accurately, when he said it was a mistake to suppose that India was a rich country; the great majority of the people were poor; and he said that the impression to which he had referred was derived from the fact that India had always fallen an easy prey to the rapacious. Well, the task of England was to protect the weak; and for that purpose it was necessary for her to have a large force of British troops in India. In fact, if it were not thought necessary to make a play on the word

Lord George Hamilton

"Imperial," there was no sort of ground for saying that the present was any other than an Indian war. He was much interested as to what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) would say on this subject. The right hon. Gentleman had told the House that England had a great interest in India—that it was the interest which the gambler had in the gaming-table. Well, but nobody would say that because a gambler ruined himself at the gaming-table, therefore someone else should pay his debts. He had, he thought, shown that the present was an Indian question; and that, as a matter of justice, India should bear the whole expenditure of the war. But, no doubt, there were other matters to be considered. They all knew that, according to the Act of Parliament, no part of the Revenue of India could be expended for military operations beyond the Frontiers of India without the consent of Parliament; and his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State had adopted the exact words of the Act in framing his Resolution. His hon. Friend had stated more than once in his speech—and his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated more than once in answering Questions—that the passing of the Resolution would not in any way prejudice or prejudice the ultimate apportionment of the cost of the war; but before any money could be advanced out of the Indian Treasury, it was necessary that it should be sanctioned by Parliament. What they really had to consider, therefore, was not so much what was the actual condition of Indian finance, but what was the condition of the cash balances. He believed that they were unusually high; and that if it was necessary to advance the whole sum required this year for the carrying on of the war no inconvenience would be caused by such a measure. Then as to the question of expediency. Was it expedient or politic that India should bear the whole cost of the war? That depended upon three conditions—first, the condition of Indian finance at the end of the financial year; next, the cost of the war at the end of the financial year; and, thirdly, what proportions the war was likely to assume after the end of the financial year. On these points it was absolutely necessary that the Government and the House, before arriving at a conclusion, should have full, complete, and reliable information. At the present moment, less than a month after our troops had crossed the Frontier, their information, derived chiefly from telegrams, was necessarily meagre. With respect to the condition of Indian finance, for the last few years the estimates have been extremely accurate, the surplus being usually in excess of the estimate. On this subject of Indian finance he must express his surprise at observations made in reference to the salt tax. It had been asserted, over and over again, in the course of the debate, that the Indian Government had raised the salt tax 40 per cent on a starving population. [Mr. LYON PLAYFAIR: In Madras and Bombay.] Well, that limitation was not made so clear as it might have been. Last year he explained fully what was the cause of the increase. For years past the Indian Government had been anxious to deal with the salt tax with a view to equalize it; for whereas in Bengal the salt tax was 52 annas per maund, in Madras and Bombay it was only 29 annas, and, in order to prevent the lighter taxed salt passing into the more heavily taxed districts, there existed a Customs line some thousands of miles in length, which was a great source of inconvenience and annoyance to the neighbouring population. There were two ways of dealing with the subject—to level up, or to level down. Now to level up would have been most unwise and impolitic, because it would have increased over a great part of India a very heavy tax on one of the necessities of life. On the other hand, to level down to the Madras and Bombay rate last year was not possible; because, owing to the tremendous famine expenditure of the previous four years, it was absolutely necessary that the Indian Government should get fresh Revenue, and it would have been impossible for them to say—"We want fresh Revenue, but we will reduce the amount we derive from salt;" for, after all, notwithstanding the objections made to the salt tax in this country, there was no portion of the Indian Revenue so easily collected or so willingly paid. Sir John Strachey, therefore, said—

"I am obliged to raise a larger income, because so much has been spent in Madras and Bombay in relieving famine: but, at the same time, I cannot exempt Madras and Bombay from the increased taxation; it would be absolutely contrary to every principle of local financial responsibility to exempt a district which is specially benefited by the additional money raised."

So Sir John Strachey, while exempting Madras and Bombay from certain taxes imposed on other parts of India, said—

"I will level up the salt duties in Madras and Bombay in order that I may level down elsewhere."

The result of that step, which when communicated to Parliament last year met with great support, was, that although an increase had been made in the salt duty in the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay, which numbered a population of 48,000,000, a heavy reduction had been made in other parts of India which numbered 137,000,000. Never, in his opinion, was there a more beneficial reform than that effected by Sir John Strachey; and he did not think it fair of hon. Gentlemen to be constantly carping at the Indian Government, and stating in vague terms that the salt tax had been raised 40 per cent, without mentioning that there had been a corresponding reduction in the amount of duty paid by a very large proportion of the population. Into the question of the licence tax and others it was hardly necessary to go. He admitted—and the Indian Government admitted—that there were many objections to them; but seeing that the hon. Member for Hackney had been, of all men in the world, the most instrumental in inducing the Indian Government to abolish the income tax, it was rather hard of him to complain of the tax which they had been compelled to substitute, though it might, in some respects, be more objectionable still. He now came to the question of the surplus. According to the latest information, the Indian Government estimated its surplus at £1,541,000. But, it was stated, the whole of that was pledged to the Famine Insurance Fund. Well, he could quite understand hon. Members objecting to the appropriation to one purpose of money which had been raised for another; but as regarded the Famine Insurance Fund, there were one or two peculiar circumstances to be stated. It was originally estimated that the taxes imposed would raise about £1,500,000. It so happened, however, that the taxes were not imposed so soon as the Indian Government wished; and the consequence was, that during the present financial year they would only yield £1,200,000. Moreover, £500,000 was already disbursed in relieving distress in Madras, Bombay, and elsewhere, and that deducted from the £1,200,000, reduced the total amount of the Famine Insurance Fund this year to £700,000. Against this, as he had stated, there was a surplus of £1,541,000; and assuming, as his hon. Friend (Mr. E. Stanhope) calculated, that a sum of £940,000 was advanced out of the Indian cash balances towards defraying the cost of the expedition into Afghanistan, £600,000 of surplus would still remain. In other words, the present Motion, if acted upon, would only make the amount at the disposal of the Indian Government £100,000 short of that required to carry out their intentions, as announced in their Budget. Now, the small difference between £600,000 and £700,000 was hardly sufficient, he thought, to justify the strong language used by hon. Members, who seemed to assume that the Indian Government were departing altogether from the pledges they had given; for even if every penny of the war costs were to be paid by the Indian Government, there would be almost enough left to enable them to carry out their intentions of last year.

MR. CHILDERS: Are we to understand that the £500,000 alluded to as spent upon Famine was included in the estimated expenditure of the Budget irrespective of the £1,500,000?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The £500,000, he believed, was included in the ordinary expenditure; but his right hon. Friend would obtain details of that kind from the Under Secretary of State. In placing these statements before the House he had endeavoured to show that no financial inconvenience to India would result from the adoption of the Motion before them; while the Government would be enabled at a subsequent period to arrange equitably the amount of war expenditure to be borne by India and England respectively. If the Amendment were adopted, the whole of the expenditure, except that for the increase of the Native Army, would fall upon the English Revenue exclusively. Now, what would be the result? Loans or subsidies to India for public works were clearly impolitic—and the hon. Member for Hackney admitted them to be so—because there would be no checking the fancies of Engineers in India if their schemes were to be paid for out of the English Exchequer. Could anyone doubt that the same argument applied with even more force to military operations? Were it understood that the cost of no matter what expedition undertaken by the military authorities in India would be defrayed by England, the authority of the Viceroy and his Council over the many gallant and able Generals who were burning to distinguish themselves would be greatly weakened. He hoped, therefore, that the House would assent to the proposal of his hon. Friend. At the same time, he did not mean to contend that the Indian Revenues should necessarily bear the whole cost of military expeditions. He was quite ready to admit that there had been times when it was attempted to diminish the English Estimates at the expense of the Indian Revenues; but while he was at the India Office he always set his face against anything of the kind; and since the present Government had been in Office there had been no attempt to saddle the Indian Revenue with improper charges. The adoption of the Motion of his hon. Friend would not lead to any departure from the rule. It would leave the Government completely free, and would enable them, on a future occasion, to divide, as they and as the House might think proper, the expense of the war between India and England. In view of this, and considering that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney would pledge them to meet out of English Revenues any expense which might be incurred by the Indian troops in Afghan territory, he could not doubt but that the House would support, by a large majority, the Motion of his hon. Friend.

Lord George Hamilton

SIR HENRY JAMES said, the Attorney General had claimed, on the part of the Government, the right to expend Indian finances upon military operations beyond the Frontier of India before the consent of Parliament was obtained. If that right did not exist, the claim ought to be met with a clear denial; if it did exist, it was time for Parliament to consider whether there ought not to be further legislation on the subject; but he believed, with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), that the present Administration had broken the statute affecting the Government of India. Notwithstanding what had fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it could not be assumed that this was another occasion, to be added to an already long list, on which the views of the hon. and learned Attorney General were to be disclaimed by the Government, and it must be inferred that the claim put forward was one which the Government meant to enforce. If the Government insisted upon this right to bring into the Dominions of the Crown other than India the forces of India without the consent of Parliament, and if it also claimed the right to expend the finances of India in relation to wars beyond the Frontier of India, and if both claims were conceded, it was clear that power would be conferred upon the Crown to carry on war without the consent of Parliament, and without any check whatever. He was not endeavouring to attack the Prerogative of the Crown to declare war if it thought proper; but, if the claim were made to employ the troops and the money of India in a war beyond the Frontier, there ought to be some check in the hands of Parliament, and such check was provided by the Act of 1858. The 54th section imposed upon the Government the duty of communicating to Parliament within three months the fact that hostilities had been carried on, and this clause referred to all hostilities, both within the Frontier and beyond the Frontier, and whether arising from sudden emergency or not. That was one check clear and distinct from any other; but the next clause imposed an entirely different check; it did not deal with wars carried on within Indian territory, but with those carried on beyond the Frontier, and not arising under circumstances of urgent necessity. The language was so plain that it did not need interpretation, though if it did it would be found in the debates of 1858. The clause said that—

“Except for preventing or repelling actual invasion of Her Majesty's Indian possessions, or under other sudden and urgent necessity, the Revenues of India shall not, without the consent of both Houses of Parliament, be applicable to defray the expenses of any Military operations carried on beyond the external frontiers of such possessions.”

The hon. and learned Attorney General said that if the consent of Parliament were obtained at any time, that would be a sufficient compliance with the statute, because the earlier section contemplated the carrying on of war before it was announced to Parliament, and the consequent expenditure of money; but it was overlooked that that section applied to wars within the Frontier as well as beyond it, however they might arise. The hon. and learned Attorney General admitted that the subject was surrounded with great difficulty, and he said it was true that if money were spent on a war beyond the Frontier, and Parliament refused to sanction its repayment, there would be no means of replacing it; but still the hon. and learned Gentleman contended that it was enough to obtain what he called the subsequent "ratification" of Parliament. But ratification was the wrong term to use; it was admissible in a case in which, for example, an agent acted for the benefit of, and on behalf of, another; but if there was an independent body whose consent had not been asked, but whose consent ought to have been obtained to a certain act, then that body could not subsequently ratify, but only condone, what had been done. Money had been spent on this war without the consent of Parliament being first obtained; and if Parliament should refuse its sanction the money could not now be replaced, and the Government would be reduced to the necessity of coming to Parliament for an Act of Indemnity, which, in fact, the present Resolution amounted to. When a certain thing was to be done with a certain consent only, what right had the Government to do it without consent, and to stand the chance of what they called its being ratified, when the case was not one of either urgency or necessity? It did not follow that India should be invaded or placed in jeopardy, and no measures taken to defend it, without the consent of Parliament, because it was distinctly provided that money might be spent in case of invasion or other sudden and urgent necessity. In the absence of such emergency there was no more right to anticipate the consent of Parliament than there was on the part of a sportsman to shoot over another man's land on the chance of obtaining his consent afterwards. Without troubling the House further with the legal question, he must say he had heard with astonishment and regret the doctrine propounded by the hon. and learned Attorney General, and he trusted it would not receive the sanction of anyone who valued the privileges of Parliament. He now wished to state briefly the reasons why he should vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). The first question with him was, whether this war was in every sense an Indian war, and whether it was necessary for the protection of our North-Western Frontier? They were told last night very fairly, by the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), that this war had arisen out of European complications. It was a war which found its origin in Europe, and, like every Afghanistan War, it sprang from the fear and action of a European Power. In 1843 there was a most interesting debate in that House in relation to a war which had arisen from circumstances very much in common with the present war. Out of 75 Members who voted against that Afghan War three only remained, and two of them stated their views so clearly and distinctly that he would take the liberty of reading some extracts from their speeches. Mr. Roebuck said they feared Russia, and therefore attacked Dost Mahomed. They were afraid of the powerful, and therefore they jealously attacked the weak. They had a great enemy, and therefore they turned on their weak ally. The noble Lord the Postmaster General (Lord John Manners) spoke of that war as disgraceful, and inflicting a stain on his conscience which he was anxious to wipe out. No doubt the noble Lord entertained similar views with reference to the present war with Afghanistan. There was another conspicuous Member of the House who spoke on that occasion, who strongly repudiated the idea that our Frontier required protection, and who gave it as his opinion that no boundary could be more perfect before the invasion of Afghanistan. That speaker was Mr. Disraeli. The question of finance also arose in 1842. The expedition was undertaken, it was said, to check Russia; and on what ground, it was asked, could the people of England refuse to pay the bill? The operations were undertaken to check a European Power, and how could the Government refuse to defray its expenses? That was the language attributed to Mr. Disraeli. There were reasons why it would be most inexpedient to give authority and power to the Government to place all this expenditure on the finances of India. It would tempt them to go to war with an almost unlimited supply of Native troops, who were, in a sense, mercenary; and though in this case the war was conducted by a mixed army, still the evil existed to a great extent. He could not conceive any time more perilous than the present for imposing additional taxation upon the people of India. Since the present Viceroy of India occupied his high office he had adopted measures which were calculated to cause extreme irritation among the Natives of India. Lord Lytton had obtained for the Executive the right of interfering with the discretion of the Judicial Bench in that country; he had also obtained sanction to a measure which was calculated to destroy the independence of the Indian vernacular Press, and to prevent, on the part of that Press, a free expression of public opinion; and there could be no doubt that taxation in India had grown to such an extent that, if ever the ordinary average production of the country failed, and famine again swept over the land, the Natives would immediately fall prostrate before it. It was upon such a people, in such a condition, that the Government asked by this Resolution that the whole burden of the war should be thrown. He knew it would be answered that the Resolution did not throw the whole of the burden upon the Natives of India. But to its uncertainty he objected. He would rather that the Natives of India should know what their real position was. It seemed to him worse for us to say, not that we were to bear the burden, or that India was to bear it, but that it was to be left to the Government to decide who should bear it. When this substantive proposition of the Under Secretary of State was put that the Government should have that discretion, he would say "No" to it. He would not now enter upon the question whether the burden should be cast upon the two countries. It might be said that by the sympathy of the two countries in this war benefit might accrue to India. That might be the case; but when he saw that the Resolution gave the Government, apart from the sanction of Parliament, the power to throw the whole burden of this contest upon India, he could not bring himself to vote for it.

Sir Henry James

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) said, before referring to the question of law, he was desirous of saying one word upon general topics. He did not purpose, however, to go 35 years back in order to do so. This only he would say—that it did not strike him as quite logical to assume that because a war 35 years ago was unjust, a war waged under entirely different circumstances now must be unjust also. His hon. and learned Friend suggested that some supposed conduct of the Viceroy of India rendered it inappropriate to charge the expenses of the war on the Indian Revenues, as it was calculated to irritate the Natives, and render them impatient of additional taxation. He had the honour to discuss with his hon. and learned Friend at the time the circumstances arose the point referred to. Lord Lytton, for the protection of the life of the Natives, had told one of the judicial authorities that he had not done his duty; but he never claimed any right over the Judicial Bench. The Judicial Bench possessed some executive functions; and the Viceroy, with regard to these, did exercise the same kind of authority over the Judicial Bench which his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary exercised over the magistracy.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, he referred to a letter which Lord Lytton despatched to the Secretary of State for India, in which he claimed authority over the Judicial Bench, and the Secretary of State for India sanctioned the claim.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD) said, the fact was that there were certain executive powers possessed by the judicial body, but not in their judicial capacity, and it was with respect to these powers that the Viceroy exercised his authority. That was the explanation which he gave his hon. and learned Friend at the time the matter was under discussion. Very naturally his hon. and learned Friend disregarded his opinion; but the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) was of the same opinion, and his hon. and learned Friend disregarded that also. As to the legality of the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government and the construction to be placed upon the Statute, he did not intend to give any dogmatic opinion, as was done last night. One or two Gentlemen said they had no doubt the Government had broken the law, and the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) had said the same. But in Courts of Law you did not advance a question much by simply asserting it. He was going to show that it was neither "extraordinary nor surprising," as his hon. and learned Friend had said, that the Attorney General should have put on the Statute the construction which he had. Hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to apply themselves to the language of two consecutive sections as if the Act of Parliament was contained in them. But you must take the whole purview and aim of the Statute, otherwise you could not see the bearing of any particular sections on the Act of which they formed a part. Marginal notes formed no part of the Statute; but the headings of chapters formed a part of it as much as the provisions themselves. Now, from the 41st to the 55th sections inclusive all applied to the Revenues of India. By the 54th and 55th sections, taken together, the framers of the Statute contemplated this case—that war might be made without the consent of the Council and without immediate communication to Parliament; it might be going on even during the Session of Parliament for a period of three months. But within 14 days this war was announced to Parliament; whereas, by the express language of the Statute, the communication might be kept back for three months if Parliament was sitting. No doubt the framers of the Act were not insensible to the fact that from September to February Parliament might not be sitting, so that you might have a war going on from September to March without the sanction of Parliament, and in contemplating that contingency they were, no doubt, thinking what might become of the Revenues of India under such circumstances. The 54th section would have no application whatever, unless that construction of the Act were admitted. His hon. and learned Friend had to do the most extraordinary violence to the language of the Act. He said that hostilities must be confined within Her Majesty's Possessions. But, in the first place, hostilities in India necessarily involved hostilities outside the Dominions of Her Majesty. You do not speak of rebellion as the commencement of hostilities; and the hypothesis was that hostilities were to be carried on outside the Dominions of Her Majesty. The pressure of his hon. and learned Friend's argument required him to consider these words "hostilities in India" to mean hostilities confined within the Possessions of Her Majesty in India. But that appeared to be absolutely inconsistent with the reasonable construction to be placed on the words. His hon. and learned Friend sought to introduce into the 55th section the words "without the previous consent of Parliament." But it was a bad mode of construing an Act of Parliament to put in words which were not there already. He did not see why his hon. and learned Friend should put words into the Act which Parliament had not put into it. Let them bear in mind that the House was not dealing with a case of invasion. The country had to consider a case where they had to attack a foe—where an expedition was to be sent forth. Did his hon. and learned Friend suppose that the Legislature intended these sections as a trammel on the action of the military authorities when action was, as in this case, absolutely necessary? The contention of his hon. and learned Friend, that the moment the troops crossed the Frontier their charge on the Indian Revenue became illegal without the consent of Parliament, which it was impossible to obtain, hardly required serious refutation. He was, of course, speaking of ordinary cases of warfare, conducted on the ordinary principles, according to which an enemy must not be warned of the point at which he is to be attacked. To say that, under the circumstances that had arisen, not a single soldier could be legally sent across the Frontier without the consent of Parliament, at the charge of the Indian Revenue, was to reduce the two clauses in question to such an absurdity that it would require very strong reasoning to induce him to believe that that was the intention of Parliament. He was contented to read the Act of Parliament according to the plain common-sense meaning of the words. The Act of Parliament did not say the Executive must not proceed without the consent of Parliament. It said that the House should not bind the Indian Revenue without that consent. That seemed to him to be a reasonable and just construction of both sections of the Act.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR expressed an opinion that this war ought never to have taken place. Now that it was commenced, however, one great object should be to take care that the means were sufficiently provided for bringing it to an end as speedily as possible. To this end they ought to know whether they had sufficient European forces in the country where the war was being carried on to bring it to a successful issue. They had begun this war, as in several previous wars—particularly the first Afghan War—with a peace establishment. Indeed, it was only a few months ago that the attention of the Secretary of State for War was called to the fact that the total European Infantry force for the garrison of India was below its fixed strength to the extent of numbers nearly sufficient for three battalions. Even now, though the total fixed strength was kept up, yet there were about 36 battalions considerably below their proper establishment, and about 16 so far above as to equal the deficiency in the 36 battalions. An instance of the danger from allowing the European troops to fall down in India would be apparent if they looked back to the 1st of January, 1857, only three months before the Mutiny. They would then find, by the printed Returns, that the European strength was between 5,000 and 7,000 below the number that ought to have been in India. Many of the great losses sustained might have been prevented if the proper strength had been kept up. That was a lesson which the country ought to have taken to heart before now; but it had not been attended to, for he feared it was too true that the gallant 72nd had crossed the Frontier into Afghanistan with only 640 men. To allow a regiment to fall 200 below its complement was a dangerous thing to do. That was only one regiment, and no doubt the Returns would show other regiments to be far under their strength. Another great deficiency was in the estimated expenditure for this war—about £1,000,000 sterling for the year 1878-9 had been mentioned. But the very small cost of this war for the remainder of this year was further contrasted with the flourishing state of the finances. That, as indicated by the Secretary and Under Secretary of State for India, had, indeed, taken the country by surprise. He was certainly not prepared to find that there should be no less a sum than £2,000,000 of surplus on the Revenues of India in the year 1878-9; because, in the last few years, there had been deficiencies of that amount in the ordinary income as against the ordinary expenditure; and it was difficult for him to comprehend how the surplus had sprung up, and how it would be available to carry on this war without resorting to other financial sources. The statement submitted to the House as to how this surplus arose was so arranged as to be incapable of verification; because the Budget for 1878-9, to which the figures referred, was withheld. The figures in the Memorandum merely stated the excesses and deficiencies on several items of income, without showing the total sums in the Budget on which those charges arose. The remarkable contrast between this flourishing finance and the figures of the Budget for 1877-8, the last laid before Parliament, was found in the fact that that Budget showed an excess of ordinary expenditure over income to the extent of £3,383,381, and, including the extraordinary expenditure, to the extent of £8,286,666. The change, then, from this great excess of outlay to one of excess of income over expenditure, was one of the most incomprehensible of all financial results. He had had some experience in War Estimates. The cost of the last Afghan War amounted to about £4,000,000 per annum; and while there were 18,000 men employed in it, we had now something like 34,000 men—so that the expense of the present war might be expected to be greater, instead of much less, than that of the former war. The sum estimated as the charge for this year was so small that it could only be shown in the accounts at that amount by not bringing forward the charges actually incurred, on the plea of being mere advances, or by not having the bills paid sent in within the year. Both practices were open to the gravest objection. He urged upon the House the necessity of carefully looking into the finances of India, for he believed they were in a most dangerous state. In 1842 Sir Robert Peel, when Prime Minister, with the first Afghan War still going on, said the time might come when the state of the Indian finances would require aid from this country. He thought the time was fast coming when the apprehensions of Sir Robert Peel on that subject would be realized. Those who were best acquainted with India well knew how serious was the danger from putting on additional taxes. It only remained to protest against the increased and increasing taxation in India. It was not only unfair to the people, but dangerous to our power. In the East, oppressive taxation was the main cause of dissatisfaction and the cause of risings of populations. Instead of avoiding the evil ways of Eastern Princes they were imitating and enforcing their bad courses, and with the more danger, because they backed up that practice with a powerful military force, so that the openings for risings, as under Native Rulers, was prevented. The result would be deadly hatred against their taxation and, consequently, of their rule. Those remarks were made with regard to the speech of the noble Lord the Vice President (Lord George Hamilton), who had, he regretted to hear, again made allusion to the question of the equalization of taxation in India—as if that taxation had been lessened. It had, on the contrary, been largely added to, on the pretext of providing for famines. And the first use made of the Fund raised for that object was to spend it in war. Again, when the noble Lord spoke about equalization in reference to the salt tax, he should have referred to the great inequalities in the land tax. It was a fact—partly in consideration of the salt tax at the time of the permanent settlement—that in Bengal that land tax was set at a low rate, in comparison with the area and population; while in Madras the land tax was high, at the time we took the territories from the Nabob of the Carnatic, because the salt tax was very moderate. The population of Bengal was nearly double that of Madras, and the cultivated area was believed to be nearly double; and yet Madras paid £4,500,000 for land tax, and Bengal but £3,000,000.

General Sir George Balfour

That was not equal taxation, in his opinion. The land tax of Madras was settled in the first year of this century at a high rate, because there was no salt monopoly, such as then existed in Bengal. But in 1805 a small salt tax was converted into a close and costly monopoly. This was initiated by orders from Bengal, and since then many additions had been made to the Madras burdens under the same dictation; and so high had that salt impost been raised, that Madras alone contributed about one-fourth of the total amount collected in all India from the salt tax. He declared it was unjust to impose on the poorest classes in India the excessive salt tax, as it was imposed at the present time. Out of a net income, for all India, of £37,000,000 sterling, £6,000,000 were raised from the salt tax, and the bulk of that amount from the classes who were, above all others, most unable to spare the money. Although they were engaged in a war with Afghanistan, no person could tell in what way they intended to rectify their Frontier. They had had, with respect to Afghanistan, different proposals, which included very large operations, that might involve us in serious difficulties. So far back as 1868 Sir Henry Rawlinson—then a Member of that House—submitted to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer a proposal to occupy Herat, Candahar, and Quetta. Since then he had become a Member of the Council of the Secretary of State, and had published his former proposal, with a statement of the garrison needed for that occupation. The force named, of 10,000 men, appeared very far below the number needed. The Papers recently laid before Parliament were totally devoid of proofs in support of our proposed or our present policy. No doubt Lord Napier of Magdala had supplied a Memorandum, dated in May last, condemning the past policy; but it must be borne in mind that Lord Napier was not now in any office which involved official responsibility for Indian affairs. Nay, more; although Lord Napier had been a Member of the Governments of the last six Viceroys—from Lord Canning to Lord Lytton—and had been the Commander-in-Chief of Bombay and of all India, yet he had never before recorded disapproval of the past policy, so far as the Papers showed; but, on the contrary, had opposed, as he stated, the advance on Quetta. In 1867 the Government of India had under their consideration a proposal to advance their Forces as far as Quetta, when General Jacob urged this advance. But there must be some mistake in this; because General Jacob was dead before Lord Napier became a member of Lord Canning's Council. That proposal emanated from the Government of Bombay; and as Lord Napier of Magdala was then Commander-in-Chief of the Army of that Presidency, it might be supposed that his opinion on this military movement must have been expressed. It was to be regretted that these Papers had been kept back from Parliament; because they saw from chance passages that the proposal was fully considered by Lord Lawrence's Government. At that time Sir William Mansfield was Commander-in-Chief, and his Minute, dated October 5, 1867, was entirely against the advance to Quetta. Sir Henry Norman also stated that his Memorandum of October 5, 1867, contained strong opinions against that advance. They also learnt that other Minutes were recorded by Lord Lawrence and members of the Council entirely at variance with the proposals then made; but those Minutes had never been laid before Parliament, though repeated applications had been made for them. That was more objectionable, because the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was then Secretary of State; and it would be useful to contrast his then views with those of the present Government as to our movements in advance. It might also be inferred from the Papers that the cost of that proposal was calculated out; so that when Sir William Mansfield opposed the advance on Quetta, he probably thought that the money to be spent on that movement might be better employed, without going so far away from the base of our operations. Those Papers should be produced, not only to supply information, but to enable the House to ascertain the then views of the Bombay Commander-in-Chief. The hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) having quoted the strong speeches of the noble Lord the Postmaster General in 1842 against the former Afghan War, he (Sir George Balfour) would quote from a pamphlet published by the noble Lord in 1843, in which he described the Chinese and Afghan Wars of that time as a piece of insolent dictation on our part, and he must express his regret that the noble Lord, when in Office, had now changed his opinions in favour of the justice of this war. The pamphlet of the noble Lord was worthy the perusal of hon. Members. In it would be found lamentations over the ruin and desolation which was coming on England by reason of our wars and our wasteful expenditure, public and private. This decay of England was then the fashion of a set of young men to put forward; and the noble Lord urged, as an indication of that decadence, the decrease of Maypoles. But a far more sensible statement was therein made by the noble Lord, who pointed out that the nation had recently spent

"Untold millions in slaughtering the Afghans and the Chinese, because the former would not submit to our insolent dictation, and the latter to our invasion of their fiscal Code."

These last quoted youthful views were far more consistent with right and justice than those now held by the noble Lord as to the necessity for this war, and as to our right to occupy Quetta under Treaty rights. No doubt a Treaty made in 1854 with the Khan of Khelat did give that right; but there were two Treaties made in 1839 by Sir Alexander Burnes, and another by Sir James Outram in 1841, which distinctly recognized Khelat as owning allegiance and fealty to the Afghan Government. The Treaty of 1841 was cancelled by the Treaty of 1854, but not with the consent of the Ruler of Afghanistan; and the 1839 Treaty had never been abrogated, though they had styled it a "dead letter." On those grounds, the occupation of Quetta had always appeared to him a very doubtful matter; and he had always thought that the Ameer of Afghanistan had a fair claim to be consulted, and his objections removed, before we marched our troops to Quetta. We had entered into a Treaty, by force and violence, with the Khan of Khelat; whereas we should at that very time have arranged with Dost Mahomed, when that Ameer was our friend, for leave to occupy Quetta. The scheme had been further developed; and now the intention was, to all appearance, to occupy Candahar, and probably eventually to force us on to Herat. He warned the Government against the danger of their policy. It involved very serious complications and difficulties. Their present costly Army in India was quite insufficient for the additional strain for those new garrisons. The finances of India could not be increased, and their political responsibilities must be vastly swelled up. And he regretted that those complications had been brought about by the Government refusing to continue the negotiations with the Ameer. With regard to the Ameer's main objection to the more close alliance between the Governments—namely, the admission of British officers into his country—he might remind the House that when they were taking up the cause of Shah Soojah he had particularly requested that British officers should not be allowed to interfere with his Government—a circumstance that proved the desire of the Afghans for absolute independence. Even when Sir John Lawrence and Sir Herbert Edwardes negotiated the 1857 Treaty with Dost Mahomed, and though they then agreed to pay large subsidies, yet that Ruler insisted on conditions which so thoroughly restricted the interference of British officers as to enable the Ruler at Candahar to keep the Lumsden Mission—sent there to see to the proper application of our funds—in a virtual state of imprisonment. It was much to be regretted that the war had been begun, or had been found necessary, from the forced closing of the negotiations. He could not help thinking that if Sir Lewis Pelly, Major Cavagnari, and Dr. Bellew had been allowed to carry on their negotiations by themselves, under general instructions from the Viceroy, they would have been more successful in securing an agreement on all essentials, without entailing conditions hateful to the people and Rulers of Afghanistan. The freedom formerly given to Indian politicians to work out negotiations on broad instructions, without too close an adherence to details, was the secret of success in past years. When negotiators met with less interference, they were individually interested in securing agreement. With those remarks he would close by adding that, in all probability, the result of the war would be to reduce, rather than increase, their influence within India; and he could only regret that the position which the Government had taken up to strengthen their Frontiers would produce such evil results as to endanger the peace and security of the heart of the Empire.

MR. BALFOUR said, that not long since the Government had been taunted by the Opposition with making arrangements which would confuse the discussion before the House; but now the Opposition had themselves inflicted this inconvenience on the House by introducing into that debate speeches with a special bearing upon the question they had been considering last week. This example he did not propose to follow. He would confine himself to two questions—namely, the legality of the Government's action with regard to the Act of 1858, which had been disputed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and the question raised by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) as to whether this was or was not an Indian War. With regard to the first of these questions, he would not enter into any minute verbal criticisms. He relied upon the intention of the Legislature in passing the 54th clause of the Act. There could be no doubt that its object had been rightly described by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. It had in view, as he had stated, a limitation of the power of the Crown in declaring war. But the accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman had ended there. There could be no doubt that the whole object of that clause was to put the making of war with Indian troops on exactly the same footing as the making of war with English troops. Its purpose was not to put extra restraints upon the Royal Prerogative in India, but to reduce the power of the Crown in India to the same footing on which it stood with respect to English troops in Europe—for previously to 1858 the Royal Prerogative in India had been much greater than at home. This view had the support of many high authorities. The late Lord Derby, for example, at the time of the Abyssinian War, had declared that the object of the Act of 1858 was to place the Crown in exactly the same position in India as it already occupied in Europe. During the 20 years that had elapsed since the passing of the Act the English Government had twice pursued precisely the same course as on the present occasion—in the Abyssinian War and the China War of 1859-60. The latter war was carried on by a Ministry of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich was Chancellor of Exchequer; and on that occasion the right hon. Gentleman dealt with regard to Indian Revenues precisely as the present Government were now doing. In the debates upon the Abyssinian War the right hon. Gentleman raised the same objection as now, and he had been met by the reply that he and his Colleagues had acted similarly with regard to the China War. His answer was that that was a case of sudden and urgent necessity, and that therefore their action had been covered by the Act. But surely in the present case, as in every other, it lay with the Government to decide what was and what was not a case of urgent necessity. If that were not so the clause of the Act of 1858 was no more than waste paper. He would now pass on to the point of equity which had been raised by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). The hon. Member had more than once announced beforehand to the House that he could prove this war to be, on the showing of the Government themselves, a European war; and he (Mr. Balfour) had, therefore, looked forward to the speech of the hon. Member with much curiosity. But when it came to the point they found that his only argument was founded upon the use of the word "Imperialism"—a word which had been used much more often on the other side of the House than by the supporters of the Government. The hon. Member had touched upon the subject very lightly, and had soon gone off to his favourite topic—the poverty of India and the riches of England, the selfish conduct of Anglo-Indians, and the general shortcomings of Secretaries of State. The argument from Imperialism amounted to very little, because the word was used to signify a good many different things. His definition of it was this—that they recognized themselves as parts of a great Empire spread over the world which had great responsibilities and duties; and, further, that this was not a burden to be grumbled at and thrown off at the first opportunity, but one that had great privileges which no English Government would have the courage to throw off, whatever its Members might say when they were not in power. There could be no doubt but that the immediate occasion of the war was an insult offered to England; but the more profound cause of the war was the necessity which every Indian Government felt, and must feel, of keeping Afghanistan in such a position that it should be not a menace, but a cause of safety to India. That feeling lay at the root of all our Indian policy, and it was on that ground that he asserted that if ever a war could be correctly described as an Indian war, this one deserved that title. Were we to leave India to-morrow, our successors would at once find that Afghanistan was not a place which could be left to become the centre of intrigue and of military operations against that country. That was the case before we went to India; it was the case now, and it would be the case after we left there. Even if England had not been the possessor of India, the Russian movement in that direction would have been made sooner or later. In these circumstances, the House could not do better than reject the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney.

General Sir George Balfour

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Sir, although there has been a long debate on the Amendment to the Address, the House will remember that this is the debate which we are specially summoned to carry on, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer has explained to us that Parliament was summoned for the purpose of fulfilling the statutory obligation which made it necessary to consult the House of Commons, by which the money is to be provided for carrying on the war in which we are unfortunately engaged. That is the subject which we have now to discuss; but we cannot discuss this matter simply as a matter of revenue and finance. I think when you discuss finance it necessarily involves the discussion of the policy which has rendered it necessary for you to raise the money. We met on Thursday week; and the next morning I was very much surprised to read in "the leading journal" that Parliament was opened under very "happy auspices." Why, on that very day, an hour after we had met, one of the right hon. Gentlemen who sit on the Ministerial Benches got up and told us of a battle which had taken place in Afghanistan, and read a telegram stating that a very large number of the enemy had been killed, and 50 of our own men and two well-known officers had lost their lives. That was a day of slaughter and disaster in that country, and it seems to me extraordinary that in a Christian country that should be called a Parliament meeting "under happy auspices." In Her Majesty's gracious Speech she said that we should give full deliberation to this Afghan War—and by fully deliberating I mean gravely considering whether the war in which we are engaged is a war of policy and justice, or whether it might have been avoided and put a stop to. I do not think that is a question which we can discuss at too great length. The lives of our soldiers are at stake, and that is a matter to which too much importance cannot be attached. I have heard debates in this House as to saving the life of some criminal under sentence of death, and the House did not think it unnecessary to debate at length whether the man's life should be taken or spared. Is it not equally important to consider the lives of our brave soldiers now engaged in warfare in a distant land?—

"For when the life of man is in debate,
No time can be too long, no pains too great."

But that is not the only thing that makes our meeting a disastrous one. There were other things to be considered. There is an African War looming behind; we have banks breaking, mills stopping, masters failing, and men starving; and, so far from meeting under "happy auspices," I think the House has never met under more gloomy, humiliating, depressing, and disastrous circumstances. Let us, then, discuss whether this Afghan War is calculated to brighten the state of things which I have described. I am glad this question has been brought under discussion in the House of Commons, because it seems to me we have been living for the last two years in what might be called a Reign of Terror. We have not been allowed to enjoy free discussion in this country. ["Hear, hear!"] I hear the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) cheer. I do not know whether he cheers the remark, or is delighted at the fact that free discussion has been put down. He knows, as well as I do, that if anybody dared, in London at any rate, to speak in favour of peace, he would be assailed, not only with sneers and abuse, but with sticks and threats of violence. ["Hear, hear!"] Does the noble Lord who cheered remember the meetings in Hyde Park? I do not know whether he led the brigade on that occasion, but he was very likely among them. It is not out of place to allude to this, for I see by the papers that a new patriotic association has been formed with the object of informing and enlightening public opinion. That is, they intend to inform the public of what their opinions are, and to take good care to put down everybody else who expresses different opinions. That is what is called patriotism. I think, like the noble Lord, they are very mistaken patriots. Patriotism does not consist in singing "Rule Britannia" from morning till night, in flinging dead cats, or in sitting in a snug Editor's room and writing leading articles hounding on your countrymen to the slaughter and the death you yourself dare not face. Those are the true patriots who stand up for the truth even when it is unpopular; and there was far more patriotism in my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) bringing forward his Resolution—which he did in a masterly manner—even though he advocated an unpopular cause, than in singing "Jingo" songs and "Rule Britannia." I think that even in Her Majesty's gracious Speech from the Throne the Government did not deal frankly with the House. The Ministers make Her Majesty say—"I receive from all foreign Powers assurances of their friendly feelings." That may be the truth, but it does not express the whole truth; because I am quite sure there can be no friendly feelings entertained by them towards Russia. You call this a war with Afghanistan, but you are really fighting Russia. There can be no doubt about it. Why, the greatest panic-monger in the country would not be afraid of anything that Afghanistan could do. Even the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire would not be afraid of the Afghans, and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel)—the King of the Jingo—would not be so absurd as to say that we were afraid of anything the Afghans could do. No:—and because you were afraid to attack Russia, afraid to attack the big one, you set to work to fight the little one. That appears to me to be as plain as any fact in ancient or modern history. Do you remember what you did at the Island of Tanna? It appeared that a murder had been committed, and one of Her Majesty's ships was sent to catch the murderer. They could not catch him, but they caught his brother, and found out to their satisfaction that, although the man had not committed the murder, he no doubt would have done so if his brother had not done it for him—and so they hanged him. A Correspondent of one of the newspapers, writing of this transaction, said—

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

“It is too soon now to know what will be the effect of this act on the inhabitants of the Island, but all seem to acquiesce in its justice.”

That came before the House of Commons last year, and the Government had a bad quarter of an hour. They did not attempt to defend the act, and the House condemned it. I believe, in like manner, the time will come when this country will say there is nothing to be proud of in these Afghan victories, and that this war is what I do not hesitate to call it—a cowardly, a cruel, and a contemptible war. I sometimes wonder what has become of our former boasted English generosity. Are we the same nation that used to sympathize with the wrongs of Poland and the oppression of Hungary, when we are now backing up this Government of ours in fighting to put down the independence and freedom of a nation that has never done us any harm? Just suppose the case reversed. Suppose Russia had been forcing herself on Afghanistan and doing what we are doing now. What articles we should have had in The Daily Telegraph and Times; how we should be called on to succour those patriots who are defending their mountain homes! But now, the case being reversed, we being the invaders and tyrants and oppressors, nothing is too bad for these wretched people, and nothing too good for us, who are carrying on this wickedness and oppression. And this just after we had been told with such a flourish of trumpets that we had gained “peace with honour.” The official Papers show that the Government have been inventing pretexts, creating opportunities, and taking advantage. This is not a very nice story for Englishmen to read. I say this is war with dishonour, and dishonour that will long adhere to the name of this country. We all remember Talleyrand saying that words were made to conceal our thoughts. This Blue Book which the Government have presented us with was given us to conceal their policy. In one of the most memorable debates of last Session the Home Secretary said there was “a lying spirit” abroad. That lying spirit was probably abroad on this side of the House, and it pervaded the other side of the House to an equal extent. But suppose the state of things into which we have unfortunately been drawn had been brought about in the most honourable manner, surely we need not have rushed into the war with such haste. An hon. Member who sits on the other side of the House, and whose observations may therefore be received with some respect by my hon. Friends opposite, discussing with me the career of the present Administration up to the close of the last Session, said—“The present Government were put into power for the purpose of doing nothing, and they had great trouble in doing it until the Obstructives came to their assistance.” Now, the Obstructives are, for the time, quiet. I believe they are busy digesting the million that was given to them to keep them quiet last year; and as the Government were deprived of their assistance in doing nothing they entered into war—if it should not rather be termed massacre—with this miserable Ameer to turn attention away from their other policies and to give them another lease of power. I say that, because it is so difficult to arrive at what the war was really made for. First we had Lord Cranbrook's despatch, full of all sorts of reasons for the war. Then we had another statement from the noble Lord which amounted to this—that he had got a surplus from the Indian Revenue, and might as well spend it in fighting the Afghans. And how was this surplus obtained? By the opium monopoly; and so it has come to this—that we get money by poisoning the Chinese and spend it in killing the Afghans. I have got a new reason for the war this afternoon. If anybody turns to The Echo he will find a letter from the Bishop of Gloucester, and that excellent Prelate defends and supports this attack on the Afghans and the slaughter of the Ameer's subjects. He says he does so because he is interested in the blessed work of the propagation of the Gospel—and he goes on to explain that he thinks England will carry on the work much better than the Russians. So that all the Border Chiefs who have made friends with us, and all the wild hill tribes we have heard so much of, are simply one branch of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. So much for the reasons of these statesmen and ecclesiastics. But that is not the real reason of the war. I go to the fountain head. I go to an after-dinner speech delivered at the Guildhall by the Prime Minister. I do so because the Prime Minister emphasized his statement by saying that erroneous reports had gone abroad, but that there, at the Guildhall, words of sense and truth were spoken; and in the awful presence of the Lord Mayor he declared what was the real reason of this war. He said that it was to get "a scientific Frontier"—to rectify our Frontier. I know what that means; it means robbery—neither more nor less. The Prime Minister is a master of phrases. He once said he had "concentrated" the Sultan; which meant that he had cut him in pieces—and this "rectification" which he talked about was nothing more than robbing and shooting the Afghans on purpose to get hold of their property, to which they have a right, and to which England has none. That is the policy of England, and I am ashamed at it. Lord Beaconsfield is a modern Ahab, and the wretched Ameer is Naboth the Jezreelite. But that is not the worst of it. There are in this House 328 accomplices of Ahab who support him in this policy of robbing his neighbour's vineyard. I am thankful that I was able to record my vote—and I shall ever be thankful, although in a minority—against a policy so atrocious. I should like to clear myself from being supposed to agree entirely with all that has been said by many eminent speakers on this question on my own side of the House. The noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition (the Marquess of Hartington) has spoken with a pluck and vigour which no one admires more than myself; but I did not agree with him when he said that, although he had a strong conviction that the policy of the Government which has led to this war against the Ameer was not capable of justification, yet that he had no intention of opposing any measure having for its object the refusal of means whereby to carry on the war. It has also been said that although the war may be condemned, yet those who condemn it are ready to grant the means of bringing it to an honourable conclusion. In my opinion, if you are engaged in a dishonourable enterprize there is no honour except in getting out of it as early as possible. I would not fight in any case in which I could not use the good old words, "God defend the right!" and God is never on the side of injustice and robbery. I shall therefore give no assistance in the way of providing means to carry on this wicked war. Why should the noble Lord not have gone further, and have said that he would stop the war altogether? I was delighted to hear him speak out so manfully as he did when he advised the recall of Lord Lytton, who, in my opinion, is one of the worst of the promoters of this sad business. But why not recall the troops also? There will be no more loss of prestige in the one case than in the other. You say you would lose prestige and glory; but surely the House ought to remember that honour is worth more than glory. I believe that your prestige would be increased, even among these savage tribes, by acting in a strictly honourable and honest way. The policy of the Government is one that we cannot defend; and the more we protest against it the more will be the satisfaction with which we shall go back to keep Christmas in the country, for our hands and consciences will be free of the blood of those unfortunate Indians who are being slaughtered in distant lands. But who is to pay for this war? I am inclined to adopt the hon. Member for Hackney's view of this matter. Supposing some foreign Power were to attack us, and the scene of operations was to be in Ireland, and that all the military operations were carried on there—you would not go and say—"Ireland is in danger, therefore make Ireland pay." No—you know the reason why is because Ireland has Representatives in this House to defend her interests. The hon. Members for Cavan and Meath are Members of this House, and you dare not do it. I do not believe the Government would dare propose to put this money on India, if there were an Indian Biggar and Parnell. But India is not represented, and therefore the present proposal is before us. Her Majesty's Government are responsible for this war—the people made the present Government, the people elected the Conservative Party, and the electors of this Kingdom ought to be called upon to pay for the mischief they have done. What have the Indians to do with it? They are not Christians, and therefore do not want all this bloodshed. You have had your great majority, and you have outvoted us, and you may think all things are going swimmingly. I am not so sure of that. It is 25 years since we had the Crimean War. That was a popular war—the right hon. Member for Birmingham and Mr. Cobden were almost alone in condemning it. But this is not a popular war; and I agree with the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) in his belief that the great mass of the working classes are against it, and at any rate that hon. Member, who comes much in contact with the masses, stated that he had not met a single working man who was in favour of it. The Nonconformists are against it, and it has been condemned in manly, outspoken language by Dr. Plumptre, who spoke as a minister of the National Church; and for his outspokenness and honesty I do not suppose that he will be appointed to the See of Durham. The policy of this war is a policy of revenge, and that appointment will probably be given to a sanguinary Christian. I have said that the war is yours and the working classes are not with you; but there was a voice heard in this House last night from Bristol—and that proclaims the change that is going on in the country. Is there any Member of this House during last Session who does not perceive the change that has come over the spirit of the Opposition? You see that we are full of energy and spirit. We are full of hope and energy, because we know the country is with us, and will soon endorse our condemnation of the flagitious policy of the Government. The more this policy is looked into the more it will be condemned. The voice which we have just heard from the West of England is only the prelude of the full volume of public opinion which, before many months are over, will condemn the Government who have thought that might is right, and who maintain the doctrine, that moral wrong can be politically justifiable and who have acted upon the mischievous pretence that British interests can be permanently maintained at the sacrifice of British honour.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the eloquence of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) could not persuade him, that the war in Afghanistan was unnecessary and therefore unjust, although his belief was that, through the vacillation, not so much of the present, but of the last Administration in their negotiations with, and the treatment of, the Ameer, Shere Ali, the Ameer was induced to look elsewhere than to England for that protection which, immediately after the lamented death of Lord Mayo, he openly asked for from his successor, Lord Northbrook. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had quoted the Ameer's application in the course of his speech on a former night. It was made in the month of May, 1872, and his (Mr. Newdegate's) belief was that, if at that time Her Majesty's Ministers had offered to the Ameer of Afghanistan the Treaty (which had since been offered by Her Majesty's Government), before the influence of Russia had become predominant at Cabul, and before the Ameer was committed—as no doubt he was now committed—to the Russian Government, the Ameer would have seen that in the successor of Lord Mayo he had found the same friendly, the same bold spirit as he had recognized in him. But this was, properly, the subject of the recent debate, and he would now come to the matter of business before the House. The proposal on the part of the Government was that this House should grant them an unlimited credit upon the Revenues of India. Before the House entered upon the subject, the House had nothing in the shape of an Estimate submitted to them; but the pressure of the House had at length induced the Government to present them with an Estimate, and having furnished that Estimate, why had Her Majesty's Ministers not also proposed and asked for a Vote of Credit, which would correspond with their Estimate? They told the House that the proposal they were then making applied to the present financial year, and they had given an Estimate of the expenses of the war for that period. Then he said—"Why do not Her Majesty's Ministers ask the House to give them a corresponding Vote of Credit?" He, for one, most sincerely deprecated the idea of this House undertaking the Government of India in the same direct form in which the House exercised its Constitutional functions in reference to the Executive Government of this country; but he found that the House was being brought to the necessity of dealing with these matters touching the Army of India, the Services of India, and the Revenue of India, in the same manner that it had legitimately and for many years dealt with the Army, the Public Services, and the Revenue of the United Kingdom. And why was this? Because, unfortunately, the organization for the representation of India, which had been sanctioned by successive Acts of Parliament, and finally by the India Act of 1858, had, in the case of the Council for India, been practically invalidated by the Acts of 1869, chapters 97 and 98. The Council for India in this country had by these Acts of 1869 been deprived of its independent character, of its distinct existence as an independent body, and being reduced to this condition, that all its Members were mere nominees of the Secretary of State for India, it was, in many important matters, pushed aside by the Secretary of State. Lord Lytton appeared to have taken his cue from what Parliament had done in destroying the independence of the Council for India in England, and to have deliberately set aside the Council in India. The first instance in which this was done, that he (Mr. Newdegate) knew, was, when the Governor General undertook to change the terms of enlistment for the Indian Army. By the 56th clause of the Act of 1858—a clause which remained unrepealed by the Acts of 1869—the Government were bound to lay before Parliament the Order in Council, by which they had sanctioned the change in the terms of enlistment. He (Mr. Newdegate) knew, that this Order in Council was not laid before Parliament at the time, when it was due; and his belief was that it had never been laid before Parliament at all. If he were right, then, this was a distinct violation of the Act of 1858—he looked upon that, indeed, as the first step which was taken by the Indian Government in violation of the law. Next, he came to a subject which had been so well illustrated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and on which the learning and ability of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) had been so ably exhibited that night. The point to which he referred was this—that by the employment of the troops of India beyond the limits of the Indian Empire, without giving simultaneous information to Parliament on the subject, the Act of 1858 had been violated. The House would forgive him for calling to its recollection, that last Session he stated that he had personal knowledge of the intentions of the late Lord Derby, when he carried the 55th clause of the Act of 1858. He could speak of Lord Derby's intentions from personal knowledge, and he would read to the House what the noble Lord had said, when he moved that clause in the House of Lords in 1858. Hon. Members would find the speech of Lord Derby in the 151st volume of Hansard's Parliamentary Debates, July 19th, 1858, page 1697. Lord Derby said—

"The Crown could not send out forces unless Parliament provided the funds to pay them, but it was necessary to introduce this clause for the protection of the revenues of India."

The first part of the sentence referred to the Queen's, the Regular, Army as well as to the Army of India. The noble Lord continued—

"The effect of the clause would be that Indian troops, except for the purpose of repelling anticipated invasion, or of repelling actual invasion, should not quit their own territory; or if they did, the expense should be defrayed out of the revenues of this country, and not out of the revenues of India. If the troops were employed out of India, it would be for Parliament to decide whether they were employed upon Indian or Imperial objects."

Thus, Lord Derby had distinctly laid it down in public, and had stated to him (Mr. Newdegate) in private, that his intention was, if those troops were employed out of India, unless for repelling invasion or upon some sudden emergency, that they ought not to be paid out of the Revenues of India, but out of the Revenues of this country. Well, this was the case of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett); and he did not see anything in the circumstances of the present case which could justify the inference that these troops ought not to be paid out of the Revenues of this country, but that they ought to be paid entirely out of the Revenues of India. Reference had been made that evening, by the hon. Member who spoke from the Bench below him (Mr. Hardcastle), to the war in China. Well, the war in China originated upon a sudden emergency. The Chinese had fired upon our Envoys. It was a war of long continuance, and sudden emergencies arose during it—emergencies affecting the safety of the European residents at Canton and elsewhere in China. The Government were justified in using the resources of India to meet emergencies. Then, take the case of the Persian War, in which the Indian troops were used. He himself had heard Lord Palmerston apologise in the House for having used Indian troops and applied Indian Revenue in the manner that Her Majesty's Government were now doing. That war, like the China Wars, began before or in the year 1857, at least a year before this Clause 55, in the Act of 1858, was passed; and that clause was passed, to his knowledge, in order to restrain any future Minister from using the military power of India in the manner in which Lord Palmerston had done in the case of the Persian War. He came next to the Abyssinian Expedition; and what did the late Lord Derby do in that case? He knew that he was about to use Indian troops beyond the Frontiers of India, and, if not simultaneously with the Proclamation of War, at all events simultaneously with the issue of orders for the movement of troops out of Indian territory, he convened Parliament, and in so doing he acted in compliance with the clause which had been passed by Parliament at his instance in 1858. The Abyssinian War was in 1867; and now he would come to the year 1869. In 1868 the late Lord Derby resigned the Premiership, in consequence of ill-health, and died in the autumn of 1869; and it was not till rather late in the Session of 1869 that the Indian Bills were considered in the House of Lords, which proposed to set aside the principle upon which seven out of the 15 Members of the Council for India were elected, and to render every one of that Council a nominee of the Secretary of State for India. It had been said that the late Lord Derby consented to that proposal. He (Mr. Newdegate) did not believe it, and would tell the House why. The late Lord Ellenborough was an old friend of his, and nobody believed that the late Lord Ellenborough was a friend of the East India Company. But he (Mr. Newdegate) knew that Lord Ellenborough respected the independence of the Council for India in England. In 1869 Lord Ellenborough rose in his place in the House of Lords and remonstrated against the then proposed change, by which the independence of the Indian Council would be abolished. He was, however, overpowered by his own Party, and had to give in, though he (Mr. Newdegate) believed that he had spoken the opinions of the late Lord Derby, the author of the Act of 1858, as well as his own. It might be said—"What is the importance of having any independence in the authority which governs India? Parliament is excessively jealous of any independent authority, which is not immediately subject to the Ministers of the day, over whom this House supposes that it can exercise some control." The importance of this independence was felt in 1858. He held in his hand the Resolutions on which Lord Derby's Administration proposed that Parliament then should legislate—the Resolutions upon which the Act for the better government of India was, in 1858, founded. With the permission of the House he would read two of them. The 8th Resolution, as proposed, described how seven Members of the Council were to be elected—

"That the Members of the elected portion of the Council shall be chosen by a constituency composed of persons who have previously held military commissions or civil appointments in India, in Her Majesty's service, or in that of the Government of India, or who may possess a direct interest, to an amount to be specified, in some property charged or secured on the Revenues or territories of India."

But upon the 6th Resolution it was objected that the proposed security for the independence of the Council was unnecessary and inexpedient; so a Division was taken on the 6th Resolution—

"That, with a view to the efficiency and independence of the Council, it is expedient that it should be partly nominated and partly elected."

This Division was taken in this House on the 14th of June, 1858, and the Question put was—

"That the words 'with a view to the efficiency and independence of the Council' stand part of the proposed Resolution."

The Committee divided—Ayes 250, Noes 185—giving a majority of 65 for retaining those words in the Resolutions which were to form the foundation of the Act of 1858. He mentioned this Division in order to show that the Parliament of that day, as well as the Parliament of 1853, which had supported the qualified but still distinct independence of the East India Company, deemed it to be essential that there should be a valid independence in the Council in this country that was to regulate the affairs of India, and the same feeling existed with respect to maintaining the qualified independence of the Council of the Governor General in India. They had now an illustration of the mischief and danger which were likely to arise from the abandonment of that system. There had lately been published a Return showing "the Opinions" recently recorded by Members of the Council of the Secretary of State for India "in reference to the expenditure for, and other matters connected with, the military expedition against Afghanistan," and, with the permission of the House, he would read an extract from a Minute of Sir Erskine Perry, whom he had formerly the pleasure of knowing as a Member of this House, and had heard speak, with great knowledge and effect, on Indian affairs in the House. This Minute was dated the 3rd of December, 1878, and contained the following passage:—

"It is the first opportunity that has been given to the Council of India to express an opinion as to the justice or expediency of the war, and I regret that it has arisen now. I should have preferred that when the Secretary of State was asked in Parliament, 'What are the views of your Council on the subject?' he should have been able to reply, 'I don't know; the law does not compel me to consult them, and I have not consulted them.' This places us, no doubt, in a rather humiliating position, and it is strange that we are the only body of men in the United Kingdom who have been precluded from expressing our opinions either to the Government or to the public on this momentous question. Still, it is the position assigned to us by law, and, at all events, it relieves us of all responsibility."

Here, then, they had positive testimony to the effect of the alteration of the position of the Council made in 1869. For it was manifest the Secretary of State for India had not until very recently consulted the Council for India at all upon such an important subject as the commencement of a war, in which India was concerned and took part, and of which Her Majesty's Ministers even now formally proposed that India should bear the entire cost. He had now stated some of his reasons for the belief he entertained; but he was not at liberty to communicate to the House all the circumstances that had come to his knowledge. It appeared that Lord Lytton had set aside his Council in India, just as the Secretary of State had set aside the Council for India in this country. It had always been held essential to the safe government of India that there should be some authority responsible for the highest functions of administration, which was independent of the Government of the day in this country. And why? Because, as a rule, the Administration of the day was only in Office for a limited period. Her Majesty's Ministers must necessarily be the Representatives of a Party; whereas it was essential to the preservation of our Indian Empire that there should be a continuity of policy and a stability of system, which it would be impossible to maintain if the uncontrolled power of Indian Administration rested in a Minister who was appointed by one Party, perhaps for a short, certainly for an indefinite, period, and might at any time be displaced by the Representative of another Party, which happened to outnumber that of Her Majesty's Ministers, in some Division in that House, and represented a different policy. This was apparent to the common sense of everyone. There was also the fact he had mentioned in the debate on the Address, that if no such independent authority existed, that House was utterly dependent for its information upon the Secretary of State. He (Mr. Newdegate) deprecated the form in which this unlimited credit, this unlimited power of drawing upon the Revenues of India had been asked from the House; he also deprecated the idea that, in addition to all its other labours, the House of Commons should be obliged to undertake the functions formerly discharged by the East India Company, then by the Council modified by the Act of 1853, slightly modified by the infusion of a small number of nominees of the Secretary of State for India—the same principle upon which the Council of 1858 was founded—he deprecated the idea of this House being compelled to assume those functions. He did not believe that the Government of India could be safely or advantageously regulated from month to month, and year to year, by continual reference to the House. He was sure the House was too fully occupied satisfactorily to discharge these additional functions; and, unless a careful review of the whole of the statutes relating to the Government of India was undertaken—unless there was a careful review of the requirements of India, and some statute correcting the Act of 1869 was introduced, and passed—what was the alternative? The alternative, really, was the continuance of a state of things in which the Secretary of State for India, the Minister for the day, would be a despot, armed with the control of a Revenue of £50,000,000, and an Army of 200,000 men, with the power, if the precedent of this expedition to Afghanistan, and the precedents of the Chinese Wars, and the Persian War, were accepted, of plunging this country into war by interfering uncontrolled in external relations affecting not only India, but England. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes; that was the alternative. He asked the House, whether it was safe to leave to the uncontrolled power of a Minister of State the disposal of a Revenue of £50,000,000 and an Army of 200,000 men—subject only to the subsequent verdict of Parliament? If that were to be so, what a farce were all their forms! The Revenue of this country was larger than that of India, but our Army was smaller; yet the House was required to go through the process of Estimates submitted to them for Supply, and of Ways and Means with respect to the English Army; and surely, if all these forms were necessary to control the Prerogative, in the case of England it would not be reasonable to leave, without the control of some authority, independent of the Administration of the day, the enormous power vested in the Secretary of State for India, for which the Act of 1869, and the abuse of it, now form a precedent? Summoned, as the House had been, for a particular purpose, the House could not then review this great subject; but, as a disciple of the late Lord Derby, as a disciple also of the late Mr. Melville, the last Secretary of the East India Company, and as an Englishman, who held the Constitution of his country in respect, he prayed the House never to rest satisfied until this much-abused power vested in the hands of the Secretary of State for India had been, to some extent, limited, and placed upon a safe and Constitutional footing.

Mr. Newdegate

MR. MUNDELLA said, he thought the House must have felt the value of the arguments of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). He was quite sure that if the hon. Member's remarks were not appreciated by hon. Members around him, they would be fully appreciated by the country. He would not follow the hon. Member in the able Constitutional statement he had made to the House; but he did feel with him that they were placed in a position of grave doubt and ambiguity. Once again, it was the old story. What was the state of things before them? He would not attempt to enter into the causes of the war expenditure which they were now discussing; but he complained that the Government did not tell the House whether the whole of this payment was to be borne by the English Exchequer, or be thrown upon the Indian Exchequer. They simply said—"Go on with the expenditure; give us unlimited control over the whole of the funds of India, and at some future time we will come down to the House and tell you what proportion India and England ought to pay." He asked, upon what principle they were asked to divide expenses? If it was an Imperial war, as the other side contended all last week, why should they not pay for the cost of it out of the Imperial Exchequer? If it was not an Imperial war, but was purely an Indian war, why did they hold out the hope and the promise that they would place some indefinite part of the cost upon the Indian Exchequer? On what principle did they do this? Surely, if it was an Indian war, whatever the consequences might be, let them do justice and charge it on the Indian Revenues. If it was an English and Imperial war, let it be paid out of English funds. On that side of the House they were more unanimous than he had ever seen them on any other question, that this was an unjust and unnecessary war. They recorded their votes against it last Friday night, and, for his own part, he was content that that should be his protest on that part of the question. He had endeavoured, in the course of the debate, to catch the Speaker's eye; but like many others he failed, or he should have had something to say upon the question of payment. The Under Secretary of State for India had endeavoured to minimize the cost. He said it would only come to £1,200,000 up to April next, and he added that we had a surplus for once in India, and should be able to pay the probable cost up to April out of the surplus? Now, what did the surplus arise from? From the most precarious source of income conceivable. It was calculated by the Estimate of March last that there would be a surplus of £2,136,000. There was a deficiency on railways, interest, compensation, and other items amounting to nearly 200 lacs, or £2,000,000 of money; but, altogether, the Revenue would be the better by 124 lacs, or £1,250,000, from the opium Revenue alone. All he could say was he wished it might be so; but he could not believe it would, and there were very few people who knew anything at all about the Indian Revenue who believed that the Revenue from opium would realize £10,600,000, seeing that the highest figure it had ever reached was £9,300,000. If, however, they should have the good fortune in one year to have this large increase in this precarious and doubtful source of income, it must not be forgotten that they had levied a tax upon salt—the most shocking duty that could occur to the conscience of an English Minister—and had put an income tax upon traders who earned 4s. a-week, which was probably the meanest tax ever imposed upon the people of any country. Was it right, then, considering that these taxes were raised exceptionally with a view of providing against the Famine, that they should appropriate this surplus of £1,200,000 for the purposes of this war? When the war was first mentioned, the whole of the Conservative Press ridiculed the idea of charging it on the Revenue of India. It was asked—“What is £2,000,000. It is only a very small sum.” It was, however, a large sum to India, small as it was to England. In reply to a Question which he (Mr. Mundella) had put to-night, the Under Secretary of State admitted that the Order published in The Times of yesterday was true—to suspend all public works, and, as far as possible, all the repairs, going on in India. [Mr. E. STANHOPE: In Bombay.] Well, in Bombay; but if it was done by one Government it would soon be done by the rest. The House would probably know what the meaning was of suspending the public works in India. They had there the whole of their engineers, the European supervisors and staff, so that the whole of the real expenditure connected with the public works would still be going on; while the only thing they would save would be the wages of the miserable labourers, who received 3d. a-day. He had heard an engineer say that what generally happened when works of this sort were suspended when about half finished was that a monsoon came and swept them all away. If they suspended these public works they would impose an enormous outlay upon India, and that was really what was meant by taking £1,200,000 from the Revenues of India. Let the House know how those Revenues were raised before they ventured to dream of throwing the cost upon them. For the sake of what had been described as a grand Imperial policy, but which, in reality, was the policy of one man—the Prime Minister—what they were really going to do was to diminish the handful of rice and the purchase of salt, which formed the daily meal of the Indian ryot. All this policy had been agreeable to hon. Members opposite until it came to be paid for. He held in his hand a letter written on Thursday night—the night Parliament opened—by an hon. Member to the editor of The Berks and Hants Advertiser. The writer said that—

“As some of your readers may not see the papers, let me call attention to the fact that the British troops have within the last few days almost succeeded in obtaining the new Frontier considered necessary in Afghanistan. The brilliant victory of General Roberts will do much towards getting rid of all further resistance. No money will be asked for at present, as the military expenses are not very great.”

So they were going to sing pœans over the victory in that House, and they were not to put their hands in their pockets, to the extent of 6d., to pay for it. Surely to throw the whole cost of the Jingoism of the Government and their admirers upon the poor ryots of India was discreditable to the first Assembly of gentlemen in the world. On the other hand, there was something else that deserved consideration. Thirty-six years ago the first Afghan War occurred, and what did the present Prime Minister say about the expenditure at that time? He (Mr. Mundella) never read a speech of the right hon. Gentleman with more pleasure; he never read one which showed more power, ability, and argument; and he strongly advised hon. Gentlemen opposite to read carefully the speech delivered by Mr. Disraeli on the war in Afghanistan, when he had the courage to divide the House, although only eight or ten Members followed him into the Lobby. Mr. Disraeli, on that occasion, said—

“He did not believe that we should be deprived of the Indian Empire either by internal insurrection or by the foreign invader. If ever we lost India, it would be from financial convulsions. It would be lost by the pressure of circumstances, which events like the war in Afghanistan were calculated to bring about by exhausting the resources of the country in military expeditions, and by our consequent inability to maintain those great establishments which were necessary to the political system that we had formed and settled in Hindostan.”—[3 Hansard, lxiv. 450.]

The appalling distress now prevailing in our industrial centres was another subject to which he begged to direct the attention of the House. Never, he believed, since 1847 had such a state of depression in all our industries been seen, and much responsibility for its continuance and aggravation lay at the door of Her Majesty's Government. [“Oh!”] No doubt the original causes were economical; but latterly the distress had been aggravated, and the return of prosperity impeded, by diplomatic causes, which had disturbed trade, convulsed markets, and driven industry away. For instance, a Sheffield establishment was on the point of signing a large contract with the Russian Government for railway materials when the despatch of the Indian troops to Malta was announced, and on that account Russia obtained elsewhere the materials which would otherwise have furnished employment to a great number of men in Sheffield. Similar incidents had occurred in other cases, and all great financial and industrial establishments had been paralyzed by the apprehension of war. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had had control of our affairs, we should have escaped much of the trouble and misery of the last two years. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would do one of two things—that he would courageously say he would place the whole cost of this war on the Indian Revenue, or that he would tell them what proportion he proposed should fall upon the Imperial Exchequer, and ask for a Vote of Credit in the regular Constitutional manner. It seemed as if England and France had changed policies during the last two years, and as if English common-sense had gone across the Channel, and the Imperialism had come to this side; and the French had certainly got the best of it. A special reason why England should bear the cost of the war was that the consequences of the war would be a great addition to the burdens of India in defending it against the Afghans, whose hostility would be embittered by the remembrance of blazing villages and of outrages said to have been committed on the field of battle by the tribes whose support we had secured.

QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE VICE CHAMBERLAIN OF THE HOUSEHOLD (Viscount BARRINGTON) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as followeth:—

Your loyal and dutiful Address affords me much satisfaction.

I feel assured that I shall receive your cordial co-operation and support in all Measures which I may deem necessary for upholding the honor of My Crown, and for maintaining the great interests of My Empire.

AFGHANISTAN (EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS).

Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

MR. HARDCASTLE said, he was astonished at the statements made by the Opposition as to the oppressive nature of this charge upon the enormous population of India. It seemed to him absurd to say that the cost of a war with a petty kingdom of 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 of people in a poor limestone district could not be borne by the Empire of India, with its 200,000,000, whose share of the burden would average about 1½*d.* each. He was disposed to think that there would be very considerable danger, seeing this war was waged in the interest and for the defence of India, in saddling the people of this country with that expenditure. It might be a question of policy, but it certainly was not a question of principle, that this country should bear a portion of the expenditure of a war for the defence of India. Happily, there had been recent indications given that the people of India were eager to co-operate with us in our Imperial policy, and it might possibly be politic that we should be called to bear a portion of this expense; but India was both able and willing to defend herself. Frequent allusion had been made to the war with Afghanistan 40 years ago, which was stated to have thrown a burden of £20,000,000 on the people of India. That war was waged under a Liberal Administration; but nothing was said of saddling England with the cost, although, at that time, the resources of India had not been developed as they had since been; the millions of British capital thrown into the country for the construction of railways had not been introduced; the internal communications had not been opened up to the extent they now were—in short, India was not at that time in the same condition to bear the burden of a war that she now was; and it seemed unreasonable to say that that country, with her increased resources, was unable to bear the small expenditure requisite for a war to defend her own Frontier. During this debate, and that which preceded it, there appeared to be, on the other side of the House, an almost general forgetfulness of the enormous benefits which British rule had conferred on India. India, they had been told by the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt), was “groaning under the military despotism of England;” but let them remember what the state of that country was before British rule was established. Lord Macaulay thus eloquently described it—

“A succession of nominal Sovereigns sunk in indolence and debauchery sauntered away life in secluded palaces. A succession of ferocious invaders descended through the Western Passes to prey on the defenceless wealth of Hindostan.

A Persian conqueror crossed the Indus and marched through the gates of Delhi. . . . The Afghans soon followed to complete the devastation which the Persian had begun, and every corner of the Empire learnt to tremble at the might of the Mahrattas, whose dominion stretched across the Peninsula, and though they had become great Sovereigns, did not cease to be freebooters. Wherever their kettledrums were heard, the peasant threw his bag of rice on his shoulder, hid his small savings in his girdle, and fled with his wife and children to the mountains or the jungles, to the milder neighbourhood of the hyena and the tiger.”

He could not allow all that had been said against British rule in India to pass without some reference to the advantages which our rule had conferred on that once down-trodden and distracted country. We had established peace and prosperity in India, and he could not admit that the people of that country were not able to bear the cost of a war of this kind for their own protection.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would not provoke any recurrence to the debate of last week, or touch on any topic which did not relate to the Resolution before the House; still, in passing, he must observe that no one could fail to be struck with the great change of tone which had come over the front bench opposite in the course of these discussions. Last week they were told they had to deal with an Imperial question, in which the fortunes of the country were bound up; now they were discussing “a mere Frontier war,” and they were told that the Resolution moved by the Under Secretary of State for India prejudged nothing, and that if the House should hereafter decide that the whole charge for this war should be paid out of the English Exchequer, the Resolution would not be inconsistent with that decision. If that were the case—if they had been called together to discuss “a mere Frontier war” and to pass a Resolution which prejudged nothing—he could not but wonder that Parliament should have been summoned at such an unusual season to discuss such trifling matters. It had been contended that this Resolution amounted to nothing more than a permission, under the Act for the Government of India, to the Indian Exchequer to make certain advances in connection with this war, and that it concluded nothing as to the ultimate incidence of the burden—whether it should be converted into a permanent charge either upon the British or Indian Exchequer. Now, he believed that doctrine was altogether unsound. On the contrary, the Resolution was an absolute and unlimited Vote of Credit on the Indian Exchequer for the whole expense of the war, whether incurred in the present or in any future year. A Resolution of this kind was a precedent for all time, and it was necessary to be extremely cautious in framing it. The Resolution said—

“that this House consents that the Revenues of India shall be applied to defray the expenses of the Military operations which may be carried on beyond the external Frontiers of Her Majesty's Indian Possessions.”

What he wished to ask the Government was simply this—whether there was the smallest authority or precedent in any financial Resolution adopted by Parliament, either in present or past times, for the word “defray” being applicable to anything else but an absolute charge on the Revenue? It so happened that at the end of the 56th section the word “defray” occurred again. It said that the pay and expenses incident to Her Majesty's Military and Naval Forces in India should be “defrayed” out of the Revenues of India. There could be no question whatever that when authority was given to “defray” a charge the authority to defray it was absolute, and that the word was never used for a temporary charge. Therefore, if it was intended to carry out the object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, this Resolution should be modified in its terms. A very simple explanation of this extraordinary proceeding had been suggested to him; it was that the English Exchequer was in deficit and that the Indian Exchequer, as he would show, was overdrawn, and it would be possible under this Resolution to leave it open for a year to say upon which Revenue the expenditure should be charged. He hoped that to-night the House would arrive at a definite vote as to what should be done. On this question he could not help thinking that the House was being dealt with hardly fairly. Assuredly they were competent in that House to receive a definite proposal from the Government, and the Government had had ample time to consider what proposal it would make. Though this Resolution covered, in its terms as it stood, the whole expenditure of the Afghan War, we were expressly told that it was only to apply to the present year. It was, therefore, a very simple question for the Government to say what their views were as to the division of the charge. He did not think it was reasonable, in dealing with such a body as the House of Commons, for the Government, because it had a large majority at its back, to place only a limited amount of information before the Members. Nor was Parliament alone kept in the dark. How, he would ask, had the Government dealt with the Council in London, constituted to advise with the Indian Secretary upon financial questions? [“Hear, hear!”] He submitted it was the duty of the Secretary of State to submit to his Council all proposals involving financial questions. [“No, no!”] In 1869 the present Lord Chancellor took this view of the Act, and ultimately the then Secretary of State, the Duke of Argyll, agreed with him. He complained that the Council had been passed by and over-ridden in this question, and the control of the Council of India over Indian finance, which it was the object of the statute to confer, had been rendered practically nugatory. It was shown by the Papers that in this important question, which might involve millions, and which would certainly cost more than £1,000,000 in the present financial year, the Members of the Council, who were supposed more particularly to advise with the Secretary of State on financial matters, had not even a day given them to consider the merits of the case, or even to review the calculations of the officials. They had been treated most cavalierly, and no real financial check had been exercised by them. In this way the control intended by the framers of the Statute had been evaded and set at naught. Let him now pass to the purely financial question. He was by no means satisfied with the statement made on behalf of the Indian Government of the existing state of their finance. The Secretary of State, in “another place,” explained that, including the new taxes, the surplus of Indian Revenue had been calculated at £2,131,000, or, after deducting the credit to the Famine Fund, £1,500,000, at above £500,000. But, he said, the Revenue had exceeded the Estimate; in opium the increase was £1,246,000; that during the present financial year the cost of the operations would not exceed £1,100,000, so that there would still remain a substantial surplus of above £500,000, after the payment of the charges for the expedition. That was the information the Secretary of State had on Monday week given to the country. But what was the explanation given now in this House. Instead of the financial position being improved since the Indian Budget it was admitted to be worse by £600,000. Thus the whole surplus was swallowed up, and the £1,100,000 could only be obtained by trenching on the credit of the Famine Fund. Now, there was an express contract between the Government and the people of India, when the increased taxes were imposed upon them last year, that the proceeds of those new taxes should be devoted to providing what Sir John Strachey called "an insurance against famine," and to no other purpose whatsoever. If, therefore, the Government having got the additional £1,500,000 so raised, instead of placing it to the credit of the insurance fund, paid out of it the expenses of the Afghan War, they would be committing, he contended, a distinct breach of contract. That was a very serious consideration, and the House ought, in his opinion, to hesitate before it gave its sanction to such a course. The House would remember the very important Petition presented to the House of Lords last year by Lord Northbrook, who stated that faith ought to be kept with the people of India to the utmost in this matter, and this had been admitted on all hands. He would now proceed to the question whether the present war could be fairly charged in its entirety to India? It seemed to him that very strong reasons had been already given for not treating this as a purely Indian war, or entered into upon purely Indian considerations. But there was a point in connection with the war which he would like to submit to the House, and with regard to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer might possibly be able to give some information. If the war had been entered into on purely Indian considerations, it would have presented a totally different aspect on the question of time. The India Office Papers which had been laid on the Table of the House did not show when, in the view of the Government, there was a probability of the Russian forces being moved in the direction of India, or when it was known that a Russian Mission was about to be sent to Cabul. But, on looking very carefully at the Central Asia Correspondence, prepared by the Foreign Office, hon. Members would find a somewhat astonishing fact, and it was that as to which he thought some explanation was due. They would see that the movement of Russian troops commenced on the 13th of June (new style), that another column set out on the 20th of June, and that the intention to move those columns towards India was notified in The Tashkend Gazette of the 26th of May, in which the strength of the columns was described. Further, that the Mission left Samarcand on the 14th of June. Taking those dates into account it was somewhat extraordinary that the Government of India appeared to have done nothing until the month of August. Now it might be, perhaps, said that the news took long to travel, and, no doubt, the unwise withdrawal of the Native Agent from Cabul put us at a disadvantage. But on looking closely at the Central Asian Papers, details would be found as to the time when these proceedings became absolutely known to the Indian Government. It would be seen that on May 13 intelligence reached them as to proposals of Abdul Rahman to the Russian Government to aid in subduing Afghanistan which had very much alarmed the Ameer. It would be seen, too, that on the 7th of June Major Cavagnari reported that the Russians were road-making to the Oxus, and that the Khan of Khiva, with 800 horse, was protecting the working parties; that on the 16th of June he reported that the road-making was being pushed on with great activity, and that a large force was mobilized, part of which was to move by Khiva, and that the Russians had ascertained what supplies and means of carriage could be procured; that the Ameer was alarmed, and anxious to know how these proceedings would be met by the British Government; that he said he would make friendly advances to whatever Government was friendly to him. Further, that the Mustaufi urged him to come to terms with the British Government, as they were moderate, whereas the Russians were shameless; and that Wali Mahommed, when appealed to, concurred. It would also be seen that on the 18th of June news, stated to be authentic, was reported from Peshawur to the effect that Russian Agents had laid proposals before the Ameer for permission for Russian troops to be quartered in his territories. Reports of the coming of the Mission were received on the 5th, the 11th, and the 13th of June—so that early in that month the Government had information, if not in detail, at any rate from several different sources. However, the first complaint we made at St. Petersburg as to the movement of troops was on August 14, and the first communication to the Ameer was of the same date. There was, then, the strange circumstance of the Government having information from a variety of sources—information which, though not official, was strictly correct, and some described in the Papers themselves as authentic—of the movement of Russian troops and the approach of a Russian Envoy, and yet the Government for two months did nothing. If that was so, what were they entitled to say of the Government? Had it been a question solely of India, and the Indian Government had been acting free from dictation at home, could there be any question that the Government of India would have sent at once to the Ameer and have told him that his fears seemed likely to be justified, and that we were, therefore, prepared to step forward, as he wished, and we had promised, in defence of his Frontier? But, unfortunately, it was an English and not an Indian question, and they waited two months. And why? At the end of May the Salisbury-Schouvaloff agreement was signed, which the Government believed would settle all things satisfactorily; so that, feeling that the danger reported to them from so many quarters was over, they made no representation to Russia or to the Ameer for two months. And then, on the same day, they ordered Lord Augustus Loftus to protest to the Russian Government against a movement of troops which was long over, and the Viceroy to summon the Ameer to receive the Chamberlain Mission. That was the question which, in his opinion, called for an answer from the Government; for who could doubt that, but for this delay, there would have been no war?

Mr. Childers

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope to detain the House but for a very short time, and do not intend to follow the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) into his examination of the statements of my noble Friend, Lord Cranbrook, nor into his financial examination of the statements of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State as to the Indian Budget, because I am sure that were it necessary to tell anything further on that subject my hon. Friend would be better able to tell it than I; but with regard to one or two questions raised, it is my duty to make some remarks. With reference to one of the charges, he mentioned the delay which he notices as having taken place in the communications made with Russia and to the Ameer with respect to the Russian Mission. I admit that undoubtedly it was the case that for a considerable period—even extending much further back than the month of June last year—we were continually receiving communications of more or less authority, pointing to the movement of Russian forces in Central Asia. It was, however, exceedingly difficult to get at the exact truth of these reports. Reports often reached us which at first sight appeared very formidable, but which were afterwards explained away, or reduced in their importance; and frequently we were led to the conclusion that they were spread for the purpose of causing anxiety, or accidentally magnified by the imaginations of those who had made them. Without going too minutely into details, I may say that it was not until the middle of August that we were distinctly informed by the Indian Government that a Russian Mission had actually come to Cabul; and until that Mission had actually arrived there, we had no right to say that Russia was moving in parts of Asia in which she had no right to interfere; while we might always have been met with the denial on her part, as to the intention of overstepping the limits assigned to her influence. We were in no hurry to raise a question which might have produced a quarrel; but, as far as we could, wished matters to cool down, as we hoped they would after the negotiations at Berlin; and it was not until we were absolutely certain that the Russian Mission had arrived at Cabul that we sent conditional instructions to the Viceroy to take certain steps as soon as he was able to ascertain this beyond doubt. With regard to another point raised by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers)—who I see has left his place—in passing, upon which he quoted the authority of the present Lord Chancellor and of Lord Salisbury from opinions expressed some years ago in the House of Lords, he seems to have forgotten that on that very occasion the Lord Chancellor of his own Government then in power—Lord Hatherley—answered the observations of Lord Cairns, and that he laid down with authority that—

“an order to the Governor General to declare war against a border State would not require the assent of the Council, though, of course, it would, in its consequences, involve expenditure.”—[3 Hansard, cxcv. 1830.]

This latter view is against the contention with which we are met; but it is not my intention to pursue that subject, which is unnecessary for the purposes of this discussion. The right hon. Gentleman has made a very great part of his speech turn upon the terrible word “defray”—indeed, we have had that word so dinned into our ears by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, as well as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract that we have come to feel uncomfortable about it. I quite agree with the right hon. Member for Pontefract, that in our proceedings, when we are setting precedents, it is desirable and incumbent on us to be cautious about the language which we use; and I must say upon that point, with reference to that particular statute, that I think the Government, drawn from the front Bench opposite, were exceedingly cautious when they had to take proceedings under that Act. For very shortly after it was passed, upon one occasion when they did use Indian troops, and allowed Indian monies to be applied for the maintenance of those troops upon an expedition beyond the borders of India—in China—they were so afraid of using this terrible word “defray,” that they did not use any word at all, and never came to Parliament either, to tell them anything about the affair. That was a very curious and interesting circumstance. When I have had occasion before to refer to it, I have always been met with this observation—“Oh! that was a case which did not fall within the meaning of the statute at all; that was a case which was provided for by the exception clause, in which it is said that—“Except for the purpose of repelling or preventing invasion, or in case of some sudden or urgent necessity, the Forces of India should not be used without the consent of Parliament.” The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) told us that the Peiho affair was a case of “urgent necessity;” that what happened in that case was this—a friendly Mission was being sent by the British and French Governments to the capital of China—to Peking—and on its way it was suddenly assaulted and stopped in its progress, and therefore the emergency was so sudden that it was absolutely necessary to take steps to redress the insult. There are, certainly, some parallels which might be suggested in the present case, and, let me add, some points of difference. Notwithstanding the suddenness of the emergency, one year and two months were allowed to elapse before the Force was dispatched; and during that time a Session of Parliament took place, but nothing was said about it; and we are driven to the conclusion that in the view of Gentlemen opposite, when an insult is offered to the British Power beyond its own Frontiers, it is such an emergency that it will justify the employment of Indian troops without Parliament being consulted. You cannot say that the case in question was in any sense one of preventing or repelling invasion. In the case of Afghanistan, it might, perhaps, have been contended, with some little plausibility, that it was a measure of precaution, used to prevent invasion; and, certainly, with regard to its suddenness, that it was one of the very greatest emergency; because we could not wait 14 months, nor even 14 days, for it was a question of the season of the year, which, if the troops had not been ordered to move, would have been lost, and this would probably have led to much greater bloodshed and suffering, as well as added to the cost of the war.

If we are to be so careful about precedents in the use of this ambiguous word "defray," our conduct is, I think, more excusable than that of right hon. Gentlemen opposite. It is said you cannot apply the word "defray" to the payment of temporary charges; and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) observed that there was a great difference between the language used in this case and that used in the Vote for the Abyssinian Expedition. Of course, there was; because in the latter it was distinctly intended that the British Government should pay for the whole, or the greater part, of the expenditure—the object being avowedly an Imperial and British object. All that was then proposed was, that we should use the Indian Army and relieve the Indian Revenue of all charges; and, therefore, anything that was put upon it was distinctly of a temporary character. But what is proposed now is something wholly different. It is proposed to apply the Indian Revenue to this expenditure; not thereby meaning to say that it is not a matter that will require serious attention as to how far the British or Imperial Exchequer is to come in aid of that expenditure. But the right hon. Gentleman is right in saying that it will fall, in the first instance, upon the Indian Revenue; and I wish to go into this matter and face it, without attempting to disguise what is my view of it. I have said that I wish to put our view of the case before the House; and I hope hon. Members on both sides will endeavour to free their minds from any feeling of prejudice, and not be guided by mere impulse, without consideration of all the consequences at which they may arrive. What I ask the House is this—are we or are we not to understand that India is to be a self-supported part of the British Empire? The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) says it is. Then, if India is self-supporting, is it to pay for her own self-defence? That is a question which must be answered with some little reserve. I think there is to be the greatest distinction drawn between defence against immediate neighbours and defence against distant enemies. Take, for instance, the strongest case on the one side. Suppose a quarrel to arise between the British Government in India and the Nizam or Maharajah Scindia, and a contest or war takes place between them—is it or is it not the part of the Indian Exchequer to bear the expense of that war? I apprehend that, supposing it to have arisen in ordinary circumstances, there would be no question whatever that the charge should be rightly laid on the Indian Revenues. If you were to adopt a different principle, and say that the Indian Government should be at liberty, whenever they thought right, to undertake wars against their neighbours, and that they should be held harmless, I ask, what would be the temptation of the Government of India to go into quarrels which would be of a dangerous kind, and which would bring anything but satisfaction or economy to the people of India? But knowing that if they got into complications with their neighbours they will have to bear the expense is a check which, in their interest, as well as in the interests of the people of England, ought not to be disregarded. Again, where you have to deal with immediate border neighbours—such as Nepaul, Burmah, or any other States—I apprehend the case is clear that India ought to bear the expense. And similarly, I believe, within the Indian system, in which I include Afghanistan, upon the rule I have laid down, if a quarrel arose between that country and India, the Indian Revenues should bear the expense. I now want to qualify that doctrine by another consideration. I have said it is right that India should bear the expense of hostilities against immediate neighbours; but I have drawn a distinction between them and distant enemies: and when I speak of distant enemies, I especially refer to enemies who may be moving against her, not on account of any direct quarrel with her, but on account of some quarrel with the British Empire of which she is a part. In such a case, we ought to recognize the justice and equity of the Imperial Exchequer coming in aid of that part of our dominions which is attacked, not from any special local cause but from Imperial causes. We must bear in mind, therefore, what the Imperial Power does towards the general defence of India. There is no doubt we do a great deal to keep back the tide of invasion. If anybody will look at the history of India, they will see that wave after wave of different un-tions came over that country and overran it, generally from the North-West and through these very Passes of which we have been speaking. Anyone will see that this would again be the natural course of events, if there were not some strong Power in India like the British Power; and that if a great Power were advancing over those regions of Asia, that advancing Power would sooner or later sweep over India also. I believe that if it were not for the presence of British Power there, the shadow which such invasion would throw before it would even now be producing alarm and disturbance in that country of a serious character. But the great Power of England, and the warning hand of England, keeps India quiet, and thereby confers great benefits upon her. But what is the real cause, extent, and meaning of the present war? This is one point upon which we require further information than we have at the present moment. As to the actual and immediate cause of the present war, it was the refusal, with insult, offered in the eyes of all India, of a Mission sent by the Indian Government. There can be no doubt that if that were submitted to the Government of India would have been fatally, or at least seriously, weakened; and the country would have been put to considerable expense and exertion in order to redress the evil suffered. If there were nothing more in this quarrel than that insult offered—perhaps from the peculiar character, the moodiness, or ill-will and obstinacy of a particular Ruler, which might be speedily avenged, and that Ruler brought to his senses—and if the expenditure is to be of a moderate character—as we are told by the authorities of India it may be expected to be—and if, as I earnestly hope and pray may be the case, we have nearly arrived at the conclusion of this business, it will be a matter of considerable doubt whether the Imperial Exchequer ought to be called upon to pay anything at all. But if, on the other hand, there should be more in the war than at first sight appears—if it should seem that this is a war—of course, not openly or avowedly, but secretly, and against the will of another Government, but, nevertheless, by unofficial means—stirred up and maintained against us by a European Power; and if it becomes necessary to put forward anything like our Imperial strength, I am sure that the people of England will be ready to bear their full share—and even more than their full share—of the burden of this war. I wish to remind the House of the position of affairs under which we are called together. Up to the time of the period allowed for the Ameer's reply to our Ultimatum we fully hoped that war might be avoided, and a peaceful settlement arrived at. From the moment when the advance began—namely, on the 21st November—until now, the interval is less than four weeks, and it is really exceedingly difficult at present to tell what is the real nature of the resistance to be offered, or the upshot or outcome of the war. In the course of another month or two we shall have learned a great deal, and be in a very much better position to make to Parliament a serious proposition appropriate to the real state of the case. At the present moment in our uncertainty as to the extent of the operations necessary to obtain the submission of the Ameer, it would be impossible for us to come forward and do what we have done in other cases—propose a definite Vote of Credit. If we are to give aid it must not be by undertaking that we should bear the expense of a war administered by others, set free from all considerations of economy, who might press it beyond the length which might be desirable, because they are exempt from all risk of having to pay for it; but what we may think it right to give should be in the shape of a Vote in aid of the expenditure of the Indian Government. The principle upon which we proceed is one which we have adopted with reference not only, and not even principally, to the interests of taxpayers in England; but with the sincere belief that it would be better for the interests of India herself that she should be made to feel the responsibility under which she carries on war, and that it would be a very bad principle to allow her Administration to believe that they might go to war and cast the expense upon the Imperial Exchequer. I admit that there is much which raises the presumption that this should be treated as an exceptional case; but all I can say at present is that the Government will be fully prepared when we meet after the Recess to give full explanations to the House as to what proposals we shall have to make.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: There is one point in the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer which I think ought not to be left altogether without remark. I think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had some injustice done to him at an earlier period of the evening, inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman has now given us some information as to what are the actual intentions of the Government. It appears that Her Majesty's Government intend the first charge of the war to be defrayed by the Indian Government; and their further intention is that according to the amount of resistance, or, in any case, according to the nature or object which they desire to gain by the war, they will come forward and ask this House to grant a subsidy in aid of the Indian Revenues. This appears to me to be a new and altogether unprecedented view of the subject. We have in former times frequently conducted wars by means of subsidies to foreign Powers; but I am not aware that we have ever subsidized one of our own Dependencies to conduct a war for us. There is this difference, I believe—that when a foreign Power has been subsidized to carry on a war in our behalf, there has been a distinct understanding and distinct stipulations as to the amount to be paid and the amount of assistance to be rendered. In this case, however, everything remains vague. It is in the power of the Government at home to issue such orders as they may think fit to the Indian Government as regards the prosecution of the war; and when the work has been performed, they can come down to the House and ask us to vote money in order to reimburse the taxpayers of India for the services rendered. In this case, what becomes of the power of this House to control questions of peace and war; and what becomes of the power of this House to protect the purse of the British nation? If Her Majesty's Government, through the agency of the Indian Government, conducts the war, the control of Parliament over the expenditure entirely vanishes. And as to the guardianship of the resources of the taxpayers, what becomes of that when, after the Indian Government has done the work, the Government comes forward to say that by our instructions and by our directions all this expenditure has been incurred? How is it possible that the House should turn round and say we decline to pay? We have been fulfilling one of our most important functions. To this House is confided, no doubt, the guardianship of our Indian subjects to a very great extent; but I think its primary duty is to guard the interests of the British taxpayer. Under the circumstances in which we have been debating this question, it has been impossible to enter into it at length; but I am anxious that the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not pass without a protest; and I am of opinion that when we meet again, this question will be more seriously considered than the Government think it should be at the present moment.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he would not detain the House more than two minutes while he alluded to a matter which he had hoped would be mentioned by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hardcastle), who had been more fortunate than himself in getting a place in the debate. A great deal had been said in the course of the debate about taking a surplus which ought to be devoted to the unfortunate people of India. He wished to remind the Government that there were many poor people in this country who had some interest in that surplus. Large deputations had come up from the North of England, from time to time, to ask for the removal of the cotton duties of India; and a Minister of the Crown had more than once promised those deputations that as soon as there should be a surplus it should be devoted to the removal of those duties. The Minister who made those promises was Lord Salisbury; and it would be rather a curious coincidence if, on looking up the dates, it should be discovered that at the moment when he was making those promises to the Lancashire people he was reversing the policy of peace in India, and making it impossible to apply the surplus to any such purpose. Representing a part of Lancashire, and knowing the condition in which Lancashire was at the present moment, he felt it his duty to say a word on this subject. The mills were being closed or working short time, and a great number of poor people would look with surprise and indignation on this unfortunate mode of disposing of the Indian surplus.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 235; Noes 125: Majority 110.

AYES.

|                          |                           |
|--------------------------|---------------------------|
| Allcroft, J. D.          | Dalkeith, Earl of         |
| Allsopp, C.              | Dalrymple, C.             |
| Arbuthnot, Lt.-Col. G.   | Denison, C. B.            |
| Arkwright, A. P.         | Denison, W. B.            |
| Arkwright, F.            | Denison, W. E.            |
| Assheton, R.             | Dickson, Major A. G.      |
| Astley, Sir J. D.        | Digby, Col. hon. E.       |
| Bagge, Sir W.            | Douglas, Sir G.           |
| Balfour, A. J.           | Dyott, Colonel R.         |
| Barne, F. St. J. N.      | Eaton, H. W.              |
| Barrington, Viscount     | Edmonstone, Admiral       |
| Barttelot, Sir W. B.     | Sir W.                    |
| Beach, rt. hn. Sir M. H. | Egerton, hon. A. F.       |
| Beach, W. W. B.          | Egerton, hon. W.          |
| Beaumont, W. B.          | Elcho, Lord               |
| Bective, Earl of         | Elliot, G. W.             |
| Benett-Stanford, V. F.   | Elphinstone, Sir J. D. H. |
| Bentinck, rt. hn. G. C.  | Emlyn, Viscount           |
| Bentinck, G. W. P.       | Estcourt, G. S.           |
| Beresford, Lord C.       | Ewart, W.                 |
| Beresford, G. de la      | Finch, G. H.              |
| Poer                     | Floyer, J.                |
| Beresford, Colonel M.    | Folkestone, Viscount      |
| Birley, H.               | Forsyth, W.               |
| Blackburne, Col. J. I.   | Fremantle, hon. T. F.     |
| Boord, T. W.             | Galway, Viscount          |
| Bourke, hon. R.          | Gardner, J. T. Agg-       |
| Bourne, Colonel J.       | Gardner, R. Richard-      |
| Bousfield, Col. N. G. P. | son-                      |
| Bowen, J. B.             | Garfit, T.                |
| Bowyer, Sir G.           | Garnier, J. C.            |
| Brooks, W. C.            | Gathorne-Hardy, hn. A.    |
| Bruce, hn. T.            | Gibson, rt. hon. E.       |
| Brymer, W. E.            | Giffard, Sir H. S.        |
| Bulwer, J. R.            | Giles, A.                 |
| Burghley, Lord           | Goddard, A. L.            |
| Burrell, Sir W. W.       | Goldney, G.               |
| Buxton, Sir R. J.        | Gordon, W.                |
| Cameron, D.              | Gore-Langton, W. S.       |
| Campbell, C.             | Gorst, J. E.              |
| Cartwright, F.           | Grantham, W.              |
| Castlereagh, Viscount    | Gregory, G. B.            |
| Cave, rt. hon. S.        | Hall, A. W.               |
| Cecil, Lord E. H. B. G.  | Halsey, T. F.             |
| Charley, W. T.           | Hamilton, rt. hn. Lord    |
| Christie, W. L.          | G.                        |
| Clive, Col. hon. G. W.   | Hamilton, Marquess of     |
| Close, M. C.             | Hamilton, hon. R. B.      |
| Clowes, S. W.            | Hamond, C. F.             |
| Cobbold, T. C.           | Harcourt, E. W.           |
| Cole, Col. hon. H. A.    | Hardcastle, E.            |
| Coope, O. E.             | Harvey, Sir R. B.         |
| Cordes, T.               | Hay, rt. hn. Sir J. C. D. |
| Corry, hon. H. W. L.     | Heath, R.                 |
| Cotton, W. J. R.         | Helmsley, Viscount        |
| Crichton, Viscount       | Herbert, H. A.            |
| Cross, rt. hon. R. A.    | Herbert, hon. S.          |
| Cuninghame, Sir W.       | Hervey, Lord F.           |
| Cust, H. C.              | Hick, J.                  |

Mr. Jacob Bright

|                          |                            |
|--------------------------|----------------------------|
| Hill, A. S.              | Pim, Captain B.            |
| Holford, J. P. G.        | Plunket, hon. D. R.        |
| Holker, Sir J.           | Polhill - Turner, Capt.    |
| Holland, Sir H. T.       | F. C.                      |
| Home, Captain            | Powell, W.                 |
| Hood, Capt. hn. A. W.    | Praed, H. B.               |
| A. N.                    | Puleston, J. H.            |
| Hope, A. J. B. B.        | Raikes, H. C.              |
| Hubbard, E.              | Read, C. S.                |
| Hubbard, rt. hon. J.     | Rendlesham, Lord           |
| Isaac, S.                | Ridley, E.                 |
| Jervis, Col. H. J. W.    | Ridley, Sir M. W.          |
| Johnson, J. G.           | Ritchie, C. T.             |
| Johnstone, Sir F.        | Rodwell, B. B. H.          |
| Jolliffe, hon. S.        | Round, J.                  |
| Kennard, Col. E. H.      | Russell, Sir C.            |
| King-Harman, E. R.       | Ryder, G. R.               |
| Knight, F. W.            | Salt, T.                   |
| Knightley, Sir R.        | Sandon, Viscount           |
| Lawrence, Sir T.         | Scott, Lord H.             |
| Learmonth, A.            | Scott, M. D.               |
| Legard, Sir C.           | Selwin - Ibbetson, Sir     |
| Legh, W. J.              | H. J.                      |
| Leighton, Sir B.         | Shute, General C. C.       |
| Leighton, S.             | Simonds, W. B.             |
| Lennox, Lord H. G.       | Sinclair, Sir J. G. T.     |
| Lewisham, Viscount       | Smith, A.                  |
| Lindsay, Colonel R. L.   | Smith, S. G.               |
| Lindsay, Lord            | Smith, rt. hon. W. H.      |
| Lloyd, S.                | Smollett, P. B.            |
| Lloyd, T. E.             | Spinks, Serjeant F. L.     |
| Lopes, Sir M.            | Stanhope, hon. E.          |
| Lowther, hon. W.         | Stanhope, W. T. W. S.      |
| Lowther rt. hn. J.       | Stanley, rt. hn. Col. F.   |
| Macartney, J. W. E.      | Steere, L.                 |
| Mac Iver, D.             | Storer, G.                 |
| M'Garel-Hogg, Sir J.     | Swanston, A.               |
| M'Kenna, Sir J. N.       | Sykes, C.                  |
| Makins, Colonel          | Talbot, J. G.              |
| Mandeville, Viscount     | Taylor, rt. hn. Col. T. E. |
| Manners, rt. hn. Lord J. | Thornhill, T.              |
| March, Earl of           | Tollemache, hon. W. F.     |
| Marten, A. G.            | Tremayne, A.               |
| Master, T. W. C.         | Tremayne, J.               |
| Merewether, C. G.        | Turnor, E.                 |
| Mills, A.                | Wait, W. K.                |
| Mills, Sir C. H.         | Walker, O. O.              |
| Montgomerie, R.          | Wallace, Sir R.            |
| Montgomery, Sir G. G.    | Watney, J.                 |
| Moray, Col. H. D.        | Watson, rt. hon. W.        |
| Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.  | Welby-Gregory, Sir W.      |
| Muncaster, Lord          | Wellesley, Colonel H.      |
| Naghten, Lt.-Col. A. R.  | Wethered, T. O.            |
| Noel, rt. hon. G. J.     | Wilmot, Sir H.             |
| North, Colonel J. S.     | Wilmot, Sir J. E.          |
| Northcote, rt. hn. Sir   | Wilson, W.                 |
| S. H.                    | Woodd, B. T.               |
| Onslow, D.               | Wynn, Sir W. W.            |
| Parker, Lt.-Col. W.      | Wynn, C. W. W.             |
| Peek, Sir H.             | Yarmouth, Earl of          |
| Pell, A.                 | Yeaman, J.                 |
| Pemberton, E. L.         |                            |
| Percy, Earl              |                            |
| Phipps, P.               |                            |

TELLERS.

Dyke, Sir W. H.
Winn, R.

NOES.

|                    |                      |
|--------------------|----------------------|
| Acland, Sir T. D.  | Balfour, Sir G.      |
| Allen, W. S.       | Barclay, A. C.       |
| Amory, Sir J. H.   | Bass, A.             |
| Anderson, G.       | Bass, H.             |
| Ashley, hon. E. M. | Beaumont, Colonel F. |

|                            |                          |
|----------------------------|--------------------------|
| Bell, I. L.                | Jenkins, D. J.           |
| Blake, T.                  | Jenkins, E.              |
| Blennerhassett, R. P.      | Johnstone, Sir H.        |
| Brady, J.                  | Kay-Shuttleworth, Sir U. |
| Briggs, W. E.              | Kensington, Lord         |
| Bright, Jacob              | Kingscote, Col. R. N. F. |
| Bristowe, S. B.            | Lawson, Sir W.           |
| Brogden, A.                | Leatham, E. A.           |
| Brown, J. C.               | Leeman, G.               |
| Burt, T.                   | Leith, J. F.             |
| Cameron, C.                | Maoduff, Viscount        |
| Campbell, Lord C.          | M'Arthur, A.             |
| Campbell, Sir G.           | Maitland, J.             |
| Campbell-Bannerman, H.     | Middleton, Sir A. E.     |
| Carington, hn. Col. W.     | Milbank, F. A.           |
| Cave, T.                   | Monk, C. J.              |
| Cavendish, Lord F. C.      | Morley, S.               |
| Chadwick, D.               | Mundella, A. J.          |
| Chamberlain, J.            | Mure, Colonel W.         |
| Childers, rt. hn. H. C. E. | Newdegate, C. N.         |
| Cole, H. T.                | Noel, E.                 |
| Colman, J. J.              | O'Beirne, Major F.       |
| Courtauld, G.              | O'Brien, Sir P.          |
| Courtney, L. H.            | O'Gorman, P.             |
| Cowan, J.                  | O'Reilly, M.             |
| Davies, R.                 | Palmer, G.               |
| Delahunty, J.              | Parker, C. S.            |
| Dilke, Sir C. W.           | Philips, R. N.           |
| Dillwyn, L. L.             | Playfair, rt. hon. L.    |
| Earp, T.                   | Power, J. O'C.           |
| Edge, S. R.                | Ramsay, J.               |
| Edwards, H.                | Rathbone, W.             |
| Errington, G.              | Richard, H.              |
| Evens, T. W.               | Roberts, J.              |
| Fawcett, H.                | Rylands, P.              |
| Ferguson, R.               | Samuda, J. D'A.          |
| Forster, Sir C.            | Samuelson, B.            |
| Forster, rt. hon. W. E.    | Samuelson, H.            |
| Fry, L.                    | Sheil, E.                |
| Gladstone, rt. hon. W. E.  | Sheridan, H. B.          |
| Gladstone, W. H.           | Simon, Serjeant J.       |
| Gordon, Sir A.             | Smyth, P. J.             |
| Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.    | Stacpoole, W.            |
| Gourley, E. T.             | Stansfeld, rt. hon. J.   |
| Grant, A.                  | Stewart, J.              |
| Gray, E. D.                | Sullivan, A. M.          |
| Grey, Earl de              | Tavistock, Marq. of      |
| Harcourt, Sir W. V.        | Taylor, P. A.            |
| Hartington, Marq. of       | Tracy, hon. F. S. A.     |
| Havelock, Sir H.           | Hanbury-                 |
| Hayter, A. D.              | Trevelyan, G. O.         |
| Herschell, F.              | Waddy, S. D.             |
| Hill, T. R.                | Waterlow, Sir S. H.      |
| Holms, J.                  | Whitbread, S.            |
| Hopwood, C. H.             | Whitwell, J.             |
| Howard, hon. C.            | Williams, W.             |
| Hutchinson, J. D.          |                          |
| Ingram, W. J.              |                          |
| Jackson, Sir H. M.         |                          |
| James, Sir H.              |                          |

TELLERS.

Laing, S.
Morgan, G. Osborne

Main Question put.

Resolved, That, Her Majesty having directed a Military expedition of Her Forces charged upon Indian Revenues to be despatched against the Ameer of Afghanistan, this House consents that the Revenues of India shall be applied to defray the expenses of the Military operations which may be carried on beyond the external Frontiers of Her Majesty's Indian possessions.

ARMY (MEDICAL DEPARTMENT).

Copy presented,—of Statement by Members of the Board of Examiners of Candidates with reference to the Report of the Committee on that Department, with a Rejoinder on the part of the Committee [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

MILITIA (TRAINING ESTABLISHMENT).

Return presented,—for each Regiment showing the number present, absent, and wanting to complete the training for 1878 [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

FACTORY AND WORKSHOP ACT, 1878.

Copy presented,—of Orders made by the Secretary of State granting special exceptions [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

ARMY (STAFF COLLEGE).

Address for "Returns showing the number of Officers of Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers who have competed at each examination for admission to the Staff College, Sandhurst, since its formation; the number on each occasion who would have gained admission but for the limitation rules, and their places on the list; the number of and places obtained by those who did gain admission; the number of and places obtained at the final examination by those who passed out; the number who passed the final examination without going through the College; and the rules as to limitation of numbers in force at different periods:"

"And, numerical and nominal list of those who passed through the College, or passed the final examination, who have been employed on the Staff of the Army, and the appointments they have held, specifying in the numerical list the totals of those who have been employed on the General Staff, and of those who have held Regimental Staff appointments; appointments on the Staff in India not to be included in this Return."—(Colonel Arbuthnot.)

EGYPT (DAIRA LANDS).

Address for "any Papers showing the agreement between this Country and the Khedive of Egypt which enabled the Marquis of Salisbury, in his Letter to Lord Lyons of 24th October 1878 (Papers, Egypt, No. 2, 1878), to state that the person nominated by Her Majesty's Government as one of the Commissioners of the Daira Lands shall not be divested of his functions without their previous consent."—(Mr. Samuelson.)

RAILWAYS (IRELAND).

Return ordered, "of all Railway Companies in Ireland which have now or have ever had guarantees on the county rates; giving in each case the date of the Act authorising the guarantee; the date of the opening of the Line; the amount of authorised capital; amount of guaranteed capital; rate of interest guaranteed; character of guaranteed capital, whether a first charge on the net receipts or not; amount paid out of rates to the Company on account of the guarantee; and the number of years, if any, in which the net receipts from the Line were sufficient to dispense with a call on the rates."—(The O'Conor Don.)

EAST INDIAN ARMY.

Address for "Return showing rank and names of the British Officers serving with each regiment of Native Cavalry and Infantry employed in or moved for the Afghan Campaign of 1878 on the 1st day of September 1878, either in the advanced columns or in their support, with names of the Officers subsequently attached to each, and the casualties amongst them, made up to the 31st day of December 1878."—(Sir Henry Havelock.)

EAST INDIAN ARMY (NATIVE TROOPS).

Address for "Return showing Annual Cost of the Pay and Allowances of all Officers in the East Indian Army (Native Troops) showing each Presidency separately."—(Sir Henry Havelock.)

JOHN NOLAN.

Address for "Copy of Depositions taken before the Coroner at the Inquest on the body of John Nolan."—(Mr. Mitchell Henry.)

PRISON RULES.

Address for "Copy of Correspondence between Sir W. H. Wyatt, or any other of the Magistrates of Middlesex and Westminster, or of the City of London, or of the county of Surrey, and the Home Office, relative to the working of the new Prison Rules and the control of the Magistrates."—(Mr. Mitchell Henry.)

CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

Address for "Returns with regard to the Established Church of Scotland, giving in separate columns the number of Male and the number of Female Communicants in each parish in Scotland for the year 1878 included in the Roll prepared by the Kirk Session, in conformity with the Regulations of the General Assembly; and stating the date of the Minute of the Kirk Session sanctioning the Roll as last purged of persons disqualified by removal or otherwise, and finally adjusted:"

"Of the number of Adherents, not being Communicants, and not under 21 years of age, admitted on application to the Roll of the Congregation, under the General Assembly's Regulations of the 3rd day of June 1878, in those parishes in which Ministers have been elected and appointed under the provisions of Church Patronage Act of 1874:"

"And, of the Population of each parish according to the Census of 1871, and a summary of the results (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 239, of Session 1874)."—(Mr. M'Laren.)

AFGHANISTAN (No. 3).

Copy presented, — of Correspondence respecting the relations between the British Government and that of Afghanistan [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

TURKEY (No. 51, 1878) (REFORMS IN ASIATIC TURKEY).

Copy presented, — of Correspondence respecting Reforms in Asiatic Turkey [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

TURKEY (No. 52, 1878) (RHODOPE COMMISSION).

Copy presented, — of Further Correspondence respecting the proceedings of the International Commission sent to the Mount Rhodope District [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

House adjourned at a quarter before
One o'clock till Thursday
13th February

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 13th February, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—First Reading— Cathedral Statutes * (4).

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE GRAND
DUCHESS OF HESSE (PRINCESS ALICE).

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS OF CONDOLENCE (DECEMBER 17).

THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (the Earl BEAUCHAMP) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address of the 17th December last, as follows :—

MY LORDS,

I THANK you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address, and for your expression of Sympathy and Condolence with me on the loss of my beloved Daughter.

The assurance of your interest in all that concerns my domestic relations and your wishes for the happiness of myself and my family have given me much satisfaction.

BUSINESS OF PARLIAMENT.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD :
My Lords, the circumstances under which Parliament was called together, at the end of last year, rendered it impossible that your Lordships' attention should be directed, in the Speech from the Throne, to any other subject than that which was the occasion of our having been so unexpectedly assembled.
It would not have been prudent—I may say it would not have been possible —at that period to have indicated the measures which Her Majesty's Government might have thought it their duty to introduce to the consideration of Parliament. Nevertheless, everyone must feel the inconvenience that would follow from the omission of that Constitutional custom which makes it the duty of the Government, at the commencement of the Session, to communicate generally to the two Houses the character of the measures which they are about to introduce, and the general course of Business. I have therefore thought, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, that it would be desirable that I should, upon this occasion, take the opportunity of indicating the measures which, under ordinary circumstances, would have been recommended to your notice in the Speech from the Throne at the opening of the present Session. But, my Lords, before doing so, it may not be considered intrusive if I make a few remarks on the general situation of affairs. At this moment, the thoughts and feelings of the country are engrossed by the terrible news just received from South Africa.

My Lords, it is not wise either to depreciate the importance of such an event or to exaggerate it. It is a military disaster—a terrible military disaster—but I think we may say it is no more.
It is not a military defeat arising from the failing energies or resources of the country. It is from accidental and, at this moment, not clearly understood circumstances that the calamity has arisen. I have no information to give your Lordships which is not in your possession by the usual means of intelligence; and it would, I think, be desirable that no one should hazard an opinion as to the causes of the disaster until we receive those official and authentic accounts which are, of course, now on their way. Nothing, indeed, at this moment, is certain respecting this sad occurrence except the valour of our troops. They have shown, in this difficulty—as they have ever shown—the utmost devotion and bravery. Those who have fallen will be remembered, and will be mourned; but we must not forget the exhibition of heroic valour by those who have been spared. At this moment, I am sure, the recollection of those 80 men, who, for 12 hours in a forlorn hope, kept at bay 4,000 of the enemy, and ultimately repulsed them, will prove that the stamina and valour of the English soldiery have not diminished. All I will now say, on the part of the Government, is that we shall avail ourselves of every possible means to place before your Lordships all the information that reaches us. My noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies has given Notice that in a few days—I am in hopes on Saturday next, but certainly on Monday—you will have the Papers which will complete the history of these events. I can further assure your Lordships that we are taking measures, in conjunction with those who are intrusted with these matters, to put our troops and the Colony in a position of security. The reinforcements which we are sending to the Cape are in numbers much beyond what have been applied for by the General in command; and I think we may expect to see that affairs in South Africa assume a very different aspect from that which they bear at present. My Lords, had it not been for this melancholy incident, the slight allusion which, in deference to your Lordships, I should have had to make in my statement to-day to the state of our foreign relations would, I think, by all candid minds, have been considered satisfactory. The progress in the accomplishment of the provisions of the Berlin Treaty—which all of us, whatever may be our general opinions—must wish to be the foundation of an enduring peace in Europe, has been regular, certain, and considerable. The great majority of the provisions of that Treaty have now been carried into effect. By the Supplemental Convention which was signed between the Porte and the Emperor of Russia very recently, the last traces of the Treaty of San Stefano have been abolished; and I believe I may say that at this moment the Russian Army has commenced its retrograde movement, which will result in the complete evacuation of the Dominions of the Sultan. The provision which had been made for the exchange of territories in Asia between the belligerents has already been fully accomplished. The arrangement with regard to the boundary of Montenegro—a most difficult part of the settlement—has been carried into complete effect, and Podgoritz and Strailetz have been relinquished without bloodshed and without those incidents of horror as were anticipated by some. Again, the occupation of Bosnia has been accomplished, and tranquillity reigns in that Province. The tranquillity of Crete is complete, and I have reason to hope, and indeed to believe, that the institutions established in that island obtain the confidence of persons of all classes and creeds. The negotiations for the rectification of the boundaries of Greece have already commenced, in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin. With regard to other diplomatic incidents which are, in a certain degree, connected with the Treaty of Berlin—or at least with the general settlement then devised—I think there has been some rather harsh measure dealt out to the Sultan in the insinuations—which have been rather profuse—against his sincerity or ability to carry into effect those reforms in his Asiatic Dominions upon which the prosperity of his Kingdom and his own power mainly depend. We should not forget that the Sultan has had the most difficult task in the world engaging his energies at the moment when he was called upon or expected to exercise those energies on other points. He has had to free his dominions from a conquering and invading host, and that has naturally absorbed his energies and his resources. It must not be forgotten that during all this period the Sultan has had to maintain an army of 300,000 disciplined men with an exhausted Treasury. But, notwithstanding these circumstances, the communications and arrangements that have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Porte have been of a satisfactory character; and I have learnt to-day that the Imperial Commission which was instituted by the Sultan himself to consider and report on the changes which should be made in the government of the various Provinces of his Dominions, has drawn up its Report and sent it in to the General Council of State. During this period, there has been more than one instance in which the Sultan has shown his anxiety to act in the spirit of those principles of reform which he had proclaimed—such as the nomination of Midhat Pacha for a period of five years to the government of Syria—this being an indication of the policy to be pursued throughout the various Provinces of the Turkish Empire. My Lords, I have little to say beyond what I have already said respecting the Island of Cyprus. Last year I made a statement on what I considered the highest authority—that of the Admiral commanding in those waters, and of the distinguished soldier now in command of the Island, and the personal experience of some of my Colleagues. I wish to enter into no controversy on the subject. Time brings truth, and I believe the opinion of the country at the present moment has been enlightened generally on the subject. There are, however, two points which I think it my duty

The Earl of Beaconsfield

to place before the House in connection with the subject of Cyprus. First of all, it will be satisfactory for your Lordships to learn that the question respecting the public domains, which, when the Convention was first entered into, was necessarily unsettled, has now been settled entirely to the satisfaction of Her Majesty's Government; and the whole of those domains—with the exception, of course, of the private estates of the Sultan—have been placed in their hands. The other point which I hope will be considered not less satisfactory is the one of revenue. Those who anticipated that in undertaking the responsibility of occupying Cyprus for great political objects we were entailing a vast burden on this country will learn with satisfaction that the revenue of Cyprus, even in the first year, will have not only paid the whole of the expenses of its government, but will leave no inconsiderable surplus. There is every prospect that the surplus, not only in this year but in subsequent years, will furnish the means by which those public works may be carried out which are necessary to secure the prosperity of what I must look upon as a very valuable acquisition. My Lords, in giving your Lordships this slight sketch of what has occurred in the Levant, I cannot resist the temptation to call your Lordships' attention to the great services of Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople. My Lords, that gentleman belongs to a different political connection from myself; and therefore I speak with the sincerity of one who wishes to do justice to the eminent services of one who has been, and may be again, my political opponent. I do not know any man in whom there has been a rarer or more complete combination of two great qualities—energy and patience—than in Sir Henry Layard. He is a man of great resource, and I venture to call the attention of your Lordships to him on this occasion, because I know that his health has broken down under his great exertions and sacrifices, and he must—I hope only for a time—leave the scene of his exertions and efforts. My Lords, I wish I could at this moment give you an authoritative intimation that from our experience as a Government we hope and believe that the commercial depression of this country has materially abated. Still, I venture to say that I think there are some indications of improvement, and that we have seen the worst of a depression scarcely equalled for the period of its duration. I am unwilling to express myself in any phrase which might mislead; but there is one point connected with this matter upon which I may speak with confidence. I wish to express my admiration of the sincere and spontaneous spirit of benevolence which has animated the country generally in encountering this great distress. The resources of this country, both moral and material, have been employed in a surpassing manner with reference to this calamity. My Lords, it becomes me now to call your attention to those measures which it is our intention to submit for your consideration. But, my Lords, before I touch upon that point, there is one subject to which I have omitted to call your attention in what I have already said. I refer to the state of affairs in Afghanistan. Her Majesty's Government have the satisfaction of feeling that the object of their interference in that country has been completely accomplished. We are now in possession of the three great highways which connect Afghanistan with India, and I hope that this country will remain in possession of those three great highways. We have secured the object for which the expedition was undertaken; we have secured that Frontier which will, I hope and believe, render our Indian Empire invulnerable; and we have attained that object in a manner which will trench as little as possible upon the independence and self-government of Afghanistan. My Lords, I will now mention those measures which we shall ask you to consider during the course of the present Session. The first measure, which will be introduced in the other House of Parliament, will be the Mutiny Bill. Your Lordships are well aware that for many years the old Mutiny Bill has been the subject of severe, and, in my opinion, in some respects too, not unjust criticism. Some clauses are obsolete; they are not adapted to the period in which we live. The subject has been now well considered, and it is our intention to introduce a complete measure, which, while preserving the Constitutional control of Parliament over the Army, will be in its nature of the character of a Military Code. The Bill as drawn will be in harmony with the recommendations of Parliamentary Committees, and with the views of those who have deeply studied the subject. The next measure we shall ask Parliament to consider will be a code of a different character—the Consolidation of the Criminal Law. A Bill will be brought in which will deal completely with that subject, and which has, in fact, been drawn up by a Commission of Her Majesty's Judges; and although neither this nor the other House of Parliament will for a moment lose their power of amending or criticizing its composition, still it will be a source of confidence and satisfaction to them to know by what means the Bill has been drawn up, and that there is no statement, or arrangement, or condition, or proviso contained in it, which has not been the result of the deep thought and consideration of the most learned authorities in the land. The next subject which we shall wish to have the opinion of Parliament upon, and which may probably be introduced first in this House, is one that deeply interests, at the present moment, the people of this country—that is, the Law of Bankruptcy. A measure will be brought in which will, I trust, be more successful than previous measures of the kind; it has had the greatest pains taken in its preparation, and I believe it is one which will meet the pressing requirements of the country. There will also be a Bill for amending the law as to Summary Jurisdiction. Your Lordships are aware that the Railway Commission expires this year, and therefore you will not be surprised that it is necessary to introduce a Bill on that subject. Then there is a Bill for establishing County Boards in England; and, at the same time, one to reform and amend the Grand Jury Laws of Ireland. There will be a Valuation Bill also introduced, and a Poor Law Amendment Bill for Scotland. My Lords, on the next occasion when Her Majesty shall be graciously pleased to address this House, either in person or by Her Commissioners, I shall be happy indeed if I can feel that all these Bills have been passed into law. I may say, my Lords, that these measures do not by any means include all the questions with which Her Majesty's Government are ready to deal, and in fact are, if necessary and opportunity is offered to them, prepared to deal. But experience has shown us that it is necessary to be moderate in these matters, and your Lordships are well aware that the increased spirit of criticism in "another place" renders the passage of Bills more difficult than it formerly was. My Lords, I have now fulfilled my promise of making you acquainted, in accordance with the wholesome Constitutional custom, with the general views of Her Majesty's Government, and the general proposals which they mean to submit to you; and all I ask and hope is that with the assistance of your wisdom they may be carried into law, and may prove beneficial and useful to the country.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I think the course taken by the noble Earl in making the statement he has just made to the House is a perfectly fair and convenient one; and I have to thank the noble Earl for his courtesy in communicating to me his intention to take that course. My Lords, at the opening of Parliament, remarking on the Queen's Speech, I said that I could, without any great inconvenience, wait until February to learn what Bills were to be introduced, and I am glad I have not agitated myself very much on the subject in the interval. Several of the Bills now announced by the noble Earl are useful, and I certainly agree with the noble Earl in the hope that they may be satisfactorily dealt with during the Session. Some of the Bills have been before this and the other House of Parliament on former occasions; but one—the County Boards Bill—is new to us, and I should be rather afraid, unless considerable alteration has been made in the Bill as presented to the House of Commons last year, that we could not see our way to pass it ourselves. There is one feature of the list which I heartily endorse—that dealing with Bankruptcy—which subject it is impossible, I think, not to deal with after the very remarkable Memorial which has lately been presented on the subject. With regard to the Railway Commission, I think the occasion is one of very considerable importance, not only to the railways, but to the community at large. But what I very much rejoice at is that there is no announcement of a Bill, and no indication of any attempt to meet a very natural, but I think a very unreasonable, wish on the part of a good many of the community to introduce some panacea for the general depression to which the noble Earl has alluded. Any such measure would be in violation of those principles of political economy in which I am a sincere believer. The Secretary of State for the Colonies, indeed, has talked of "the dead bones of political economy," but perhaps it was out of deference to the feelings which unfortunately exist in some of the Colonies with which he is connected; but the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House of Commons has taken public occasion to discourage the idea that Her Majesty's Government had any intention to yield to the temptation to meet any popular cry on this subject. The noble Earl has informed us of the general state of our external affairs, and especially of that which has occupied the attention of the public so long—the Berlin Treaty. I find myself in some difficulty in approaching that subject. There was a time when the Opposition proposed to itself the duty and privilege of criticizing the acts of the Government. There has lately been a desire to take away that liberty. If we talk of what has passed, we are begged to let bygones alone, and not to waste any time in discussing historical reminiscences. If we speculate on the future we subject ourselves to ridicule, not altogether undeserved. But if we wish to speak of the present, we frequently find that it is concealed from us; and if we complain of concealment, we are immediately accused of using personal language. As to the virulence of abuse with which we are charged by Her Majesty's Government, it does not appear to me to vary very much from language which I have heard ever since I have been in public life. I think that even in this august House I have heard Lord Lyndhurst, the late Lord Derby, and Lord Ellenborough attack a Liberal Government with a great deal of energy and power. I am not quite sure I have not heard even some of my noble Friends opposite speak of the late Government in a manner not absolutely overflowing with the milk of human kindness. One Member of Her Majesty's Government has thought fit in the last few weeks—I might say in the last few days—to describe us as an ambitious, unscrupulous, and unpatriotic Opposition. There is one subject to which I must refer connected with the Eastern Question. It is the rejection of the Berlin Memorandum. I read in the newspapers that on Tuesday the First Lord of the Admiralty introduced the subject into his speech at Westminster, and is reported to have said that the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government in respect to the Berlin Memorandum was "not questioned by the Leader of the Liberal Party in the House of Commons, but was deliberately approved of by Lord Granville himself in the House of Lords."

I think this hardly represents the course I took in regard to the Berlin Memorandum, and I will refer your Lordships to Hansard for what I really did say. Your Lordships will find that on the 31st July, 1876, I am reported thus—

"I stated in the House a month ago that I could give no opinion till I had seen the document. After reading that paper, I agree that it would not have been wise to accede to that document. . . . As to the substance, I think that, as a whole, it was not acceptable; but, as sometimes is the case, the reasons given for objecting to everything in it do not appear to me sound, and in no case do I think it was wise to drop the matter so completely. . . . I cannot say that the war has broken out in consequence of the refusal of the Berlin proposals, unaccompanied by any suggestion from Her Majesty's Government for any other policy. But, on the other hand, it is impossible for them to deny that this may be the case."—[3 Hansard, cccxxi. 89-90.]

I find from the Papers that the objections I then made to the rejection of the Berlin Memorandum, without proposing any suggestions of our own, were exactly those which the French Government so forcibly urged. I have done with that subject, but I have thought it of sufficient importance to correct an unintentional mistake of the First Lord of the Admiralty. Well, but I find it has been very often said that we on this side of the House could have but little title to criticize the policy of the Government on the Eastern Question; because, as Mr. Smith said on the same occasion, we had no policy at all, or, if we had a policy, it was that of letting matters drift, or of joining hands with Russia and fighting Turkey. That is not an accurate statement of the case; for I find that in February, 1877, I expressed my fear that the Emperor of Russia, strengthened by the part we had taken in the Conference, might act upon his declaration at Moscow, and go to war.

I said that I, for one, should deeply deplore it—such a thing would be pregnant with inconvenience and danger. The remedy suggested—that we alone should join with Russia in the work—though it, perhaps, might a little mitigate, would go a very short way to diminish, those dangers and those inconveniences. I then quoted the principles laid down by Sir Stafford Northcote and Mr. Cross, the latter saying that the time was come when this country should refuse to be put off with paper currency; they should demand to be paid in solid coin. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

“I believe it to be impossible really to secure the peace of Europe unless you take steps to improve the administration of the Provinces of Turkey. As long as you leave that door open—as long as you do nothing to remove the causes of those disturbances—any peace you may secure for the moment will be a hollow peace, no better than putting a piece of sticking-plaster upon a wound when there is festering matter beneath.”

Grounding my appeal on those words, I urged upon the Government that if they would use their influence to persuade Europe as one body to come forward and insist, as they had a moral and just right to do, that Turkey shall perform her promises, they would successfully deal with the danger which remains. [3 Hansard, ccxxxii. 30.] This might be a good or it might be a bad policy; but it was certainly not a policy of letting things drift or of joining Russia alone against Turkey; and it was a policy of which I have as much right to assert that it would have been successful as the noble Earl the Prime Minister, then the First Lord of the Treasury, had to assert, as he did last summer, that a policy of a diametrically opposite character, which, notwithstanding his great Parliamentary strength, he did not adopt, would have succeeded. And the case is still stronger as against the policy which was adopted and which failed in preventing the war. It is said that we might not have succeeded in obtaining the co-operation of Europe. But we were considered the obstacles to that co-operation; and it appears from the Blue Books that Austria herself made a proposal to that effect; that Italy was in favour of it; that France urged it; and that the German Emperor twice stated to the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that without it no success would be obtained. It was said that such a policy might lead to war. I believe the risk to have been infinitesimal; but remember that what you said and what you did brought the country to the brink of war in Europe, and has indirectly led to war in Asia. The noble Earl has given us some information with regard to the execution of the Berlin Treaty; and he has said, with perfect truth, that it would be the desire of all of us that peace should ensue, and that a satisfactory settlement should be adopted by Europe. Then he gave us some facts, as considerable steps that had been taken with regard to the fulfilment of that Treaty. I do not deny that something has been done. When the Government take some credit to themselves for having strengthened Turkey by taking away from her Provinces not alluded to in the San Stefano Treaty, but which they say were really sources of weakness to her, I quite agree with the noble Earl that, so far as that strengthening process is concerned, the Berlin Treaty has been completely carried out. But as to the Greek Frontier question, it appears to me that it has been left very much in the hands of the French Government, and has not been sufficiently attended to by Her Majesty's Government. I think the Russians are likely to leave Turkish territory at the time appointed, but when that happens the difficulty will arise as to what is to be done in the territory South of the Balkans—the new Turkey in Europe with some 60,000 square miles and some 6,000,000 of inhabitants; and the question which I should like to have answered is whether there is likely to be a peaceable transfer of the country to the Turkish Government—whether that Government will take possession by the free-will of the Bulgarians, and if, not, whether they will do so by force?—or whether Her Majesty's Government have been engaged in any negotiations respecting a joint occupation which they themselves refused before the war, and which might have prevented it? The noble Earl incidentally alluded to the Anglo-Turkish Convention. There is one point in connection with that Convention, and that is the liability in the future, and in all circumstances, to do that which we might have done during the last war, with everything in our favour, but which we did not do

Earl Granville

—namely, to defend the Asiatic Provinces of Turkey. I imagine that our liabilities remain just as they did, and therefore I come to the question of reform. I have read with interest the Correspondence on that subject which has taken place between the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) and the Turkish Government; but the demands of the noble Marquess have been met with a non possumus. The despatch of the Turkish Minister is throughout an argument against doing what Her Majesty's Government proposed should be done; and what was the rejoinder? I expected to find a vigorous reply to the objections raised by the Porte; but, on the contrary, the noble Marquess labours to prove how wrong he was, and how right the Turk is. As the Turk did not require to be told this, it is difficult not to think that the despatch was not addressed to him, but was meant for home consumption, to convince us that the failure was not complete. As regards Cyprus, I would like to know why the Government of that Island is under the Foreign Office and not the Colonial Office. I cannot understand why this Island should not have been placed under that Department. The Colonial Office has had great experience in the civil administration of our military posts; men of remarkable ability at the head of that Department have had to deal with an infinite number of Crown Colonies; and I cannot understand why, with the machinery at its command, the Colonial Office should not take charge of Cyprus. The only reason that might be suggested for not adopting that course is that it was not really a Colony, and that, therefore, it could not be placed under the Colonial Office; but surely that is hardly a sufficient reason. I am aware that Cyprus is not a colony. I am aware that we hired Cyprus on an uncertain tenure. I know that there are questions with regard to the right of foreigners, and that other difficulties may arise; but be that as it may, you must, for a long or a short time, govern Cyprus as a Crown Colony; and I think it would have been wise if Sir Garnet Wolseley had had all the advantages of the additional knowledge of the Colonial Office to guide him in the civil administration of Cyprus. I have a little mistrust as to the information which the Government get about the Island of Cyprus. It was said by the Government that, before acquiring Cyprus, they had adequate information on the subject; but a gentleman who accompanied Sir Garnet Wolseley has stated that he went out without any adequate information whatever. That statement has been published, and I am not aware that it has been contradicted. At all events, I made a very earnest appeal to the Government whether, as there was a doubt in the matter, it would not be possible to delay sending the troops to Cyprus until they had adequate information as to the healthiness of the Island. My noble Friend the Lord President of the Council (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) answered me that the opinion of Government was that the mortality and disease was three-fifths better than in Europe, and even Italy; that the Government had received information that the climate was of a healthy character. They sent out 8,000 Indian troops, who had nothing to do except to solve this most unfortunate problem in a way which we all now more or less know. The Government have not been careful in getting information. The First Lord of the Admiralty recently read a very glowing account of Cyprus from Sir Garnet Wolseley. I have heard it said that he was the only man in the Island who held such a good opinion of it. I have the greatest respect for Sir Garnet Wolseley as a soldier, but I am not so sure of his authority as a sanitary officer. The First Lord of the Admiralty was quite triumphant because he was one week on the Island without his health entirely giving way. The Prime Minister has pledged himself that before next July there will be harbour accommodation in Cyprus sufficient for British commerce. I am not sanguine as to that pledge being fulfilled. Mr. Brassey, who has gone out and written most impartially on the subject, says there is no harbour in Cyprus, although a coaling station may be established in Famagosta. We have the official authority of the First Lord of the Admiralty that it is possible to make an excellent harbour for very little money indeed at Famagosta. Information which I have received from a professional man who has resided in the Island tends to show that it is a place of a pestilential character, and that it is a most unhealthy resort; and my informant feels pretty sure that if the intention is carried out of making a coaling station there, when the Fleet arrives every man of the Fleet will be found to be down with fever. He says it would be more economical to create a new harbour in any other part of the Island. I am inclined the more to believe that this is the case because Sir Garnet Wolseley himself describes Famagosta as a most unhealthy part of the Island. We are, it seems, to have on the coast an harbour in a pestilential climate, and a place d'armes on the plateau of a mountain higher than the mountains of either Wales or Scotland. Let us hope that all this is to be done, as has been said, for a very small sum, and that we are not going to spend hundreds of thousands. The noble Earl asks us to wait for information. But time goes on. Some of us will not live very much longer, and, in the meantime, we should like some information. It would be satisfactory to us if the Government would present to Parliament the Report of the Committee of the Cabinet that went out to investigate the Island, the Reports of the head of the medical staff, and the medical Returns. My Lords, it is a matter of regret to me that I was not able to share in the great debate and division with regard to the Afghan War. I am not going to re-open that debate, or to refer at any length to the question again; inasmuch as after the very decisive majority which resulted on that division, it would hardly seem courteous to your Lordships to do so; but I should like to say that one thing particularly struck me—namely, that the greater part of the debate seemed to turn on the want of foresight of previous Governments of India. Now, it seems to me that when the noble Earl the last Governor General (the Earl of Northbrook) received from the Government at home instructions to carry out a new policy, he informed the Government that the adoption of this new policy would very much alter our relations with the Afghan Government; that the Ameer was perfectly sure to see through any sham pretext; and spoke of the probability of throwing him into the arms of Russia. I do not see any want of foresight there. The facts we now know—that our relations would be altered and probably a war ensue—are as predicted by the noble Earl. Then it has been said that the predictions of the Opposition in regard to the British Army in Afghanistan have not been carried out, and that in the place of disaster and defeat we have victory; but it has never been alleged that if properly handled and commanded our troops could not go through Afghanistan, but the contrary has been maintained, not only by General Durand 20 years ago, but by Lord Lawrence, in the first letter he wrote this autumn, by Lord Grey still more strongly, and also by Lord Northbrook. The result has shown, indeed, that our brave troops have earned the distinction which attaches to them in a remarkable degree; and if there has not been so much fighting as they might have wished, there has still been ample opportunity for the display of the utmost valour and skill. The noble Earl said our scientific Frontier was assured. But the question is what we are to do now, when our difficulties are really beginning? I hope he adheres to his assurance that this can be done with a diminution instead of an increase of troops required on the Frontier. He said our object was to have an independent and friendly Afghanistan.

Earl Granville

VISCOUNT HALIFAX: Friendly and strong.

EARL GRANVILLE: Well, that is a point on which I wish to know something. Does this not entirely destroy the strength and friendliness of Afghanistan?

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: Perhaps the noble Earl will allow me to give the correct words. I never used the word "strength," or the epithets "strong" and "friendly." I said that I trusted our arrangement would be consistent with an independent and self-governing Afghanistan.

EARL GRANVILLE: But will it be so? Have we not produced anarchy in the country, and set the people against us? What are the intentions of the Government? Some of the most ardent opponents of our foreign policy think it necessary to occupy the country in its entirety. I should like to know whether the Government have had any communications with the Russian Government; whether those communications have led to any result, and whether it can be communicated? My Lords, when your Lordships assembled in December last,

I expressed my great surprise that so great and critical a question as the war in South Africa should have been entirely overlooked and omitted from Her Majesty's Speech, and I was still more surprised that the noble Earl the Prime Minister following and answering me did not make the slightest allusion to the subject. It really looked as if the Government were hardly alive to the gravity of one of the most anxious questions which have arisen for years connected with our Colonies. The dreadful calamity which has occurred has dispelled any apathy or indifference in any quarter. The marvellous organization of modern journalism, assisted by steam and electricity, has for one of its results that any great joy or great calamity strikes the hearts of the population as if they were one and the same man. The First Lord of the Treasury carefully and wisely abstained from treating this question controversially. I freely admit that this disaster, great as it is, does not necessarily affect the question of the justice or policy of the war; although, of course, it raises questions as to how it ought to be carried on. But it has called the attention of the public to the matter in all its bearings, and when the proper time comes I am sure that Her Majesty's Government, as much as any other, will desire that the gravest consideration should be given to all the antecedent circumstances as bearing on the present state of affairs and on our future policy. I may state, in no hostility to Her Majesty's Government—I may state generally what appears to me to have been the state of circumstances, as far as can be gathered from the Papers delivered at the end of July, from the newspapers, and from an exceedingly cursory perusal I have, through the courtesy of the Colonial Office, been enabled to have, a few hours ago, of the Papers laid this evening on the Table of the House. There is one question which is separate from this incident, but which is intimately connected with the whole subject, and that is the position of a colony as to its Government. There is the old Cape Colony, with the power of self-government and the duty of self-defence; but if it has not power to defend itself it can come to the Imperial Government, and then the Imperial Government would consider if it would give assistance, and, if so, on what terms. It so happens, however—and it is a strange anomaly—that we are now forcing troops on the Cape Colony, and a responsible Minister has remonstrated against that. This is not a satisfactory state of things. With regard to Natal, there are a very small number of White inhabitants, and an enormous number of Black subjects of the Queen, who have been attracted by the safety of your Government; and you must keep absolute power over those two bodies, and if you do that you are bound to protect them. The Queen's Government has been carried on there for some years, and I think I may venture to appeal to those noble Lords who have been Secretaries of State for the Colonies whether it is not one of the most remarkable things that the Government has been carried on—and carried on with tranquillity—with a comparatively small number of White inhabitants and something like 200,000 Blacks. But in regard to the policy we have adopted towards the Zulus, it must not be forgotten for how many years, whatever may be the adverse opinion formed as to the mode in which he annexed the Transvaal, and changed his policy towards the Zulus, the services of Sir Theophilus Shepstone in the administration of Native affairs in Natal have been invaluable. Sir Bartle Frere is a man of the highest character, of great ability, and great experience. From a Memorandum written by him in defence of the policy of the Government in Afghanistan, and which probably had a great share in determining that policy, it is quite clear what his general views are with regard to a Frontier policy for our great Dependencies. He is not disposed to be content with existing Frontiers, but is disposed to extend them. It is evident that he thinks that in the case of any possible future difficulty it is better to go at once to the most decisive measures, even if those measures involve war. He has a strong opinion that it is necessary to have a predominating influence over all neighbouring States—over all States adjoining our own. This policy with regard to India has been approved of by Her Majesty's Government, and sanctioned by this House; and this is the policy which has been adopted at the Cape.

It is a policy which would certainly find favour with the Colonists of the Cape, who like the lavish expenditure of a large British force, and would be delighted with a war carried on at the expense of the Imperial Government and with Imperial troops. In the ultimatum to Cetewayo—and no one can deny that it was nothing less than a declaration of war, for acceptance of it was impossible—the first point touched upon was the international grievance—the taking away of two women from British territory who had escaped in consequence of a charge of adultery, the forcing two surveyors to sit down but without further injury, and a raid into a disputed territory. It is impossible to imagine that such things as these should be the cause of an immediate recourse to war. If we dealt in this manner with all our Dependencies, with savages in their own immediate neighbourhood, we shall soon be at war in all quarters of the world. Then, as to the King of Zululand himself, no doubt he is a monster, and the system of government adopted by him is indefensible. But I leave it to your Lordships to say how far we ought to go to war to introduce good government in a barbarous State when there is no chance of our Army remaining there to enforce it. I can quite conceive that the presence of an enormous army of 40,000 armed—and not inefficiently armed—men, is a great danger to the Colony. It is a point on which I give no opinion at present as to the best way with which it can be dealt; but, as a measure of justice, it is questionable by what abstract right you could demand that the whole army should be disbanded in the face of the Native enemies of the King and the hostility of the Boers. Now, as to the reinforcements, there is a matter on which I have some doubt, and which requires to be hereafter explained. It is this:—In No. 83a, paragraphs 2 and 3, General Thesiger, on the 14th of September, asks for more officers, and says that an addition of two regiments would be essential, and that the presence of a cavalry regiment would be of enormous advantage; and Sir Bartle Frere, on the 23rd of September, says—

“I find that the urgency of supporting General Thesiger's request is much greater even than I supposed. I trust there will be no delay in complying with his request to its full extent.”

Earl Granville

As I understand, the answer of Her Majesty's Government was that they did not see the necessity of sending those troops.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Troops were sent.

EARL GRANVILLE: I think that was afterwards. The answer at the time to which I refer was in the negative. Her Majesty's Government did not see the necessity of sending the troops. But, in order that there may be no mistake on this point, I will ask Her Majesty's Government whether the two infantry regiments and the regiment of cavalry were sent out?

EARL CADOGAN: Not the cavalry.

EARL GRANVILLE: That is exactly what I understand. I could understand Her Majesty's Government saying—“We leave the matter in your hands, and we send you all you desire;” but Her Majesty's Government seem to have continued their objection to the war, and to have sent out just enough troops to enable the First Lord of the Admiralty to tell us, as he did the other night, that General Lord Chelmsford had enough troops for the purpose, and yet they deprived him of the cavalry regiment which he said was of enormous importance. This is what I cannot understand, and it certainly requires some future explanation. But this—the first day when Parliament meets after this disaster, unequalled for so many years—is not the time for squabbling whether Her Majesty's Government is to blame, or the local Government, or the military authorities are to blame. I must say that I think there is great danger in the sort of language which Members of Her Majesty's Government are in the habit of using as to the desirableness of the extension of our Empire. I was surprised when I saw within the last few weeks that the Colonial Secretary had actually boasted that the policy of the Government was annexation in all parts of the world. I think that language of that sort, backed up by language about the extension of the Empire, has a tendency to encourage our Representatives abroad to think that any go-a-head policy on their part is likely to meet with the approval of the Government. But, my Lords, what we have now especially to consider is not the past, the present, or even the future policy of the Government. The question is what can be done to deal in the best way with what the noble Earl has justly described as a sad calamity. I do not wish to take a desponding view of the state of affairs in South Africa; but it is certainly exceedingly grave. There is one point which is exceedingly satisfactory. I mean that wonderful defence of the fortified post at Rourke's Drift. I am not sure that that successful resistance has not been the means of saving both the Colonies in that part of Africa from destruction; and it is a defence which will teach the Zulus that however successful they may be in an ambush, or in an expedition carefully prepared, it is very dangerous for them to face British troops in the open field or in any fortified position. As regards the Black population of Natal, who are nearly related to the Zulus, it seems to me that it was a very great fault to drill and train them to the use of arms. That is, I think, a great danger in the case of an uncivilized people like them; but it is impossible not to hope that their knowledge of the numerous blessings and benefits which they have derived from being under British government, and, on the other hand, their knowledge of the cruelties, massacres, and despotism of the King in Zululand, will make them remain perfectly faithful and loyal to the Queen. That this may be the case I most heartily wish. It is unnecessary for me to add that Her Majesty's Government may rely with the greatest confidence that we on this side of the House shall give our most hearty and cordial support to the best efforts which they can make, and most quickly make, in order to secure the safety of our gallant troops, and of all Her Majesty's subjects in South Africa.

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, I will not follow the noble Earl in his discussion of matters of policy connected with this unfortunate war, inasmuch as your Lordships have only this afternoon received Papers, a careful study of which is necessary before an accurate opinion can be formed as to the merits of the case. When the proper time comes for a review of the whole subject I shall be perfectly willing to discuss with the noble Earl all the points which he has raised. The noble Earl has told us that he has only had the opportunity of glancing at these Papers cursorily; but when he has further examined them, I think he will admit that some of his criticisms admit of easy and, I hope, satisfactory explanation. I must, however, express my regret that the noble Earl should have assisted in the dissemination of the erroneous view that the reinforcements asked for by Lord Chelmsford were not granted him by Her Majesty's Government in their entirety, or in the shape in which Lord Chelmsford asked for them. That this impression is an erroneous one will be shown by a Paper which has been laid on the Table this afternoon by my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War, containing a despatch from General Thesiger to the Secretary of State for War, which despatch has been inadvertently omitted from the Papers now in your Lordships' hands. The despatch, written at Pietermaritzburg, is in the following terms:—

“Sir,—I have the honour to enclose for your information a Memorandum showing the number of Imperial troops that will be necessary in the event of operations taking place against the Zulus, and how they would be probably utilized. The Memorandum also shows the manner in which the officers already sent out on special service have been employed, and the necessity in the above contingency of their number being increased, likewise of officers of Transport Service being despatched.—I have, &c., “FRED. THESIGER, L.-G.

“Memorandum.—In the event of an invasion of Zululand being decided upon, I am of opinion that it will be necessary to operate on the five following lines:—1, Durban, Fort Williamson, on Tugela River; 2, Pietermaritzburg, Grey Town, and Middle Drift, on Tugela River; 3, Ladysmith, Rourke's Drift, on Buffalo River; 4, Newcastle, Utrecht, Blood River; 5, Middleburg, Derby, Pongolo River. Each of the columns on these five lines ought to have a complete battalion of eight companies of British Infantry—five battalions. At the principal base of operations, Pietermaritzburg, there should be a reserve of one battalion plus one dépôt company. At the intermediate bases of Durban and Fort Williamson, Grey Town, and Middle Drift, on Tugela River, Ladysmith and Rourke's Drift, Newcastle, Utrecht, and Blood River, Middleburg, Derby, and Pongolo River, it will be necessary to leave a company for protection of stores and of our lines of communication. For this duty, therefore, 12 companies will be required. With each column there should be a detachment of Royal Engineers. Two complete companies (or 240 men) will not be in the least too large a reinforcement, as there will necessarily be a very large amount of engineering work to be done with each of the five columns. It is most important that companies should not be denuded of their officers by their being taken away for Staff employ. It is absolutely certain that the number of Zulus opposed to us will be at least in the proportion of 10 to 1 of our total regular force; and if a concentrated attack were made upon one of the columns before it had effected a junction with any of the others, this proportion might possibly rise to 30 or 40 to 1. The personal influence of company officers would under such circumstances be very valuable."

The General then goes on to state his requirements as to special service and other officers, and he concludes by giving a detailed list of the troops required, which is as follows:—

|                                            | Companies. |
|--------------------------------------------|------------|
| "Five columns .....                        | 40         |
| Pietermaritzburg .....                     | 9          |
| Durban and Fort Williamson....             | 2          |
| Grey Town and Middle Drift....             | 2          |
| Ladismith and Rorke's Drift ....           | 2          |
| Newcastle, Utrecht, and Blood River .....  | 3          |
| Middleberg, Derby, and Pongolo River ..... | 3          |
| Pretoria .....                             | 3          |
| Lydenburg .....                            | 2          |

Total..... 66

Eight battalions and two companies.

Troops available.

|                                                | Battalions. |
|------------------------------------------------|-------------|
| Transvaal, 13th and 80th.....                  | 2           |
| Cisvaal, 1-3rd, 1-24th, 2-24th, and 90th ..... | 4           |

Required.

|                       | Complete companies. |
|-----------------------|---------------------|
| Royal Engineers ..... | 2                   |

Available.

|                             |      |
|-----------------------------|------|
| Field Officers .....        | 2    |
| Captains .....              | 0    |
| Subalterns .....            | 2    |
| N.-C. Officers and Men..... | 19." |

Your Lordships will perceive that in this despatch there is no request for cavalry, and the only mention of it in the Papers is to be found in the passage quoted by the noble Earl opposite, in which Sir Bartle Frere records a statement of General Thesiger that cavalry would prove "of enormous advantage." I think that when the Papers—which will be issued on Saturday, or on Monday at the latest—are examined, it will be found that whatever may have been the shortcomings on the part of the Government in reference to this matter, there is one thing of which they cannot be accused—namely, of refusing to furnish the reinforcements which were asked for either by Sir Bartle Frere or by Lord Chelmsford. Although we have not yet received any official despatch from Sir Bartle Frere or Lord Chelmsford on the subject since the notification of the despatch of troops, the Secretary of State for the Colonies has received private information to the effect that they are both entirely satisfied not only with the character of the reinforcements, but also with the completeness of the arrangements made for the troops.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, had I spoken on this subject a few days ago, I should have expressed my great regret at the outbreak of the war in Zululand. I should have expressed my regret on account of the expense which the war must involve, and still more the necessity it will impose on the Colonial Office of administering the affairs of Zululand. I regret that the result of the war must be to transfer to our hands an entire territory which it is exceedingly difficult to manage under ordinary circumstances, which it will be still more difficult to govern under the extraordinary circumstances that have occurred, and before we are prepared to receive this new and weighty burden. The condition of Zululand is like a ball of sand—as soon as it is touched it will fall to pieces. I cannot, therefore, but feel that had it been possible to tide over the present difficulties it would have been very judicious on the part of Her Majesty's Government to have done so, as I believe the problem would have solved itself in the course of a very few years. But this unfortunate affair has greatly changed matters. We have now, in addition to our previous difficulties, to deplore a very great reverse and a very heavy loss of life; and, what is worse in its political consequences, a great unsettlement of the Native mind throughout the whole of South Africa, and we might at any moment be the witnesses of all the horrors of a rising of the population of any part of the Colony. There is there an European community of some 18,000 or 20,000, in the face of a Native population of not less than 300,000; and in the Transvaal we have an European population of about 40,000, in the midst of a Native population little short of 1,000,000. These are highly dangerous conditions, and one reverse may endanger the whole of our future policy in South Africa and render it impossible to carry out the changes which are contemplated, and in which all parties are, I believe, agreed. But in the present position of affairs everything must be merged in one single consideration—that the war must be pushed to the utmost, not only for the honour of our arms, but for the safety of the White communities in South Africa. There are, of course, two considerations involved in this as in every war. One, of course, is its prudence, and the other its justice. I think we should do wisely to wait for the Papers that are promised by the Government as to the prudence of this war, and I think that in fairness we ought to be slow to suppose that there has been any imprudent action in this matter. I have therefore heard with great satisfaction the statement of my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Earl Cadogan), that no troops have been withheld that were demanded by the General in command. But as regards the second question—the justice of the war—knowing as much as I do of South Africa, I am bound in fairness to say at once that taking into account the antecedents of the case, and the engagements which have been entered into, I cannot consider that this war is unjust. I listened to the statement of my noble Friend on the other side of the House (Earl Granville) with respect to an ultimatum alleged to have been sent by Sir Bartle Frere; I hope we shall find in the Papers, when published, a fuller statement than we have at present. I have also seen in the daily papers a very severe attack made upon a recent Memorandum of Sir Bartle Frere. But my own feeling with respect to Sir Bartle Frere is that, considering his past career, it is not too much to say that he has always shown tact, foresight, and sense of justice. It was my duty, when Secretary of State for the Colonies, to ask Sir Bartle Frere to undertake the difficult task of the administration of South Africa; and so far as I was cognisant of that administration, it was exercised with a tact, judgment, wisdom, and moderation worthy of any Governor ever sent out by this country to govern a British Colony. There are at this moment in South Africa no less than three very distinguished and experienced Governors—one at the Cape, another at Natal, and a third in the Transvaal—namely, Sir Bartle Frere, Sir Henry Bulwer, and Sir Theophilus Shepstone; and I venture to say that it would be difficult to find three persons so competent, from their general knowledge of administration, from temper, and from an intimate acquaintance with the customs and habits of the Natives of South Africa, to deal with the class of questions now rising in South Africa. If, then, the Government are satisfied that these three men, whose opportunities of observation were so good, and whose judgment I believe to be the best in South Africa, concurred in the wisdom and justice of this war, I, as not longer in Office and with access to official knowledge, should certainly withhold any disapproval; I should, on the contrary, be inclined to believe that they were right in their judgment under the circumstances. There is one other point to which I wish to refer. When I was in Office a year ago, I am bound to say that the position of affairs in South Africa as regarded Zululand was precarious in the extreme. It was gradually growing worse and worse, and it was evident to all that a storm was in preparation. The question then seemed how long that storm could be properly averted. The conduct of Cetewayo had become insolent and aggressive. It was the result, no doubt, partly of old grievances and misapprehensions; for there was much genuine misapprehension and irritation on his part, and I believe that he had some cause of grievance against the Dutch population; it was also partly the result of the cunning of a barbarian who had, for many years, played off the Government of Natal against that of the Transvaal, and who now found that the Government of the Transvaal, when it passed into English hands, no longer afforded him the same scope for his craft. It was, also, partly the result of that agitation among the younger and turbulent part of his tribe to which every nation, civilized or uncivilized, is more or less subject. I am bound to say that, a year and a-half ago, the attitude of Cetewayo was such that the Government were more than once compelled to consider the responsibilities which fell upon them from the possibility of war, and what preparations should be made to meet it; and it was only the threatening state of European affairs that made it undesirable to send out further reinforcements; and it was in consequence of the very threatening aspect of affairs that I determined, as far as in me lay, that war should not take place on that occasion. It is perfectly true that the terms which had been offered, and which have been alluded to by my noble Friend on the other side of the House, were terms that Cetewayo could not accept without altering the characteristic feature of his whole rule—they changed a bloody, oppressive, arbitrary tyranny into a government with some semblance, at least, of law; but the justification for this lies in the fact that for years Zululand had been a standing menace to the Colony of Natal; that it was a tyranny built upon bloodshed and cruelty; and, lastly, that Cetewayo, having deliberately entered into certain engagements for reforming the administration of his kingdom, and consequently for our better security, either could not or would not redeem the promises he had given to us. Speaking broadly, these seem to me, as far as I now can understand the case, the justification of the present war. Of course, there are other questions of policy with which they are connected; but these will be discussed hereafter. They will involve serious questions. I will now only say one word as to the prosecution of the war. A very important step has been taken by securing from the Portuguese Government a promise to repress the gun traffic. This is a question I earnestly pressed for a long time, and I trust that it will ultimately result in the total suppression of that traffic, and thus put an end to the possibility of the Zulus obtaining the supplies of arms and ammunition for which they, in great measure, depend for the carrying on of the war. Another point under the consideration of the Government well deserves their consideration—the extension of telegraphic communication between this country and the Cape. The want of this communication has been one of the greatest evils both on this and former occasions. A line of telegraphic wire to the Cape would have been worth to us three or four additional regiments; and we have, by the want of it, been left for weeks in darkness. During my tenure of Office I urged it, in season and out of season, on the Home Government; but the Treasury were unable to spare money for it. The unfortunate part of it is that, when disaster such as this occurs, these matters are acknowledged and rectified; but too late. But even now, at this, the eleventh hour, after this serious disaster, I would still urge upon the Government the necessity of laying a wire, even at a greater expense, and in a more imperfect manner than would be done under ordinary circumstances, in order that we may no longer be kept for weeks in ignorance of what is passing in the South African Colonies. With regard to reinforcements, I have long been of opinion that they may most expeditiously and most economically be sent from India. About two years ago there was a very serious outbreak in the Malay Peninsula, which is a very difficult country. That outbreak was crushed in the course of a few weeks—and why? Because immediate telegraphic communication was received, and we were able to send troops from India, and one regiment, I think, from China; and so the conflagration was extinguished before it had time to become general. If the Government should be able to send reinforcements from India, so much the better, even at the last moment—unless this unfortunate Afghan War has so crippled the strength of the Indian Forces that none can be spared. Certainly, it must be three or four weeks before the troops sent from England can reach their destination, and the loss of time may be productive of very serious results. I can only join very heartily in the hope which has been expressed on the other side of the House, that the Government will deal with the matter with all possible speed and vigour; for we may depend upon it that half-hearted measures would not only protract the war and involve a great deal more expense and bloodshed, but the contest would probably degenerate into one of those wars between civilized and Native races, which, of all warfares, is most productive of brutality and degradation.

Earl Cadogan

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he cordially shared in the sentiment which had been expressed, that whatever view might be entertained of the very difficult question of policy which was raised by the conditions of affairs in South Africa, there could be no difference of opinion whatever as to the absolute necessity of at once re-establishing our military position in that country and the honour of Her Majesty's arms, and of supporting our troops there with full vigour and energy. Nor was there any difference in universal sympathy felt for our gallant troops who were involved in this disaster. Not having had the advantage of even a cursory perusal of the Blue Books presented that night, he felt great difficulty in approaching the question; but he hoped it might not be thought egotistical in one who had held the post of Secretary of State for the Colonies if he warned those who had to administer South African affairs that there were no affairs which were more complicated or difficult. At the same time, he could not help doubting whether there was a real necessity for this Zulu War. The threatening attitude of the Zulus was nothing new. While he held the Office of Colonial Secretary he was always hearing of the threatening position of the Zulus, and no doubt it was a fact. But by judicious management, especially by the very judicious conduct of Sir Theophilus Shepstone, a collision was avoided. It had been his opinion that though we might come into conflict with the Zulus, it was better that that conflict should be later rather than sooner, since we were always growing stronger and they were growing weaker. Above all, he considered that we should consolidate our power upon our Frontiers before we got into an arduous struggle with a warlike people. But he was bound to admit that the position of affairs had been considerably changed by the annexation of the Transvaal. We took over a dispute with Cetewayo; and it might possibly be found that our position in the Transvaal was such that the quarrel was unavoidable. But nothing had been yet published or was yet known to convince him that by careful management, and not treating border raids—which were really inevitable with savage tribes on our Frontiers—as of too much importance, the Government could not have avoided the war. He saw in the manifesto, with some regret, that the ultimatum which was sent to this barbarian Chieftain was one which, in his (the Earl of Kimberley's) opinion, he could not agree to. It was plain to anyone who knew the character and position of the Chief that his acceptance of that ultimatum would mean the total destruction of his power, and the entire change of his relations with his tribe. If he had wished to avoid a collision with us, it was exceedingly doubtful if his position towards his tribe was such that he could have carried his wish into effect—at all events within 30 days. But all the Papers must be looked at together, and all the difficulties fully considered, and it might turn out that the war was unavoidable. He noticed that there was a disposition at home to be somewhat hard upon the Colonists, and he had seen some remarks upon their unwillingness to take up arms in the conflict. He thought that such remarks were made from an insufficient consideration of the circumstances of the case. The Kaffir War was carried on on the immediate Frontier of the old Cape Colony; and it was perfectly reasonable that, under such circumstances, the Cape Colonists should fight in their own defence. On the other hand, Zululand was at so great a distance from the Cape Colony that they could not be expected to render any considerable assistance to us in dealing with the Zulus. It was beyond their power to do so, and it was not reasonable to expect it. It would take all their energy and courage to defend themselves against the immense Black population upon their own borders; and we ought not to expect them to help us in the Transvaal or in Zululand. For the defence of Natal and the Transvaal, with their scanty White population, they must look to the Imperial Government; and he feared that for many years to come it would be impossible that assistance from home in money and arms could be dispensed with. Whether or not it was desirable to maintain our present relations with South Africa was a question into which he would not now enter. He earnestly hoped that the next intelligence might be of a more re-assuring character, and that it might be found that Her Majesty's Black subjects in Natal had not joined the Zulus in an attack upon the Colonists. His own view was rather in favour of their remaining quiet, for the Black residents in Natal were principally composed of those who had fled from the tyranny of the Zulu King, and they could not be desirous to come again under his power. If an incursion were made into Natal the tribes in Natal might be compelled, whether they would or not, to join the main force; and he thought that under that compulsion they would do so; but he hoped that there would be no spontaneous movement, and that if the borders of Natal could be defended by our troops there would be peace and tranquillity in their rear.

CATHEDRAL STATUTES BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend an Act passed in the sixth year of Queen Anne and intituled "An Act for the avoiding of doubts and questions touching the Statutes of divers Cathedral and Collegiate Churches"—Was presented by The Lord Bishop of CARLISLE; read 1<sup>a</sup>. (No. 4.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 13th February, 1879.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRITS ISSUED—For Norfolk County (Northern Division), v. Colonel James Duff, deceased; for Cambridge County, v. Hon. Eliot Constantine Yorke, deceased; for Cork County, v. Timothy M'Carthy Downing, esquire, deceased; for South Warwickshire, v. Earl of Yarmouth, Controller of Her Majesty's Household; for Haddington District of Burghs, v. Lord William Hay, now Marquess of Tweeddale.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN—Edward Birkbeck, esquire, for Norfolk County (Northern Division); Edward Hicks, esquire, for Cambridge County.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Bankers' Books (Evidence) [65]; Habitual Drunkards [47], [House counted out].

Withdrawn—Licensing Boards (Scotland)* [15]; Borough Franchise (Ireland)* [49].

QUESTIONS.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)— COLONEL M'KERLIE.—QUESTIONS.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If Colonel M'Kerlie, the present Chairman of the Irish Board of Works, is about to resign that appointment, or will be recommended to take that step by the Government?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would allow him, he would answer the Question. Colonel M'Kerlie had not tendered his resignation, nor had the Government considered it necessary to call upon a valuable public servant to resign.

The Earl of Kimberley

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is contemplated transferring Colonel M'Kerlie to the command of the Royal Hibernian Military School on his resignation of the Chairmanship of the Irish Board of Works?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member, I have to say that the appointment in connection with the Hibernian Military School has been filled by Colonel Cotton. I do not believe it was contemplated to offer it to Colonel M'Kerlie; and, indeed, I have no ground for supposing it would have been accepted by him had it been so offered.

JOINT STOCK BANKS—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

MR. COOPE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government is prepared to introduce any measure, which, by means of public audit or otherwise, may prevent the evils to which depositors as well as proprietors of Joint Stock Banks are at present exposed through the defective state of existing legislation affecting them?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, it was difficult to answer a Question put in terms so wide without entering into a lengthened statement beyond the limits of an answer. He might, however, inform his hon. Friend that the Government did not intend to introduce any extensive measure such as he, perhaps, had in his mind when he referred to the public audit of joint-stock banks; but, at the same time, they did contemplate the probability of their having to introduce a measure with regard to banks which he would take an opportunity to explain to the House in order to meet certain difficulties which had arisen in the constitution of such banks.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— THE REINFORCEMENTS.—QUESTIONS.

COLONEL MURE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Colonial and Imperial civil and military authorities in South Africa had, previous to the declaration of war, represented to Her Majesty's Government the formidable character of the Zulu Army; and, whether, previous to the declaration of war, the same authorities had urged the Government to despatch larger reinforcements of British troops?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I observe by the terms in which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has put his Question that he has seen the Blue Book in which these matters will be found set out; and probably other hon. Members will have seen it also. He will perceive, and hon. Members will also see, by reference to that Blue Book, that on September 14th Sir Bartle Frere wrote, in a despatch that will be found on page 254 of the Blue Book, that Lord Chelmsford had telegraphed to him that, in the event of hostilities breaking out with the Zulus, he should require several more special service officers, that an addition of two more regiments of infantry would be essential, and that the presence of a cavalry regiment would be of enormous advantage. On the same day, the 14th September, Lord Chelmsford himself wrote to the War Office. The despatch is not in the Blue Book; but if it has not already, it will shortly be laid, on the Table of the House. In it he specified precisely the same reinforcements and the special service officers that would be required, but made no mention of cavalry in his communication. Subsequently, a full Memorandum of a fortnight later, September 28th, was received from Lord Chelmsford, which will be found at page 284 of the Blue Book, setting forth what he would require; and he again confined his request to two battalions of infantry, saying nothing about cavalry. These are the only applications for reinforcements, so far as I am aware, that have been made from the Cape until the other day, after the unfortunate loss which was then sustained. Her Majesty's Government, as will be seen by reference to page 273 of the Blue Book, in a despatch dated October 17, expressed their hesitation at complying with that request; but, on receiving the further and fuller communication a fortnight later, they acceded to it, and the two regiments desired were sent out early in December. Those reinforcements, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman is probably aware, arrived in time to take part in the military operations first undertaken. No request of cavalry was made, I am informed, subsequent to Sir Bartle Frere's despatch of September 14, nor when Lord Chelmsford and Sir Bartle Frere were informed what reinforcements had been sent out did they express any dissatisfaction that cavalry was not included—on the contrary, I have every reason to believe both of them were satisfied with the completeness with which their request was granted.

COLONEL MURE said, he might, perhaps, be permitted, in consideration of the great importance of the matter, to ask a further Question. There was a despatch in the Blue Book issued this morning in which the Secretary of State for the Colonies said that the Forces at present at the Cape, including reinforcements, were not with the view of attacking the Zulus, but with the view of defending the Colony. They were there in order to put the Colony in a state of defence, showing that at the time the despatch was written the invasion of Zululand was not contemplated. ["Oh, oh!"] He thought, under the painful circumstances in which they were met, hon. Members opposite might listen to a very few words even in the form of a Question. He wished to know, Whether the Force at the disposal of Lord Chelmsford was really for the purpose only of defending the Colony, or for the purpose of invasion?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, perhaps I may be allowed to answer the Question. I must refer the hon. and gallant Member to the despatch of Lord Chelmsford of September 14, which will be laid on the Table. It includes a Memorandum stating that, in the event of the invasion of Zululand being decided on, it would be necessary to operate on so many lines, &c.; and it concludes with a request for the two battalions of infantry to which my right hon. Friend has referred.

HIGHWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVES (AMENDMENT) ACT, 1878.

QUESTION.

MR. PELL asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been directed to a doubt whether the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, gives county authorities power to pay out of the county rate half the expenses incurred in the maintenance of any main roads other than disturnpiked roads; and, whether he will cause the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown to be taken on the point?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, my attention has been drawn to the doubt referred to by my hon. Friend, and which has in some few instances been expressed, and my answer has been that I am quite unable to concur in the doubt. The question has arisen, I think, from looking exclusively to Section 13 of the Act; but, if the contention were tenable, not only would Section 15—one of the most important provisions of the Act—be altogether inoperative, but effect could not be given to Section 18, which requires highway authorities to keep an account of the cost of maintaining main roads without any exception, and enables the county authority to withhold their contributions, not in the case of disturnpiked roads only, but of main roads generally. As regards the opinion of the Law Officers, it is the practice to resort to them for advice only in cases where the Department entertain doubt, or the matter concerns their own administration, both of which conditions are absent in the present case; and as the matter concerns the powers and duties of the magistrates, it would rather seem to be for my hon. Friend, or for Justices, if they entertain any doubts, than for me, to submit a case to the Law Officers.

ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House that, in pursuance of the directions of the Acts passed in the 24th year of the reign of His Majesty King George the Third, c. 26, and in the 21st and 22nd years of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, c. 110, and in the 26th year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, c. 20, he has issued Warrants to the Clerk of the Crown to make out New Writs for the Election of Members to serve in this present Parliament—For Norfolk County (Northern Division), v. Colonel James Duff, deceased; for Cambridge County, v. Honble. Eliot Constantine Yorke, deceased.

And also a Warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland to make out a New Writ for the Election of a Member to serve in this present Parliament—For Cork County, v. Timothy M'Carthy Downing, esquire, deceased.

Mr. Poll

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

BUSINESS OF PARLIAMENT.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to move, Sir, that you do now leave the Chair; not, of course, for the purpose of making any progress with the business of Supply, there being no Notice down; but I think it may be for the convenience of the House that I should take this opportunity to offer a few observations upon the position of Business, and upon other matters such as are usually referred to at the beginning of a Session. The circumstances of the present Session have been exceptional. At the time that we met in December it was not thought necessary, or, at all events, desirable, if it was even possible, to introduce many measures to the notice of the House, the House being met for one object alone, and the observations which usually are made at the commencement of the Session were then deferred to the present time. I will, therefore, take the opportunity of moving that you leave the Chair to state what the Business is which we propose to call the attention of the House to during the present Session. But before I do so, there are necessarily one or two matters of exceptional and external interest on which I ought to say a few words; and the House will, I am sure, anticipate that the first subject upon which I must touch is one of a melancholy character, which has already been before our notice this evening, and which engages at this moment the first attention of the country—I mean the serious military misfortune which we have met with in South Africa. Sir, I am quite sure it is far from the wish of anyone either unduly to exaggerate, or unduly to depreciate, what has there occurred; but we cannot help feeling the great sorrow which has been caused, the great blow which we have received, and above all things we cannot avoid feeling and expressing our sorrow at the severe loss we have sustained in the death of those men who have so gallantly maintained the honour of the Army. I am quite sure that there is but one feeling throughout the country of admiration for the gallantry with which those men and officers behaved, so far as we are able to know, in the closing scene of their lives, for the manner in which they sustained the honour of the Army to which they were proud to belong, and that there is but one universal feeling of sympathy for those who have been sufferers by the bereavement. But, Sir, I also feel that there is in the British character a readiness, upon all occasions such as this, to rise with all the more spirit from any calamity that has been sustained, and that the impulse of which we are conscious is a resolution to repair and wipe out any blow of this kind that seems to have been received. No time has been lost in taking the first measures that are necessary for that end. A very considerable force has already been ordered to sail for South Africa. That force is being rapidly brought together. The transports which are to take it out have been already engaged, and in the course of next week, probably before this day week, the first of them will have sailed. No time will be lost in hastening forward the detachments which are to be sent. Having said so much, I hope that I may appeal to the House to abstain for the moment from making any conjectural comments upon circumstances as to which we are as yet very imperfectly informed. We have received a telegraphic communication of the bare fact only, and it must be several days—it cannot be till next week—before we can receive any detailed account of what has happened. I think we must all be aware that justice and every other consideration requires that we should suspend our judgment upon what has happened until we have a full and complete account of it. With regard to the general policy of the war I would say much the same thing. Papers have already been laid upon the Table which bring the account of what has taken place up to the 30th or 31st of December, and further Papers are now in the printers' hands, and will be distributed on Saturday or at latest on Monday, which will bring the Correspondence down to the end of January. Of course, still further Papers will be given as soon as possible. I think that when we receive the full accounts of what has taken place, and those Papers are in the hands of Members, we shall be better placed than at the present moment to consider our position, and to decide as to what steps it will be necessary to take. But I may say, Sir, even beforehand, that I am perfectly conscious that it will be necessary for me to make some proposal to the House with reference to the expenses which these necessary measures have occasioned. I only desire that I may be in a position to give a full account, and to take a complete view of, the circumstances before I am called upon to go into details on that subject. Turning from this darker page of what we have to state to the House, I am happy to be able to congratulate the House and the country upon the more satisfactory state of affairs in other parts of the world. If we look especially to our foreign relations, and consider how the arrangements consequent upon the Treaty of Berlin are proceeding, we see that there is every reason to be satisfied with the progress that is being made. There is, no doubt, a natural impatience in the minds of all men to see things proceed with an almost impossible rapidity; but when we consider how many interests have been involved, and how much there has been to arrange—how many have been the difficulties to be overcome—I think, when we look back and take stock of what has passed in the six months or whatever may be the time since the conclusion of the Treaty, we have no reason at all to be dissatisfied with the real and satisfactory progress that has been made. The exchanges of territory which were provided for in Asia have been accomplished. The exchanges on the Frontier of Montenegro have also been accomplished. Both those were matters which were subjects at one time of anxiety. The occupation of Bosnia by the Austrian forces has also been accomplished. The supplementary Treaty which the Porte and Russia had been engaged in negotiating has been signed, and the Russian Army has now begun to withdraw from Turkish territory; and we have no doubt that the evacuation of Turkish territory will be very speedily and peaceably completed. I think we may, without going into disputed questions, fairly take this opportunity of expressing the sense which certainly Her Majesty's Government feel, and I hope the House and the public will feel, of the very great energy, the very great skill, the very great temper and patience with which Sir Henry Layard has fulfilled his duty in these difficult and critical circumstances. The House, I am sure, will hear with regret, though hardly with surprise, that Sir Henry Layard's health has suffered not a little from the long strain and the great anxiety which have been put upon him for the past few months, and that he will be obliged to take a short respite from work to improve his health. We hope, however, that matters have now arrived at that point that he can be spared from his post for a short time without any inconvenience to the Public Service. Other matters besides those which I have already mentioned have also been satisfactorily in progress. A scheme of pacification has been adopted in Crete, which appears to have given satisfaction to all parties; and negotiations in pursuance of the stipulations and Protocols of the Treaty of Berlin have been set on foot between the Porte and the Kingdom of Greece. With regard to Asia, there has not been any slackness in pursuing the Correspondence which was opened, as was mentioned, some time ago, on the subject of Asiatic reform. I believe that there has been some unreasonable impatience on the part of some persons in this country with regard to the reforms in Asia; but then it must be considered that those reforms have had to be entertained and begun by a Government whose territory is occupied by a large foreign army of some 200,000 or 300,000 men, and whose attention has naturally been attracted by matters of a very different character. I doubt whether there have ever been any instances of a country having effected reforms under such pressure as that. But, at the same time, I may say that there has been manifested on the part of the Porte a sincere desire to proceed with reforms. Some of the appointments which have been made—notably that of Midhat Pasha—have indicated the earnestness with which the Porte is proceeding; and arrangements for carrying out the objects in view are now under discussion which I believe will be found adequate and satisfactory. Then there is another matter which has excited attention, and that is the position of the Island of Cyprus. In regard to the Island of Cyprus, I need not at the present time, I hope, enter into any long discussion, as I have Friends on these Benches who will be able to speak from personal knowledge of what they have seen and what they know of the Island; but I think it may be of interest to the House to know that the question which has given some trouble, as to the effect of the reservation of the land rights of the Porte under the 4th Article of the Treaty, has been settled. All the land rights and claims of the Porte, including claims on waste lands, and all questions affecting the land, have been settled and commuted for a payment of £5,000 a-year. That payment is in addition to what has been ascertained to be the surplus due to the Porte on the basis of the excess of revenue over expenditure. I am unable to say what precisely that surplus may be found to be; but we are in a position to say that the sums which have been named—£120,000 or £130,000 a-year—are exaggerated, and that the amount will be much lower—£100,000, or a few thousands more. I believe, when the Budget of Cyprus comes to be considered, it will show this to be a satisfactory and hopeful settlement. With regard to another question which was under consideration when the House met in December, I hope we are now in a position to deserve congratulation. The objects of the expedition which was then under consideration appear now to have been accomplished, and a satisfactory arrangement may now be made for the future protection and tranquillity of the North-West Frontier of India without destroying the independence of Afghanistan. Turning from these matters to the condition of the country, I do not think it necessary to enter into any details; but it would be improper and indecent, on such an occasion as this, not to express the sincere regret which we all feel for the serious distress which has prevailed in some parts of the country; and I hope that the time has come for improvement, as the change in the weather and other circumstances may serve to mitigate the distress. [Opposition cheers.] I think you will admit that the winter has been exceedingly severe—[Laughter from the Opposition—] by which it has been rendered difficult for many persons to obtain employment. This may be a subject for the laughter of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, but it is not so regarded by us, and especially by the people of those towns in which the distress has prevailed. In many of the communications which we have received stress has been laid upon the additional suffering caused by the severity of the weather, which has rendered it impossible for many people to obtain employment. I can only again express my hope that matters will tend to improvement. Before leaving this subject, however, I think it would hardly be graceful not to acknowledge the very great liberality and self-sacrifice with which so many persons during the distress in their districts came forward in order to relieve the sufferings of those among whom they lived. I am happy to say that the benevolence of the people of England has never yet been appealed to in vain. Not only has the relief been liberal, but, so far as we have been able to judge, the relief given has been very wisely and judiciously distributed. I have nothing more that I need trouble the House with, except to mention the subjects which will be brought forward in the present Session. The subjects which appear to be of the highest importance are these—There will, in the first place, be a necessity for proceeding with the Mutiny Bill, which, as the House is aware, is in a peculiar position. The Mutiny Bills of past years have been frequently altered and patched; nevertheless, considerable portions of the legislation have been of an obsolete character of a very early date, and it has been found desirable that it should be revised. I need not go back upon what has occurred in past Sessions, but I think it only right that we should give some expression of acknowledgment to the Committee—and especially to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt)—which sat last Session upon this subject, and under whose guidance great progress has been made in the work of reform, for their labours upon it. Their recommendations have led us to substitute what will practically be a new Military Code—for that is what our suggestion will really amount to—and that Military Code will be submitted to the House, and will require careful consideration. And here I may take the opportunity of correcting a mistake that has got wind in some quarters in reference to this question. It has been assumed that we intend to alter the whole system of our Mutiny Legislation, and to withdraw from Parliament the annual supervision and control of the Army. Such an insane idea has never entered into our minds. Even hon. Gentlemen opposite could never have imagined that we intended to introduce so sweeping a change. The next measure which we wish to mention is the Criminal Code, which has also been the subject of very careful revision by very competent and high authorities; and we hope that it will be presented this Session in a form which will enable the House to deal with it and pass it immediately. There will be a measure for the amendment of the Bankruptcy Laws, which I think will be introduced in the other House of Parliament. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will re-introduce a measure, of which he has had charge, for amending the Summary Jurisdiction of Magistrates. Then there is another subject which urgently requires attention in this House, because the powers of the Railway Commissioners will expire during this Session; and it is, therefore, necessary to introduce some measure which will deal with those powers. We propose to introduce a measure for establishing County Boards in England, and for amending the Grand Jury Law in Ireland. There is also to be a Valuation Bill, and there will be a Bill for the amendment of the Poor Law of Scotland. In mentioning these measures in detail, I wish, at the same time, to say that there are many other measures we have in hand, some of which will demand special attention. I gave a pledge last Session, which I have not forgotten, that the Corrupt Practices Act should be dealt with early in this Session, and I have stated to my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Coope) that we should have to introduce some measure with regard to Banks. There is a measure upon the relations of Employers and Workmen which will also be introduced when ready; and amongst others I may mention one measure of a financial character, in which I myself am interested, for dealing with the question of Public Works Loans. There are also other measures which, as time goes on, we propose to introduce; but I need not trouble the House with them now, and will only say what is the order of Business which we at present contemplate. To-night I will give Notice of certain Bills which it is proposed to introduce to-morrow evening, which probably will not give rise to much discussion. On Monday I propose to invite the House to consider some Resolutions with regard to the Public Business of the House, and I propose to move certain Resolutions which were recommended by the Committee of last Session, although not the whole of them. I will place the Resolutions upon the Table in the course of the evening. We may also have some other Bills to introduce on Monday. On Thursday I hope my right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War will be able to introduce the Mutiny Bill, which will require some little time to explain. Possibly I may be able also to do the second reading of the Public Works Loan Bill; but I think it will be more convenient to keep it in abeyance. The Army and Navy Estimates are, I hope, in a position to be proceeded with on the following Monday—if possible with the Army, but it may be that the Navy Estimates will be taken on the following day; but, whichever is taken first, the other Estimates will be taken on the following Monday. On Thursday, the 27th, we shall take the second reading of the Mutiny Bill. I need not go further into the details; but, of course, Notice will be given of the introduction and progress of those measures I have referred to. I now move that you, Sir, do leave the Chair.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he could recollect no precedent for the most unusual course which had been adopted by the right hon. Gentleman on the present occasion. In 1867, when there was an Autumn Session, the whole of the Bills were brought forward in the Queen's Speech; and, as regarded 1868, there was a Queen's Speech made on the re-assembling of the House in February 1869. Perhaps it would be convenient that the most responsible Members of the Opposition should refrain from addressing the House until towards the close of the debate to which it was likely the speech of the right hon. Gentleman would give rise. Next to the unfortunate event which had occurred in South Africa, the subject that was the uppermost in the public mind, and which he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) chiefly rose to address the House upon, was the distress that prevailed throughout the country. The language of the right hon. Gentleman in referring to the latter question was, perhaps, scarcely adequate to the occasion. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that that distress had been occasioned by the late frost. ["Oh!"]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained that he had remarked that the distress had probably been aggravated by the frost.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE feared that the distress was more widely spread in the Northern centres of industry than the right hon. Gentleman appeared to think; and he could not share in the sanguine view taken by the right hon. Gentleman that it was decreasing. He would only tell the right hon. Gentleman that those who represented the great centres of industry were not of the opinion which he understood the right hon. Gentleman to express. They thought that not only was the present distress more generally spread over the country than had been the case for many years, but that it was rather increasing than diminishing. He could not understand the principle upon which the right hon. Gentleman had constructed the list of Bills which he had mentioned; for after reading out a catalogue of nine measures he went on to refer to others which were more important than those which he had first mentioned. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) supposed that it was intended that these nine Bills should be those to which the attention of the House should first be directed. With regard to these measures, he would only say that Scotland and Ireland came out somewhat badly. There was only one measure relating to each country, and neither of them was of first-class importance. He had not been in the secret of the negotiations of which they had heard with regard to Irish University Education; but he supposed that these negotiations had broken down, as no result had come from them. It was possible, however, that a surprise might be sprung upon them at the last moment. The Bills relating to Corrupt Practices and to the Liability of Employers for Injuries to their Workmen ought to have taken a prominent place in the programme of the Government Business for the Session, seeing that Her Majesty's Government had pledged themselves to introduce them at the earliest opportunity, and to give them precedence. With reference to the first they had great reason to complain of the course pursued, for a Dissolution could not long be delayed; it would be welcome to a large number of hon. Members on that side of the House, and it was therefore of importance that the grave questions which the Bill raised should be settled as soon as possible. With regard to the other Bills which had been named by the right hon. Gentleman, all of them were old friends. Hon. Members had seen them before, and if the Government did not press them forward with more vigour than in former years they would probably see most of them again. In reference to one of them—the County Government Board Bill—the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not said whether the measure which it was proposed to introduce was the same as that which was brought in last year. If it were the same Bill, he could tell the right hon. Gentleman that it would certainly be opposed on the second reading by a large number of those who sat on his (Sir Charles W. Dilke's) side of the House. If they were to deal with the subject of County Government in this country at all, they ought to deal with it on the basis of principle. There was no principle in the Bill of last year, and he knew there were many hon. Members who were determined to do all they could to prevent the passing of any such measure unless it were founded on the principle of representation, in which they all believed. Passing to the subject of South Africa, the right hon. Gentleman had asked them to abstain from conjectural comments; and he was, of course, perfectly right in making that appeal to the House. It would be monstrous to raise a debate to-night on the military questions involved in the recent disaster, because they had not the facts before them on which to found an opinion; but if the right hon. Gentleman wished them altogether to avoid discussion as to the causes of the war, he did not go the right way to work, because he had spoken of the measures which had been taken—whether of invasion or of defence was a matter depending upon what the real intentions of the Government had been—as having been necessary measures. Now, some of them on his side of the House, as far as they could judge from the information in their possession, were disposed to deny that there was any proof before them that those were necessary measures. At the same time, he must confirm what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman as to the feelings with which they had all heard the painful news received that week of the reverse and calamity which had been recently sustained; and they could not but entertain a determination, as Englishmen, that every sacrifice should be made which was necessary in order to retrieve our military situation. He could not refer to that subject without paying a tribute of admiration to the heroism displayed by the men engaged, and of deep sorrow for the sad loss which had befallen the country. He hoped he should be allowed to make special allusion to the death of Colonel Durnford, an officer who, as all who knew him were aware, was the very soul of chivalry. Colonel Durnford was, curiously enough, the Commissioner by whose vote the disputed boundary question was lately settled in favour of the Zulus, and it was a remarkable fact that the Commission held its meetings at Rourke's Drift, so that that gallant officer was killed at the very place where, eight months before, he had performed a great act of justice. The House would ask for more proof than had yet been afforded whether those brave men had died for a just cause. Whether the responsibility rested on Her Majesty's Government or on the Government of the Cape was a question which must depend on information yet to be produced; but the Papers now before them showed that there was no sufficient cause of war as far as regarded its first inception. The war appeared to have been resolved upon before its cause was found. We who had before blamed the Boers for their aggression upon the Zulus, when we stepped into the shoes of the Boers pressed against the Zulus the very territorial claims we had thus condemned. Those claims related to a disputed territory, and they were likely to be a cause of war. The Natal Government had seemed to be opposed to war and in favour of arbitration. Arbitration was adopted, and the award was given in favour of the Zulus. Then another cause of war was found, and he and others doubted whether that cause was sufficient. The war was a matter upon which the House ought to express its views, because for 20 years they had had profound peace at the Cape, and now suddenly war arose against tribes which seemed to have no knowledge of, or communication with, each other; and they could not but draw the inference that it must have been an aggressive policy, such as had marked the reign of the present Government in other parts of the globe, which had caused all that disturbance. The annexation of the Transvaal had been advocated on the ground that it would give us peace and secure tranquillity at the Cape; but, instead of that being its result, it had brought us war. Those who sat on his side of the House must have different evidence from that before them to make them think that the war was just and necessary. The House, however, would have an opportunity shortly of discussing those necessary measures to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had alluded—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained that when he spoke of necessary measures, it was in reference, not to the general question, but to the measures to be taken at the present moment in consequence of what had now occurred.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE had not understood the right hon. Gentleman in that sense. Of course, he accepted that explanation. He would now turn to affairs in Afghanistan, and upon that subject he desired to make but a single observation. Looking to the fact that all military operations had been suspended, they must all be much gratified to know that the Government had succeeded, at not a large loss of life, in occupying those positions and that territory which they intended to hold. But he thought the time had arrived when some distinct statement should be made respecting our intentions towards that country. The explanation made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been singularly vague, and had not conveyed any accurate impression to the minds of those who heard it; nor would it to those who would read it. One thing was certain. We had the military position in our hands. We could take as much territory as we liked. There had been a talk of a scientific Frontier. Well, what they wanted to know and what they had a right to demand was—what was that so-called scientific Frontier to consist of? With whom, moreover, were the Government to treat; and had they not themselves destroyed all chance of finding that independent Afghanistan which they were so anxious to see on our Indian Frontier? He asked whether they would not be forced to take the advice of General Kaufmann, as reported by the correspondent of The New York Herald? Whether they wished it or not, might they not find themselves compelled to go forward until they reached Herat—a long and troublesome journey? The Government would strengthen themselves and prevent their hand from being forced if they would frankly tell the House what Afghan territory they were to keep. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would have acted more discreetly if he had not mentioned Cyprus. It was treading on delicate ground. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would ask whether the total revenue of that Island was more than £160,000 or £170,000, of which £115,000 had to be paid as rent to Turkey, and whether it was possible to do more than make the two ends meet? Nothing would, he feared, be left for carrying out such improvements as constructing harbours, establishing sanatariums, and making roads. The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned that some of his Colleagues had visited Cyprus, and they had the advantage of reading in The Times of yesterday column after column of the utterances of the First Lord of the Admiralty. [Cheering from the Government Benches.] He was glad to hear that cheer, because it showed that hon. Members opposite were prepared to defend the right hon. Gentleman's views, which hon. Members on the Opposition side were equally prepared to attack whenever an opportunity arose for thoroughly thrashing out the subject. If the Returns moved for by the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. H. Samuelson) were granted, they would show who were right and who were wrong with regard to the unhealthiness of Cyprus. The right hon. Gentleman said he had been at Cyprus for a week, and had not found the climate pestiferous; but he might, perhaps, have been able to make a similar remark if he had spent a week at Sierra Leone. In the opinion of the First Lord of the Admiralty, a grand harbour might be constructed at Cyprus at a ridiculously small cost—probably for £150,000. The right hon. Gentleman's authority for his statement was the hon. Baronet the Member for North Durham (Sir George Elliot), who, he believed, built the harbour at Alexandria, which, according to other authorities, was in a much worse condition now than it was before it was touched. However this might be, he should like to know what was the expenditure at Alexandria, and what was the difference between that expenditure and the original estimate? If there should be a similar difference in the cost of the construction of a harbour at Cyprus, he pitied the poor taxpayer of this country. Again, in December last, he put a Question to the Government as to the jurisdiction to be established in Cyprus, which was a very serious matter, as it was likely to bring every civilized Power in Europe into collision with this country. He asked what would be the position of the citizens of other countries in that Island? According to the Capitulations, the subjects of all the Frankish Powers were to be judged by their own officials. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs admitted last December that a Correspondence had been commenced with foreign Governments respecting these Capitulations, and the Government ought now to have told them how the negotiations stood. Was it not a fact that Italy and the United States had made very strong representations to us upon this subject? With regard to the Berlin arrangements, the right hon. Gentleman spoke very pleasantly, saying they would be carried into effect on every side, and adding that negotiations had been set on foot with reference to the claims of Greece. What was the history of the Greek question? Last year the House carefully debated the question whether Her Majesty's Government had done much or anything for Greece. The Government maintained that they had done a great deal for that "interesting Power;" but he thought the Opposition were successful in exposing the falsity of that view, and that they had shown that the Government had not only done a great deal less than they ought to have done, but that it was owing to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government at Berlin that Greece did not obtain more territory and did not get it by an express stipulation of the Treaty, instead of having to rely upon a mere recommendation to the Turks. Even now it was doubtful whether effect would be given by Turkey to the recommendation; and this was a point on which the Government had left the House wholly without information. They were, therefore, entitled to ask when the time would come for the publication of Papers connected with the Greek question. It would be observed that it was not until the 21st or 22nd of January that the Turkish Government appointed a Commissioner under the Treaty of Berlin. The Turkish Commissioner had met the Greek Commissioner; but negotiations of a most unsatisfactory nature were reported to have taken place. Yesterday it was said that the Commission had been broken up; and though it was rumoured to-night that negotiations had begun again, he believed there was little hope of a satisfactory issue—or, indeed, of any issue—being reached in the course of these transactions. Not only did those who sat on his side of the House desire further information on this subject; but, as matters stood, they could not but think that what had taken place was discreditable to Her Majesty's Government. From the Papers which had been published by foreign Governments it would seem that the conduct of Her Majesty's Government had been calculated to alienate from England the sympathy of that rising nation; and just as the Government had driven all the other Powers of the Peninsula into the arms of Russia, so, he believed, they would be found to have driven the Greeks into the arms of France. It was to be feared that in future Greece would regard France as her sole benefactor in Europe, instead of looking as she would otherwise have done, to this country as her saviour.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I rise to re-enforce what my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea has urged—that we should have a little more accurate information with respect to the Island of Cyprus than could be gathered from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster. I am sure I hope that the First Lord of the Admiralty—although he considers his first duty is to his constituents—will also think that he owes something to the House of Commons. I want, then, first to ask for something distinct with respect to this naval station at Cyprus. I understand, as far as we have the statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty, that he admits at present there is nothing which can properly be called a harbour at Cyprus; but his phrase, as I took it down, is that there is the making of a harbour at Cyprus. He said—“We have the opinion of the Hydrographer of the Navy.” It is not presented to Parliament—for we have very little information on that subject; but the Hydrographer to the Navy has given that information to the Geographical Society. There was a Paper read at a meeting of the Geographical Society, at which the Hydrographer to the Navy took part in the discussion—and this is what he says on the possible harbour of Cyprus. He says there was a long spit or reef which ran out for a mile into shallow water, and between this and the mainland there was a deep gulley of seven or eight fathoms, which gradually shallowed up to the old port. It would require a very small amount of stone and labour, compared with the harbour works in this country and in the Mediterranean, to make this area a port that would be suitable for a small fleet of large ships. It strikes me as rather remarkable that after the Hydrographer to the Navy has said when you have made this harbour of Cyprus it will accommodate a small fleet of large ships, the First Lord of the Admiralty should tell his constituents it would hold the largest fleet in the Mediterranean. Now, the fleet we have in the Mediterranean is not a small fleet; and, if Cyprus is to be used as a place of arms, a large fleet will have to be stationed there. The Hydrographer went on further to say even at the present time some six or eight steam vessels of moderate size—by which I understand him to exclude large iron-clads—could lie in shelter under the shores and shallowest parts of the reef. Now, the value of this paper that I have seen is that it is accompanied by a chart which makes a landsman capable of understanding the whole thing. The greater portion of the reef, as I understand, is under water, and it is not continuous, but broken up,

Sir William Harcourt

According to the account given by the gentleman who read the paper there is spit of a mile in length covered by from two to four fathoms of water. Well, but a reef covered by from two to four fathoms of water wants a good deal doing to it before it becomes a breakwater. To say, therefore, that there is no harbour in Cyprus is perfectly correct. To say you may make a harbour in Cyprus, I dare say is perfectly true; but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea has said, the First Lord of the Admiralty is too shrewd a man of business to rely on an estimate for making it like that at Dover for £150,000. If he would inquire into the cost of the harbour at Dover or Plymouth Breakwater, and see what it came to, he would not lead people to suppose that upon a reef you could make a breakwater for £150,000; and it is a thing which I am sure the hon. Member for North Durham (Sir George Elliot) would not take a contract for. Indeed, I should be sorry if he took it from the Government, because he would forfeit his seat in this House, which I should greatly regret. Then I ask, first of all, are the Government really going, and when are they going, to begin the harbour at Famagosta? I ask it because, in a recently published letter from Sir Garnet Wolseley to the First Lord of the Admiralty, there is nothing said about the harbour, but there is about Famagosta. And what does he say about Famagosta? He says it is the unhealthiest spot in the whole of Cyprus. I therefore ask the First Lord of the Admiralty—Are they going to commence the breakwater on this reef to hold a small fleet of ships at that which Sir Garnet Wolseley declares to be the unhealthiest spot in Cyprus? To form a naval station, you must have something on land as well as on sea; you must have naval stores, munition, a certain amount of workshops for repairs, a population to look after these shops, and therefore I ask the First Lord of the Admiralty—Is he going to propose to run the country into expense for establishing a naval station for Cyprus at Famagosta? If he is, it will certainly be a most unwise proceeding after the description given of it by Sir Garnet Wolseley. Then, I ask him, if the object of this fleet is to support an army in a strong place of arms, where is the camp going to be? How far is it going to be from the port of Famagosta? I will show you that the place where it is proposed to put the camp is, as far as I can judge, about 50 miles from Famagosta. Therefore, you are going to make your station to embark and disembark in the unhealthiest part of the Island, and you are going to remove your camp to a plateau 5,500 feet high. I want to see the combination of these two great officers of the Army and Navy who have been to Cyprus. Will the First Lord tell us exactly what the plan is which the Government is going to propose for Her Majesty's Army and Navy? My first question is—Is he going to begin a harbour at Famagosta? Our complications with Armenia may arise to-morrow or next month. Who can state or determine when Armenia is to be invaded. When it is invaded we shall want this harbour, which will not very well accommodate the fleet. Then I would ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, where is the money to come from? Is it to be supplied from Cyprus or from England? You are not to have this kind of work begun without money. I understood the First Lord of the Admiralty to say money had been advanced for works in Cyprus. I read it from a report, but surely it must have been a misreport; for, from the First Lord's knowledge of the Treasury, he would have told us that he could not give money which had not been voted by Parliament. If not a misreport, I should like to know when the Estimates will be laid before Parliament, and the Votes taken for the amounts. I will address myself to another question, but I approach it with less alarm, because the Secretary of State for War belongs to a class of people whom the First Lord of the Admiralty affects to hold in such great contempt. He thinks that the good opinions that I and others entertain are due to our being younger sons. Addressing myself, then, to the Secretary of State for War, I want to ask him some questions about the Army; and I will ask him, first of all, why 10,000 men were sent to Cyprus in the month of July. That is a thing Parliament has never been told. A statement was made by the Prime Minister—and we all know his careful accuracy in those matters—that the Government, before they took Cyprus, had carefully examined all the islands of the Ægean. What we should like to have would be the Reports, especially the Reports made to him on the Island of Cyprus, and its capacity as a strong place of arms and for the entertainment of troops. He would not have sent 10,000 men—no Government would do that—to a place where they had not ascertained that its climate was fit for them at that time of year. And why, at the present time, do they only want 900 men there, and what has been the change of the circumstances which make 900 men sufficient now and made them send something like 10,000 men in the month of July? Now, the general public had none of the Reports which the Prime Minister referred to. We only had those cyclopædias to which Lord Salisbury refers, and those cyclopædias told us it was a very unhealthy climate in the summer months. However, the First Lord of the Admiralty says it is not more unhealthy than Gibraltar or Malta, and we want an explanation of that. If it is the fact, I think the Government should have given us some reliable statistics on the matter. I do not think the course the First Lord of the Admiralty took is exactly the most regular or Parliamentary. He has not had the Report made to Parliament or the Government by the Governor of the Island of Cyprus with reference to the health or climate of Cyprus. He seems to have sent a speech which I addressed to my constituents to Sir Garnet Wolseley, with a request that he would send him information which he could give to a Conservative Constitutional Association at Westminster. I am, of course, very proud that the First Lord of the Admiralty should think that anything coming from me was worthy of exportation to Cyprus; but what I must complain of is that he sent a perfectly inaccurate version of my speech, so that Sir Garnet Wolseley has been under a misapprehension that I made a statement of facts with respect to Cyprus. I made no statement of facts at all. Gentlemen opposite must have read an incorrect version. I read a statement of facts not of my own, but from a newspaper; and the First Lord of the Admiralty, in a very good-natured way, said he was a person who had no objection to newspapers. He said there were newspapers and newspapers. I should have thought the First Lord the want of some place where transport animals, forage, and all those numerous stores which constitute the well-being of an army could be collected, prepared, brought together, and constituted. Now, to our mind, Cyprus very fairly fulfilled those conditions. You must, in making comparisons, compare what are like, and not what are unlike. I do not for a moment profess to compare the climate of Cyprus with that of this country; but I say without hesitation that, so far as I have been able personally to ascertain, the Island of Cyprus is certainly as healthy as, and probably more healthy than, that of any other place in the Levant where troops are likely to be sent under similar conditions. I am sorry I have no means of stating these facts as accurately as I could wish to the House; but I recollect distinctly to have been informed that when our troops first went to the Ionian Islands it was stated that disease was especially rife amongst them. Complying, however, with the conditions suitable for troops in such a climate, and also with the conditions of ordinary sanitary arrangements, we find that so far from Corfu, Cephalonia, and the other Ionian Islands, being unhealthy, they became amongst the most healthy of our possessions. My hon. and learned Friend asked what was the use of having 30,000 troops perched 5,000 feet above the level of the sea. Has he never heard of places where troops are specially stationed for the preservation of their health during the summer months? Has he never heard of the Hill Stations in India, Ceylon, and Jamaica? Where sanitary conditions exist which render it necessary to place the British soldier in a more elevated and healthier atmosphere during the summer, it would be simply wrong from every point of view to keep him upon the plains, where he would be subject in an unusual degree to disease. When we received the most gloomy telegrams in regard to the health of the troops, I directed that these telegrams—and for this I incurred some blame—should be put before the public exactly as they came, and that other people should have exactly the information that I myself possessed. With regard to the information asked for by the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. H. Samuelson), I do not know whether it is technically in my hands to give it; but I may say that, in the course of a very interesting conversation which I had with Sir Anthony Home, principal medical officer in that district, whom everybody will recognize as being competent to deal with most matters respecting these diseases, he told me that he was daily gaining information, and he was anxious, at as early a date as possible, to collate all the information he possessed. I think that by placing before the House the Report of Sir Anthony Home they will be possessed of better information than they could obtain in any other form. With regard to the 101st Regiment, no doubt they did suffer very severely from fever; and it is perfectly true that, although they were originally intended for service in the Straits Settlement, they were ordered to a colder climate, inasmuch as it was not thought right to send troops to that Settlement unless they were in a thoroughly healthy state. All the Reports, however, which have reached us up to the present time tend to show that no permanent harm has been done to the constitution of the men. Speaking from recollection, I think that their loss from fever and other causes has only amounted up to the present time to something like six men. No doubt, also, the 42nd did suffer severely from fever, and the general appearance of the men, and the general state of their health, were such as caused me to recommend that they should be transferred to another station in the Mediterranean. The hon. and learned Member referred to the condition of the 71st as deplorable; but their "deplorable" condition when I saw them was exemplified by a hardy set of men, working with heart and goodwill under a very hot sun, and having a sick rate of something about 4·8 per cent. The commanding officer of the regiment assured us that he considered Cyprus as healthy as any other station in the Mediterranean known to him. In regard to the erection of barracks, it behoves us, as I have said before, to proceed very tentatively until we have all the information we can get. Sir Anthony Home said until he got to Cyprus he really did not know how completely science could be disappointed. Where the best sanitary conditions apparently existed fever had been extremely rife; on the other hand, some of those places where it was feared the men would suffer most had been almost entirely free from fever. I hope that much may be done in regard to the Island in the course of next year; meanwhile, let it not be supposed that we have changed our minds as to the value of Cyprus for the purposes for which we intended, or that we are to be discouraged by the circumstances of a singularly unhealthy year throughout the East from enabling our troops to perform those military duties which, I am sure, they are ready to perform in any climate. With regard to harbours, my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty is more competent to speak of those matters, and I have no doubt he will deal with them.

Colonel Stanley

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: I hope I may be permitted to recall the attention of the House to some matters nearer home than the interesting Island of Cyprus. I gathered from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it is the intention of the Government to propose certain new Rules for the conduct of the Business of the House. Everybody must admit that there are new Rules with respect to the Business of the House which might be adopted with great advantage. The best of all Rules would be that of removing from the cognizance of the House the vast local legislation with which it is powerless to contend. But if, as I imagine, the Chancellor of the Exchequer implied in his statement, it is the intention of the Government to introduce Rules into this House which will tend to fetter the freedom of a weak minority in debate, I think the right hon. Gentleman will find that he cannot altogether accomplish his object. I am not surprised that the Government should give a first place to this intention of theirs; because if ever there was a time when a minority would have a right to push its privileges to the utmost point I think it is after a statement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We have been amused during the Recess with divers rumours—put out evidently by the Government, and supported by the Press which is supposed to represent the Government—that it is their intention to deal with some very weighty matters which concern Ireland. We have been left in doubt up to this moment as to whether we were or were not to be gratified in this respect. Only a week ago I had the honour of being present at a dinner given by the Lord

Mayor of Dublin—an historical dinner in that City—at which the Lord Lieutenant was present, and the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The Chief Secretary, whom I do not now see in his place—he seldom is in his place when we are discussing Irish questions, except for the purpose of opposing some Bill which the Irish people desire—said on that occasion, in reference to those rumours, that the best answer he could make would be to refer us to the forthcoming speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We now hear that all the Government contemplates in the way of legislation for Ireland is the introduction of a Grand Jury Bill; and of what nature that Grand Jury Bill will be we may form a very complete idea from the kind of Bills which they have previously given us on that subject. We are on the eve of a General Election, and one of the subjects which I did expect to hear would have been dealt with this Session is the Franchise in Ireland. We have been told over and over again during the last five years that it is the desire of the Government to extend to Ireland exactly the same laws and privileges as you have in this country, and in Scotland. We who represent Irish constituencies, and who sit on the Liberal side of the House have introduced Bill after Bill to show the Government in what respect our privileges are different from and inferior to yours. This Bill for the Equalization of the Borough Franchise in Ireland with that in England has been defeated on every occasion, generally by small majorities. In my opinion, the Government is playing with the subject. It has never put forth its strength in opposition to the demand of the Irish people that they should have the ordinary privileges of other subjects of Her Majesty in the United Kingdom. But now that the question is going to be debated on the eve of an Election the Government has issued a Whip for the purpose of voting down, by a larger majority than ever before, this demand of the Irish people not for extra privileges, but for similar privileges to the rest of the United Kingdom. However, I will not anticipate any observations that may be made on that subject to-morrow; but I ask hon. Gentlemen to calmly weigh this fact—that there is not in all the boroughs in the whole of Ireland an electorate equal to the electorate of several of your largest towns in England. There is not in the whole of Ireland an equal number of people entitled to the borough franchise as exist in Manchester, Bristol, Liverpool, or Leeds. I say that the Irish people will not remain content until another Election under such a franchise as this. With respect to Education, the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), whose absence I so much regret, had reason to believe that the Government were going to deal with that great subject. The belief, I have no doubt, was well founded on his part. But for some reason or other the Government have changed their minds, and are not going to do anything for the equalization of Irish privileges with those which exist in other parts of the Kingdom with regard to University Education. Under these circumstances, the Government need not expect that any facilities will be given by Irish Members for the progress of Public Business. I, for my part, have never taken any course in this House which could be called obstructive; but I say that the Government is putting to a severe test the forbearance, not of the Irish Members alone, but of the Irish people. I note also in regard to legislation in Ireland, from an answer given in a previous part of the evening, that even as regards the important inquiry into, perhaps, the most important Department in Ireland—the Board of Works—the Government again does not intend to comply with the demands of the people. This will cause deep disappointment in Ireland. I notice also that the Chancellor of the Exchequer congratulated the hon. and learned Member for Oxford—whose amusing badinage at the expense of the First Lord of the Admiralty we have all so exceedingly enjoyed—on his exertions in reforming the Mutiny Act. I could not help thinking that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might in his generosity have remembered other Members of the House to whom the country is really indebted for the reform of the Mutiny Act. The hon. member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), has done many things in this House distasteful to Members on that side and on this side of the House; but there is one service which he, and he alone, has rendered. He called the attention of Parliament and of the United Kingdom to the Mutiny Act; and if it had not been for his exertions and his persistence nothing would ever have been done in the way of reforming those Acts. I think, under those circumstances, the Chancellor of the Exchequer might have remembered his services. I am not desirous of entering into other questions respecting foreign politics or the formation of a harbour in Cyprus. I can only say that much of the discussion on this subject has been trifling and of an unworthy character. We have begun the Session badly, and it will end badly, unless the Government rise to an appreciation of the feelings of disappointment and rising anger in Ireland at the total neglect of the people's demands. Unless the Government is prepared to give us the same electoral franchise and the same facilities for exercising that franchise that a reform of the registration laws will secure, and unless it is also prepared to give the Irish people the same facilities for education which are lavishly conferred on the people of this country, the House of Commons need not expect by any reform of Regulations to bring Irish Members to such a course of conduct as will facilitate the progress of Public Business.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, although the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not of any great length, it yet touched upon several very important matters. Being ignorant of how far the House might wish to enter upon a discussion of those subjects, I thought it might perhaps be for the convenience of the House that I should abstain from making any remarks until I had seen what was the feeling of the House upon it. From what has passed I think it is not the desire of hon. Members to enter with any fulness into the important questions that have been raised and alluded to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Therefore, it may not be inconvenient, although some are desirous of speaking, if I make such remarks as I feel called upon in connection with the Minister's statement to which we have listened. It is not necessary that I should take up the time of the House with any prolonged criticism on the Bills proposed to be introduced by the Government. Two of these Bills have been prepared either by a Committee or a Commission, and, although relating to very important matters, they can hardly be said to be Bills of the Government, unless it be the intention of the Government to depart to a very considerable extent from the line laid down for them. With the County Boards Bill, if it is the same as that which has been introduced before, the Valuation Bill, and the Grand Jury Law Amendment Bill we are familiar, and our opinions on this side of the House with regard to them are known. It is not necessary, therefore, that I should take up the time of the House upon these matters. There is one subject which has been a good deal discussed during the Recess upon which the Government have not seen their way to legislate. It has been currently reported that the Government intended to legislate upon the subject of Irish University Education. Knowing as we do by experience the difficulties connected with this subject, I cannot say I am surprised that the Government have not succeeded in framing a measure which they thought would be satisfactory. I cannot say I can impute any blame to them if they shrink from dealing with this matter. At the same time, I must say it is a circumstance to be regretted, because I thought there was a hope the Government might have been able to deal more successfully than we were able to do with this important question. There are some subjects, of which this would have been one, which it is easier for one Government to deal with than another, upon which the division of opinion does not entirely coincide with the ordinary Party feeling. The House will remember the circumstances in which the last Government was defeated upon this question by a combination of the whole of the then Opposition with many Members of Scotland, Ireland, and England who generally supported the Government. The Government made an attempt last Session to deal with the subject, and brought in a Bill upon the subject of Intermediate Education; and I think the reception that the measure met with from this side of the House was such as to warrant us in saying that any proposal made on this important question would be met in a very fair spirit. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the depression of trade. I did not expect that either he or the Government would pay attention to those panaceas which in some quarters have been proposed as remedies; but still, I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman who addressed his constituents the other day, and other Members of the Government, have taken up so firm a position on this subject and have lent no encouragement to the doctrine of reciprocity or some such panacea. There is only one boon which the Government can give to trade or industry. It is in their power to maintain peace, and to inspire confidence in the minds of men at home and abroad that it is their intention to maintain peace. Whether they have been or are now taking the best means to inspire that confidence is a question of so wide a character that I will not deal with it on the present occasion. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the progress of events in Afghanistan. I am happy to be able to congratulate the Government and the Indian Army upon the rapid and successful progress of the campaign. I am specially glad that these results have been accomplished with such comparatively small loss of life. I am not sure that I can so completely congratulate the Government upon the results which have been attained. They are now in possession of the Frontier which was the object of the war; but they have accomplished more than the acquisition of certain strategic points. They have not only defeated, but they have annihilated the enemy with whom they engaged. It has been the policy of all former Governments to establish a strong and friendly Afghanistan, and the circumstances which led to this change of policy were discussed at the last meeting of Parliament. It may be said that recent events have shown that Afghanistan could not in any circumstances be a strong country, because it has collapsed so completely under our attack. But I do not think it has been proved that because Afghanistan has collapsed under the attack of a great military Empire when left entirely to its own resources, it might not have been a very powerful and useful Ally if we had been engaged with some other Power and Afghanistan could have relied on our support. It is satisfactory—as far as anything connected with this matter can be satisfactory—to hear that the Government do not intend to go any further. I have on a former occasion expressed my own opinion that it is a mistake from a military and political point of view to extend our Frontier at all, and I do not wish to say more upon the subject at the present moment. I will, therefore, only repeat the Question asked by the hon. Member for Chelsea, whether any information can be given as to the time when the Government will be able to announce to the House definitely what their intentions are and what they propose to do in regard to Afghanistan? The right hon. Gentleman has also referred with satisfaction to the Treaty of Berlin, and the progress made in its execution. There appears to be in some quarters an idea that the Opposition regret this progress. I am not aware of any such expression of opinion. On the contrary, the Resolution which I had the honour of moving last year, and which was rejected by a large majority in this House, expressed in general terms an approval on that subject, and there is no conceivable reason why the Opposition should view with dissatisfaction the progress that is made towards its execution. But I must remind the Government, when they speak of this rapid progress, that what has been done as yet has reference, for the most part, to the easiest portions of the Treaty. Those portions which are more difficult of execution, and which are in principle more open to question, are by no means accomplished, or, as far as we can see, in the way of being accomplished. It is true that Batoum and other parts of Turkish territory have been evacuated; but it was not the Opposition which prophesied that any difficulty would arise on that score. It was those who believed in the unconquerable spirit of the Turks who predicted that Batoum would never be evacuated without trouble. It is true that considerable progress has been made in the rectification of the Frontiers of Turkey, Montenegro, and Roumelia, that the arrangements of the Treaty of Berlin in these respects are in course of execution without more friction than was expected; but two provisions of the Treaty which were specially and unfavourably canvassed do not appear to be in course of so rapid an execution. My hon. Friend has referred to the case of Greece. He has spoken on that subject with very great knowledge, and referred to sources of information which have not been laid before the House. I cannot add anything to the statement of my hon. Friend on that point; but I think it cannot be asserted that any progress has been made in settling the relations between Turkey and Greece, and we on this side of the House feel certain that tranquillity will never be restored in the East so long as the claims of Greece, although not put forward in the shape of warlike measures, remain disregarded. Well, Sir, a provision of the Treaty to which the Government last year attached much importance—an importance greater, perhaps, than was indicated by the Protocols—was that which referred to the division of Bulgaria and to the creation of the Province of Eastern Roumelia. We pointed out the anomalous state of things established by that Treaty. If Lord Salisbury's original proposal had been accepted, the difficulties might possibly have been avoided which now appear to be impending, although it is probable that difficulties of another kind might have had to be encountered. Lord Salisbury's original proposal was that the Turkish power, civil and military, should be replaced, and that, at all events, was a simple proposition. But it was not the arrangement which was accepted by the Congress. The arrangement agreed to by the Congress was that while the civil power of the Sultan should, under certain limitations which were prescribed, be restored in the Province of Eastern Roumelia, the military power of the Sultan within the limits of the Province should be utterly destroyed; and the ultimate force upon which the civil power is to rely for the preservation of order is not the military power of the Sultan, but a Militia, which will be composed of the Christian inhabitants of the Province. All we hear points to a probability that when the Russians evacuate this Province the Bulgarians will not consent, without great compulsion, to be placed under the rule, direct or indirect, of the Sultan. What is to happen in these circumstances? There is a provision of the Treaty, no doubt, which may be held to apply to it. The Governor may, in certain circumstances, call in the assistance of the Turkish troops. But his power is restricted by many qualifications. This decision of the Governor is to be communicated to the Powers, and I suppose with the intention of their expressing an opinion upon it. If Turkish troops are to be called in to assist in the inauguration of the new Government and Constitution of the recently-erected Provinces, the Turkish military occupation of them will be permanent, and not merely temporary. It is, undoubtedly, considerations of this kind which have given rise to the rumour that has been so extensively circulated that some proposition has been made, either by this or some other Government, for a joint occupation of those Provinces. I should wish, therefore, to ask Her Majesty's Government, whether there is any foundation for that rumour; whether any negotiations have been made, or are in progress, for a joint occupation; and, if such an idea has been entertained, whether some opportunity will not be given to us to discuss the matter, and whether Parliament will not be consulted before the country is pledged to such a measure? I have been accused—my Friends and myself have been accused—of having said things which indicated a wish to undo what has been done; and that if we should find ourselves in Office, we should not consider ourselves bound by the stipulations entered into by the Government. I am not aware that anything of the sort has been said by anyone; and I am quite certain that nothing of the sort has been said by me. What we have said, however, is that if a state of things should arise which was not contemplated by the Treaty—such, for instance, as a proposal for the joint occupation of Eastern Roumelia—we should feel ourselves at liberty to form our own opinion in reference to it, and to canvass and dispute the propriety of such a course of proceeding. The right hon. Gentleman has touched upon the question of Turkish reform, and has contended that we have expressed undue impatience with the Turks in their delay to introduce the promised reforms. The right hon. Gentleman, however, must not regard that impatience as being unreasonable, inasmuch as Sir Henry Layard has stated in his despatches that his patience in the matter was nearly exhausted, and that he assumed that that of Her Majesty's Government was nearly exhausted also. I think these Papers show a very remarkable thing. One of the first observations they suggest is the extraordinary confidence with which Lord Salisbury proposed, in the first instance, the reforms which Turkey ought to undertake. Why should there have been any doubt in his mind? Was he not armed with the Anglo-Turkish Convention? Had he not the promise of the Sultan and the Turkish Government, in return for which the Sultan had received valuable consideration in the shape of an unconditional guarantee? Why, then, should Lord Salisbury doubt? But his confidence must have been a little shaken when he found that Sir Henry Layard did not consider it necessary or expedient to present the whole of Lord Salisbury's proposals for reform in the first instance. One proposition to which Lord Salisbury attached great importance was the irremovability of the Valies, but that was not obtained. None of the suggestions for that object were even made. Lord Salisbury made four proposals. One of these was as to the institution of certain tribunals in a certain number of Asiatic towns, and the answer to that was, that the Sultan informed Lord Salisbury that the proposal he made was one contrary to the first principles of judicial administration. This appears to have been the opinion which was finally acquiesced in by Lord Salisbury. That proposal is rejected altogether; but the Sultan says there are different Inspectors whose duties are to inspect prisons, who will, in the exercise of that duty, superintend the administration of justice. It certainly is an original idea that the administration of justice of the higher Courts should be superintended by a set of Inspectors of Prisons. The third proposal was as to the appointment of collectors, and to that the Sultan said he highly approved the plan, but he would only introduce it in one or two Provinces. There was also a modified response to the fourth proposition. This, then, was the consideration that we had got for the guarantee to which this country is pledged for the protection, in all and every circumstance, of Turkey. An infinitesimal portion of reform is to be carried into execution at some future day, and that is what we have got from the Sultan in return for our guarantee. I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer or some other Member of the Government, I recollect very well last year, said that it might become a question to re-consider our position and to re-consider the measures which might be necessary for the protection of our interests in Asia. I wish to ask the Government whether it is too soon now to inquire of the Government whether they are satisfied with the instalments which they have obtained of their reforms from the Porte; whether they are satisfied with the temper which has been displayed; and whether they consider that this country is bound in honour or in policy to maintain that most onerous obligation which has been imposed upon us? The right hon. Gentleman referred, of course, to the lamentable event which has taken place in South Africa. I entirely agree with him that exaggeration ought to be avoided in this matter quite as much as the other extreme. I think that the right hon. Gentleman, in speaking of it as a great blow to our Army, and as a military disaster, used terms as serious as the situation demanded. How serious it is, is proved by the fact that, great as is our grief at the loss of the gallant lives which had been sacrificed, great as is the pain with which this military reverse has been heard of, those sentiments are almost for the moment over-reached by the feeling of anxiety which exists—a feeling which I fear must exist for some time—as to the consequences the event may have had on the safety of the remainder of our Army, and even on the safety of the Colony itself. I shall follow the advice of the right hon. Gentleman, and not attempt to discuss, on this occasion, the causes which led to the war. The Papers which have been issued gave some information; but I think the right hon. Gentleman made a slight mistake in speaking of the date.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

The Marquess of Hartington

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I said they brought the Correspondence down to the end of last December, and that there were other Papers which would be distributed on Saturday or Monday giving additional information.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: If the information were brought down to the end of December, that would be the latest; but the last despatch in these Papers from South Africa is dated the 4th of November. The date of the latest despatch in this Book, no doubt, is November 28; but the latest despatch from the Cape bears date November 4. No doubt the Papers which have been promised may throw some light upon the matter; but at present I can only say that there appears to have been an inexplicable change of policy between the date to which the Papers before the House bring the matter down and the declaration of war. The Colonial Government were extremely anxious about the state of Zululand; and the requisitions for troops appear to be framed upon the idea that they were asking for the very smallest number which were required for the safety and defence of the Colony. At the same time, the Home Government appeared to have been giving very judicious advice to the Colonial Government, pointing out that there could be no pressing cause for alarm, and very strongly deprecating offensive movements. But two months beyond the period to which the despatches bring the events down everything appeared to have been changed. The reinforcements were received, offensive instead of defensive movements were undertaken, and the objections formerly entertained by the Government to a Zulu campaign seem to have vanished. I will not enter further into the matter at this moment; but I hope that some explanations will be given, and that the further Papers will enable the House to understand the cause of this extraordinary change. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the requisitions of the Commander-in-Chief had been complied with to the fullest extent. But there, again, is another inexplicable matter. In one month the Colonial Government asked, as a matter of very great importance, that a cavalry regiment should be sent. The next month that demand appears to be altogether dropped, in a manner which seems altogether unaccountable. I have not the slightest intention of entering further into a discussion of the matter at this time. It is one so serious both in its military and political aspect that it requires, and I hope it will receive, as soon as we have the material, the most careful and thorough consideration on the part of the House. I do not think any premature discussion of it now would be calculated to improve the spirit or the temper of that discussion which at some later period must take place.

MR. W. H. SMITH: As the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) has asked me some questions I am bound to reply to them, and I shall do so briefly. But before doing so I wish to express my regret at the fact that any observations which fell from me when I addressed my constituents the other night should have caused the hon. and learned Member annoyance.

The Marquess of Hartington

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Not at all.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. and learned Gentleman, when he addresses his constituents, is in the habit of using strong language. When I spoke to mine it did not occur to me that the plain and good-humoured language I employed should have caused annoyance to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I beg pardon—surprise, but not annoyance.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Well, all I can say is that if there was any annoyance I did not intend to occasion it. But to pass from that. The hon. and learned Gentleman asks me to explain an opinion expressed by the Hydrographer of the Admiralty with reference to Cyprus and Famagosta. Having received no intimation from the hon. and learned Gentleman of his intention to refer to the statement of the Hydrographer, I cannot, of course, just now quote his precise words. He is, however, an officer of such extremely high merit that I have the utmost reliance in the opinion he has expressed in the report referred to. I feel confident that the information he has given to the Admiralty and to the Geographical Society is correct, and can be justified. But we are told that there can be no harbour at Famagosta. All I can say is that, when I was there, the Himalaya troop ship went into the place, and was perfectly protected from any water coming over the reef. Then as to the cost of constructing a harbour there, I assert that the information I have received justifies me in saying that an expenditure of £150,000 would secure perfectly smooth water for as many line-of-battle ships as we are likely to have in the Mediterranean in ordinary times. Perfectly smooth water could, in fact, be secured in all weathers for such an expenditure. A larger expenditure would give us a secure harbour within the breakwater for a greater number of ships than can be sheltered at Malta. That is a statement I am prepared to justify on a future occasion, if it should become necessary to do so. But the hon. and learned Gentleman asks me whether we are going to make a harbour. Well, it is one thing to know there is a roadstead there which affords the material, so to speak, of making a good harbour—that there is at present shelter for ships drawing 20 feet of water; but it is another thing to say we are about to enter into an enterprize of considerable importance and magnitude. We have, if we want it, the opportunity of doing so. There we have such natural facilities that, at any time we desire to avail ourselves of them, they can be advantageously used. Then the hon. and learned Gentleman asks me if I sent a copy of The Daily Telegraph to Sir Garnet Wolseley.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: No, no. My speech.

MR. W. H. SMITH: All I can say with reference to the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech is that it did not occur to me to send the hon. and learned Member's speech to Sir Garnet Wolseley. I had occasion to communicate with his Excellency, and naturally having a great interest in the progress of his government I asked him to tell me how affairs were progressing in Cyprus. Well, it happened that, at the time I asked this question, the gallant Governor of Cyprus received his newspapers from England. In writing back to me he referred to the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech in the terms of the letter I read on Wednesday last. That surely was a very natural thing for the Governor of Cyprus to do under the circumstances. I therefore give the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite all the credit he deserves when he admits that the statements contained in his Oxford speech about Cyprus were based entirely on the authority of The Daily Telegraph, and that they had no other foundation. I am anxious that the public should know that such is the case.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: They seem to be true.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I prefer my own version of the truth—or, I should rather say, the fact—under the circumstances of the case, and I feel no doubt whatever that the result will fully bear out the statements I have made. I am asked whether it can possibly be true that advances have been made to Cyprus without the authority of Parliament,

The House of Commons has sanctioned advances to Cyprus. £8,000 were voted last year. That being so, it may be satisfactory to know that the resources of Cyprus will in time enable the Exchequer to receive back that £8,000, and that is the statement which I made. I think, Sir, I have answered all the questions that have been put to me.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have asked whether you intend, or do not intend, to construct a harbour at Famagosta?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think I have answered that. If we think it necessary for the interests of the country that a large or small expenditure should be incurred for a harbour at Famagosta, we shall come down to the House and make our statement, and I have no doubt we shall be supported. As the hon. and learned Gentleman wishes for Papers on Cyprus, we shall be prepared to lay them on the Table of the House.

MR. H. SAMUELSON observed that the right hon. Gentleman had told them about the so-called harbour of Famagosta, that there was a possibility of making it; but he had not told them that the Government intended to make it. Now, if there was no harbour, he was at a loss to see of what possible use the Island could be to us. He had been at Cyprus, but without the advantages possessed by the right hon. Gentleman when he visited the Island. The town of Famagosta was an absolute ruin—a kind of mediæval Pompeii, and he did not believe it would be possible on the shores of the Mediterranean to find a more unhealthy spot than the so-called port of Famagosta. As a coaling station quays would be wanted, or at least a foreshore, on which to build them; but Famagosta possessed neither. It had been stated to him on credible authority that the contract for the harbour of Alexandria was something like £3,000,000 sterling, but that the real cost was about £2,000,000, and that the harbour was very little better afterwards than it was before. The law which was to be administered in Cyprus appeared to be a matter of the greatest uncertainty. One officer had told him that it was purely Turkish, or the law of the Koran; another that it was a mixture of Turkish and English law; and a third that it was the Code Napoleon. With respect to healthiness, Cyprus was a fever-stricken Island. He did not believe that last season was, as had been alleged, a peculiarly unhealthy one in the Levant, or that there had been more fever in Cyprus last July, August, and September than usual. The Colonial Secretary had attributed the sickness which had occurred among the troops to the careless way in which Englishmen lived when they went to other climates. The way in which Englishmen lived had nothing to do with the epidemic fever from which they suffered. The troops lived in bell-tents and had only what was given to them. The fever attacked the Natives, who did not live in bell-tents, as much as it did Englishmen; and it prevailed every year. The great majority of the houses in which he stayed had an inmate suffering from fever. It was absurd to send soldiers to receive the seeds of fever in Cyprus before they went to fight in some other country. With respect to the proposal to establish a camp on a certain plateau some 5,000 feet above the sea level, it seemed an extraordinary thing that it should have taken so many months to discover that plateau in an Island not larger than Yorkshire; and now that it had been discovered, it was difficult to see how the troops were to be got up to it, and the commissariat arrangements were to be carried out without great expense. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told them the Cyprus Budget was likely to be a very hopeful one. When was it to be laid before the House? Had the Government tried to buy the Sultan's rights out and out? The rent they were to pay for the privilege of making improvements, without any claim to compensation for unexhausted improvements when they left the Island, was, as he was informed, 50 per cent above what they might have bought those rights for. He also wished to know what was to be the official language of the Island. It was said that it was to be Turkish and English. Greek was not recognized in the tribunals, and the Greek population thereby suffered detriment. In conclusion, he wished to know if the Returns with respect to Cyprus for which he had given Notice to move would be granted by the Government?

SIR GEORGE ELLIOT said, he had been informed that during his absence from the House the hon. and learned Member for Oxford had made some references to him in connection with the contract for the harbour of Alexandria.

Mr. W. H. Smith

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT explained that all the reference he had made to the hon. Member for North Durham was that he was happy to think the hon. Baronet could not take a certain contract because it would forfeit his seat in that House.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had never referred to the hon. Baronet.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE observed that he had been the first to refer to the subject in this debate, and that his authority was the report of the right hon. Gentleman's speech in The Times, where the name was given at full length—Sir George Elliot.

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, he had also derived his information from The Times.

SIR GEORGE ELLIOT wished to say he had never made any estimate in connection with the works of the port of Alexandria. Therefore, it followed that his estimate could not have been exceeded, and that there could not have been a great many extras. So much, then, for that part of the subject. He should not be surprised, however, if, in conversation, he had given an opinion about Famagosta. He took the area of the harbour and the depth of the water and the mud in it and made a mental calculation, multiplying by two the cost of similar works in the Rivers Tyne and Wear. In this manner, he arrived at the conclusion that the expense of constructing a harbour at Famagosta would be considerably under £150,000. He did not believe that the collective wisdom and experience of the Institution of Civil Engineers could select a place better suited than Famagosta for the formation of a harbour. An inner harbour might be constructed there which would be as secure as the harbour at Liverpool or at any other port in the world. He had had the inner harbour within the Mole sounded at Famagosta and found a depth of 27 feet which was sufficient to receive any of our iron-clads. In his judgment, a harbour was indispensable to the success of the enterprize in which we had embarked by acquiring the Island of Cyprus. At present, Cyprus was unhealthy because it had been so long neglected. The Island was so small that a sufficient rainfall could not be got to create a river of so large a volume that it would find its way to the sea. Consequently, the plain behind the coast became a swamp and required to be drained. This might be done by means of small engines at Famagosta, Larnaca, Limasole, and other places. The drainage could be thus collected from the swamps and run back again in a channel or pipes and it would re-irrigate the land. Thus the towns would be made healthy, while what was now a great mischief would become a real benefit. Of course, if anyone visited Cyprus with a desire to make things appear as black as possible, it would be easy enough for him to do so. At all events, it was a most fertile country. The vines were most prolific, and he had seen grapes offered for sale at a halfpenny a pound in the streets of Nicosia. Only patience and capital were required to develop the resources of the Island. If he was on the Treasury Bench, and was asked, as the First Lord of the Admiralty had been, if he intended to make a harbour, he should reply in the affirmative, and he was sure they would get full value for their money. A railway might also be constructed at a cost of about £3,000 a-mile, and persons would, he believed, be found ready to make the railway if land were ceded with it.

MR. MACDONALD complained that the Employers' and Workmen's Bill had not been promised this Session, and he reminded the House that it had been promised more than once before; but the Attorney General and the Home Secretary had failed in their pledges. With reference to the Attorney General, he said he had a fair reputation for saying that which he meant to do, and his promise was as good as an order at 90 days' date. He, however, attributed his failure to fulfil his pledges in this particular as the effect of his being bound to those whom he served. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had in his statement to the House almost trifled with the subject; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would re-consider the question, and, having re-considered it, deal with it as the Government had already dealt with several other important questions affecting the people. If the Ministry would take the subject up and place it in a first position, they would gain gratitude in quarters where gratitude was least to be expected. He begged to assure the House it was not his intention to argue the principle of compensation now. One thing he felt bound to say—that during the two lengthened discussions that had taken place on the subject they had been told again and again, that the employers of labour, if they continued to harass them with laws of this kind, would take their capital and proceed to other countries with it, where they could develop it without any trouble or difficulty. He, however, had been making more extended inquiries into the matter, and felt bound to tell them that the law of France was exactly what his Bill desired to make the law, and that the law of Germany was very much akin to that. In almost every State of the American Union modifications were taking place on the subject, and he felt convinced that before long in other countries the law which was based on such illogical assumptions as that which was the law of this country would soon be swept away.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had taken him to task somewhat severely for having made a promise last Session and not performing it. He had said, in a complimentary tone, that the promises made by him (the Attorney General) had generally been trusted in, and that he had obtained a reputation, that he was not aware of, of performing his undertakings. He was happy to hear this, and he hoped he should not lose his good character. What the hon. Gentleman had said, however, was perfectly true, that he (the Attorney General) promised last Session, on behalf of the Government, to introduce a Bill relating to the liability of employers for accidents to such of their workmen as might sustain injuries in consequence of the negligence of their fellow-workmen. He should have been quite as much pleased as the hon. Gentleman if he had been able to perform that promise; and if he had thought for a moment at the time he made the promise that he should not have been able to perform it, he certainly would never have made it. He was more disappointed, perhaps, than any other Member of the House of Commons to find that the pledge he had given it was not in his power to redeem; but he was not alone in this matter.

Other people that entertained somewhat different views to himself had to be consulted, and towards the close of the Session the Government found they had embarked on a measure which involved a question of a most difficult nature. He did not say that the Bill was one of first-class importance; but certainly the question, as dealt with by the Bill, would have shown it was one of the very greatest difficulty. It was easy, of course, to frame a measure which would take away the inequalities, or supposed inequalities, of the law of which the workmen of this country and those by whom they were represented complained; but the difficulty was to make that alteration without unduly or improperly affecting interests of the greatest possible importance to the workmen themselves. He could, of course, very easily frame a Bill which would saddle the employers of labour with a much greater responsibility for accidents which might happen, not through their own fault, but through the fault of their servants, than the responsibility under which they were at present suffering; but they must consider, before they attached such an increased measure of responsibility, what would be the consequences to the trade and commerce of the country by so attaching it—whether they would not unfairly handicap the employers of labour; and if they unfairly handicapped the employers of labour the results might be disastrous to the workmen themselves. When the matter came to be discussed it was found that it was one of the greatest difficulty, and obstacles presented themselves to the Members of the Government which had not been present at the outset to his mind. Though he did all in his power to redeem the pledge which he had made, and though he had himself prepared some measures and submitted them for consideration, he owned that those measures were not satisfactory, and he was not surprised at all that the Government, after carefully considering the matter, could not accept any of them. It was, therefore, his misfortune and not his fault that he was not able to redeem his promise, and he had suffered great disappointment in consequence. He did not mean to say that he had an overwhelming interest in this subject, or that he was so fully convinced of the inequalities of the law; but what he did feel very acutely was that having engaged himself to introduce a certain measure he was not able to do so. Having made this short explanation of his own position, he pleaded guilty, and threw himself upon the mercy of the House. But the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had that evening stated that the Government were prepared to deal with this question, and would do so. That being so, he (the Attorney General) made no pledge. The right hon. Gentleman had much more power than he; indeed, he was all-powerful, and when he made a pledge no doubt he intended to redeem it. The Bill might, therefore, be expected to be introduced. He did not think it would be a measure of vital importance, and he looked upon the agitation with respect to it as somewhat of a sentimental character. Other hon. Members might take a different view. In reference to the Bill for amending the law in regard to corrupt practices at elections, he would remind the House that it was introduced last Session, but that it had not the fortune to be proceeded with, and it accordingly met, in company with other measures, a disastrous fate. He had, however, done his best this Session to atone for the last, and he had already given Notice of the re-introduction of the Bill for Monday next.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the Government proposed to deceive the expectations of the people of Ireland in regard to beneficial legislation, and contemplated a coercive code for Irish Members. That was about the summary of the Ministerial Message as regarded Ireland. He supposed it was the memory of counsels which were thrown away upon the Government when they entered on their disastrous campaign in South Africa a couple of years ago which now induced them to introduce measures of coercion, in order to prevent similar good advice being offered to them on some future occasion. No one felt more than he did for the gallant lives that had been lost in the performance of duty, though upon an errand of which he could not approve; but the disaster on the Tugela could not blind them to the nature of the policy in the prosecution of which it had occurred. The Government were fully aware that the objections which would be raised to their policy this Session would be precisely those which were raised two Sessions ago, and which they overcame by the sheer weight of an obedient majority. He was not going to refer to foreign politics or complications. He had already in that House spoken and voted upon these questions with independence, and was prepared to do so again. But when he heard this Message delivered to the House, barren of every promise of real benefit to Ireland, coupled with the challenge which had been thrown down at the very outset of Public Business, he begged to tell the Government that he took up the challenge, not as an Irishman only, not as one of those Members specially aimed at, but as a plain citizen of the Empire. He took it up because he knew that the sympathies of the English people would be against a Government which proposed to suppress freedom of opinion while offering every inducement to disaffection, and setting a premium on the expression of discontent. He said that the Government—or at least persons who might be taken to represent them—had spared no pains to induce the Irish people to believe that grievances moderately and temperately represented to that House and to the Government would be treated fairly, and, as far as possible, redressed. The Government did not, however, propose to remedy the grievances of the Irish tenants; but they proposed to saddle disabilities on the defenders of Irish tenant-right. The Government did not propose to grant even electoral equality with England to the Irish people; but they did propose to render the Representatives of Ireland in Parliament still more inefficient and ineffectual than hitherto. In a word, the Government were carrying out a policy of coercing Ireland, and he could assure the Government that he had sufficient confidence in the people of Great Britain to be satisfied that this policy would meet with a disastrous repulse at the hands of the electorate. Whatever measures might be introduced into Parliament this Session, the Government might be perfectly assured that they would be debated on their merits by Irish Members with as full freedom as was permitted to any English Member, and for every infraction of the liberties of Irish Members it was not they who would suffer most. He had never yet, either by words or action, conduced to the maintenance of any hostility between the English and the Irish peoples. He was ready to compete for the applause of an English meeting with most of the hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. He had addressed thousands of Englishmen in all parts of the country, and he did not find the policy of the Government reflected in the wishes of the English people. After so many Sessions barren of beneficial legislation for Ireland, with one exception, they were to have another Session barren of beneficial legislation for that country. Well, the end of the Session would enable the Government to judge more accurately than they could at present of the utility of that policy. He did not know whether it was the example of an eminent statesman in a Continental State not remarkable for the freedom of its institutions which had spurred on Her Majesty's Government to the proposed step; but he thought that he knew quite enough of the English people as well as of the Irish people to assure the Government that Liliputian Bismarckism was not going to succeed in this country.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE congratulated the Government upon having fully realized the promise recently made by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Colonies—namely, that legislation during the present Session would be of an unostentatious character. [Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH dissented.] Well, at all events, the Bills mentioned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer deserved that title. They were asked to deal with a Criminal Code, with a Bankruptcy Law, and with pauperism in Scotland. The list was an appropriate one now that pauperism and crime were increasing and bankruptcies very numerous. He wished, however, to ask the Government their intention with reference to two subjects. A Committee appointed last year to inquire whether increased facilities should be given for purchase of land by the occupying tenant in Ireland came to the unanimous conclusion that it was very desirable increased facilities should be given. There was difference as to how this should be effected, but there was unanimity that a change was necessary. Therefore, it appeared incumbent on the part of the Government that something should be done. He was surprised to find no allusion to it made by the Government. The Chief Secretary for Ireland told him before Christmas that the Government was considering the question, and he would like to know what they intended doing in the matter. Then, again, a Bill was introduced two years ago by the then President of the Board of Trade to afford to seamen facilities such as were given to workmen by the Act of 1875. That Bill met the approval of a Select Committee, and, not having passed, a pledge was given that it would be re-introduced. No mention, however, had been made of it by the right hon. Gentleman; and he therefore begged to inquire whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to re-introduce the measure. He would not go into the general question which had been debated. It was clear from the speech of the First Lord of the Admiralty that they would not that year be asked for any Vote for the formation of a harbour at Famagosta; but he would remind the Government of the case of the harbour at Alderney. That harbour was to have cost £200,000, and it cost £1,250,000, and was now abandoned as totally useless. He believed that a harbour at Famagosta would cost as much and be as useless.

MR. COGAN said, he could not allow the debate to close without expressing the deep disappointment which he felt, and which he believed would be shared by a large portion of the people of Ireland, when they learned that it was not proposed by the Government to deal with the question of University Education in Ireland. Hopes had been excited on this question in the minds of the people of that country. From various things which had transpired, and from the tone of the public Press of late, they had, he thought, every reason to believe that Her Majesty's Government were prepared to deal with this question. He regretted that this expectation had been disappointed, not only for the sake of education in Ireland. He regretted it for political reasons. He believed that it would have a very bad political effect in the present state of public opinion in Ireland, if the people should come to the conclusion that a question which to them was of so great importance, and which both parties in the House had admitted was a question that deserved and required to be dealt with, was postponed indefinitely. He believed that there never was a Government in power who could have dealt with the question so effectually as the present Administration; and it was much to be lamented that they had omitted to take advantage of the opportunity which presented itself to them. He did not abandon all hope, however; because, although the question of University Education in Ireland did not figure amongst the measures which the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of as those to be first dealt with by the Government, yet the right hon. Gentleman stated that other questions might arise which circumstances might enable them to deal with, and he (Mr. Cogan) should not abandon the hope that they would refuse to deal with a question which would be fertile of good to their common country. He had only further to express his entire concurrence with what had been stated by his hon. Friend the Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), and his hope that the Government would introduce a well-considered measure for giving increased facilities to tenants for the purchase of the fee-simple of their farms.

Mr. O'Donnell

MR. GREGORY said, he thought that the Government would have done well to have legislated on the subject of the extradition of criminals. At present, the Convention—if any now existed at all—with the United States was left in a most unsatisfactory condition. Before any practical solution of the difficulty with the United States could be reached legislation would be necessary.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the attention of the House to a country called Scotland. This was necessary, because, except the few words uttered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer about an Amendment to one Bill affecting Scotland, no allusion was otherwise made to that part of the Kingdom. He complained that this Scotch Poor Law Bill had been so prominently mentioned, because, as usual, it had hitherto received no attention from the House except the mention made of it by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it would probably drop. It was a plain and simple question, which could be settled in a short time if a small amount of attention were given to it. Indeed, a Committee of the humble but useful Inspectors of the poor would dispose of all the questions requiring settlement. He agreed with the complaint that the Government had not acted towards Ireland quite so well as they might have done; but the peace-loving people of Scotland were even more neglected than the unfortunate and misgoverned people of Ireland. Had they Home Rule in Scotland, with the Scotch Members sitting in Edinburgh, the Poor Law Question would have been considered and settled satisfactorily long ago. This one measure was not by any means the most important of the other claims which Scotland had so frequently and persistently urged on the attention of the Government. He instanced the Law of Hypothec, the "vile gun tax," the Game Laws, and the functions of the Commissioners of Supply, as subjects well worthy the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, whom he thought he might with propriety style the Secretary of State for Scotland. He fully expected, after the two recent visits to Scotland by the Home Secretary, that the conclusions formed after those visits would have been mentioned. For instance, the decision of the Government about the Lord Clerk Register, the arrangements for facilitating the Scotch Business, and the changes in the offices at Edinburgh should have been spoken of; above all, the state of the land tenures might have been noticed. There could be no doubt that, what with the restrictions by the Law of Hypothec, and the stringent leases of owners, the Scotch landlords and farmers, owing to the two bad seasons, were not in a satisfactory condition as to payment of rents. He could also have wished that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given some indication of the intentions of the Government in regard to the Church Question, and the extent to which they proposed to interfere with the Banking System of Scotland. Not a word had been said about the Revenues of India. Last year it was stated they would have, in 1878-9, a surplus of £2,000,000. Since then telegraphic intelligence had largely cut down the amount. Now there were ominous warnings that that surplus had disappeared, and that the Government might carry on the war in Afghanistan with the normal forces of India; but now it was said that the expense was being augmented by an increase of European troops. Already a considerable addition had been made to the Native Regular Army, and the troops of Native Chiefs were called out in considerable numbers. This addition, with the cost of the large army in the field, must require several millions, and consequently largely drain the cash balances.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: It was not my intention to have troubled the House with any remarks to-night, but for the observations which have just fallen from the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Sir George Balfour). I can assure him that before the Session is over he will find that Scotland has not been so entirely neglected as he now appears to think likely to be the case. I do not suppose it was ever the intention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to detail to the House every measure which may be brought forward in the course of our proceedings, or to enter into particulars as to the way in which we may meet the various questions which may be introduced by hon. Members, and which at the present moment stand on the Notice Paper of the House. That would be quite foreign to such a debate as generally occurs at the opening of a Session like the present. I know that Scotland is interested—and naturally interested—in many of the measures which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has named—measures, however, which are not confined to Scotland, but which apply to the whole of the United Kingdom. We have, however, named one in which Scotland is especially interested—namely, the question of the Poor Law. That is a subject which certainly needs the immediate attention of Parliament. It is not mentioned as a new topic; but as one with which we have not had time in other Sessions to deal—one, however, with which we mean, so far as lies in our power, to take in hand during the present Session. The hon. and gallant Member has referred to other matters. He has spoken on the question of game. I thought that that subject had already been discussed at considerable length, and that a Bill had been passed with reference to it, which, I believe, is working thoroughly well North of the Tweed. That being so, I think that, so far as game is concerned, we may be quite content to leave matters alone for the present. As to the way in which Scotch Business is managed, I made the proposition last year that I should have the assistance of an Under Secretary for Scotland. That proposition at first received a great deal of support from many hon. Members who represented different Northern constituencies; but they objected, not unnaturally, to the source from which I thought the emoluments of that officer might be derived. I was very much surprised to find afterwards that there was a very serious difference of opinion among the Scotch Members as to whether any such officer ought to exist at all. [General Sir GEORGE BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] That was a bond fide attempt, however, to remedy what I considered to be a grievance; and it was alone owing to the opposition which came from Scotland that the Bill on the subject was not passed during the last Session of Parliament. I hope in the course of the present Session to be able to present to Parliament some scheme by which, at all events, considerable facilities may be given to Scotch Members for having all their grievances fully discussed, and by which scheme we may hope to arrive at some satisfactory conclusion. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has also alluded to the question of hypothec. I would remind him that a Bill on that subject is to be introduced by the hon. Member for Wigtownshire (Mr. Vans Agnew), and when that measure is brought forward I shall be prepared to state the intentions of the Government with regard to it. The hon. and gallant Gentleman has likewise touched upon the question of the Church. That is undoubtedly a very serious and important question. It is one which no Government could—unless they saw ample time for its discussion, and unless they also saw a reasonable prospect of carrying a measure—have brought forward; and I doubt very much whether, considering all the Business before the House, it would be possible, even if the Government wanted it, to introduce such a measure upon such a subject with a reasonable prospect of success at present. That being the case, it is much better that the Government should not approach it, but should leave it to be taken up by any private Member who may think it necessary to raise it. I shall have other opportunities of speaking more fully on the subjects referred to by the hon. and gallant Member; and I will content myself at present by repeating my assurance that Scotch Business will receive due attention from the Government.

General Sir George Balfour

SIR HENRY JAMES said, that although the statement that there were measures which would command the attention of legal Members of the House was not favourably received he trusted there would not be much difference of opinion between the two sides of the House upon those measures. The chief object of the Mutiny Bill would be to introduce the Articles of War into the Mutiny Bill and to make them a Parliamentary measure; and in this matter the Government would receive assistance as loyal from the legal Members of the Opposition as from those on their own side of the House. As to the Criminal Code Bill, it would be almost impossible to present it as a whole for the consideration of the House in Committee. No doubt it had been referred to a Commission, including the most distinguished Judges on the Bench, well able to determine matters of definition and procedure; but the Code contained other matters which it was the duty of Members to determine for themselves. No Member ought to delegate it to a Judge to determine the law relating, for instance, to Sunday observance and to public meetings; and there were other social and political questions which could not be disposed of as matters of technicality and drafting. The difficulty of codification could not be known until it was encountered, and they realized the difference between the elasticity of the Common Law and the rigidity of definitions intended to cover every crime without committing injustice to any person accused. It was one thing to allow existing laws to continue and another to re-enact them. They had borne with the Sunday Observance Act of Charles II. because it was old, and, though partially obsolete, was not quite so; being in existence, it had been endorsed; but would they take the responsibility of re-enacting it merely as a piece of codification by a draftsman? A Bill of 480 clauses could not be carried as one measure; it was not one, but 50; but some progress might be made if it were divided into sections. However valuable might be the technical provisions formulated by

Lord Blackburn, Mr. Justice Lush, and Mr. Justice Stephen, the Government would not find the House disposed to accept en bloc the provisions of the Bill embodying the law as it affected every citizen. He asked the Government whether it would not be well to draw a line between what was merely technical and what was political and social. The House would no doubt accept the former on the recommendation of the much respected Members of the Commission; but to the other sections the fullest consideration must be given. He felt sure that if the Bill should be submitted to the House as a whole there would not be time to pass it into law in one Session. With respect to the two other legal measures which had been announced—the Bankruptcy Bill and the Summary Jurisdiction Bill—not knowing on what lines they were drawn he should not offer any opinion which could only be hypothetical. He would only say if the latter Bill was similar to that which the Secretary of State had formerly introduced he should agree with the principle, but the details would be matter for examination. There was one other matter to which he wished to refer, and was it to ask what had been the administration of justice in Cyprus up to this time. The Attorney General had told them when the House last met that the law of Cyprus was clear and distinct—the Colony had been ceded to us, and therefore the law which existed there was valid till some other law was introduced, but time had passed, and the prophecies of the hon. and learned Gentleman had not been fulfilled; therefore he wished to know what was the state of the law in that Island, and how it was administered. He was told an Ordinance had been sent out to Cyprus, but was not yet published. The people of this country had a right to know what the law of Cyprus was as well as the people of that Island. He understood that at the present moment there was perfect chaos in the Island, and that British subjects had been denied justice. He had been informed that an English barrister of the Middle Temple had not been permitted to practise in the Courts of Larnaca because he had not obtained the permission of the Turkish Minister, and that that had been supported by Sir Garnet Wolseley. Was that so? Surely he was not pressing the Government too strongly to say whether they were aware of that fact. Did the Foreign Office know of these things; and, if so, had any objection been taken to the course which had been pursued towards British subjects? He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his reply, would give some answer to this complaint.

MR. BOURKE said, that as the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir Henry James) had pointedly alluded to him he must say that the matter referred to had not been brought officially before him at the Foreign Office, and therefore it was impossible for him to give an answer at that moment; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman would put a Question on the Notice Paper there would be the necessary inquiry into the matter.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that before he alluded to the Irish questions which had been brought forward he would first of all refer to the administration of Cyprus. As he understood the matter this country was not mistress of the Island, and they merely held a tenancy, and whether they were to be masters there or not remained to be determined. He objected to the building of harbours, or the outlaying of any expenditure in regard to Cyprus, unless the money could be provided from the Revenue. In regard to the Merchant Shipping Acts, the Committee, after due consideration, arrived at certain conclusions in which were shown the necessity for legislation, so that it would be a great breach of duty on the part of Her Majesty's Government if they were not acted up to, and he trusted that an Act of Parliament would be passed embodying the Resolutions of the Committee. He now turned to what he looked upon as a very meagre programme, which they had set forth for Ireland, and which would cause very great disappointment amongst all classes in that country. He listened with profound respect to the warnings given by the right hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Cogan), a Gentleman of moderate opinions, who did not hesitate to express the bad effects which would be produced on the minds of all classes in Ireland by the neglect of the greatest interests on the part of the Government with reference to that country. An hon. and gallant Member from Scotland (General Sir George Balfour) had received the assurance of the Home Secretary that Bills would be introduced in reference to Scotland; but he would recommend that hon. and gallant Member not to place too much reliance upon that assurance, for he (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) in December last complained that no Irish measures had been mentioned in the Queen's Speech, and he and the Irish Members were told to be full of hope as they did not know what good things were in store for them. He would not be surprised if Scotland did not agitate for Home Rule as well as Ireland, considering that they had similar complaints to make of the neglect of their interests. The only Irish question alluded to in the programme was the Grand Jury Question, and at the end there was a general allusion to some other topics which might fairly form subjects of legislation. He looked forward with great interest to the Grand Jury Law Amendment Act that it should be properly framed; but the conduct of the Government during the last Session did not encourage them to hope for much. He thought that they might not have expected to be put to the trouble of discussing the extension of the franchise of Irish towns, for upon every occasion the Press of this country had almost unanimously said that they deserved to be victorious in this respect. He would now pass from that question to one which was of the most importance to Ireland at this moment, and that was the question of University Education, and on that subject he thought they were entitled to expect that the Government would tell them what were their real intentions. Even at that stage of the debate, and at that hour of the evening, they ought to be informed whether the Government did or did not intend during the present Session to fulfil the promises which had been made. The Lord Chancellor, when dealing with the Intermediate Education Bill, said he looked forward to crowning the edifice in Ireland by passing such legislation with regard to University Education as would meet the requirements of the country. Now, he would not rely too much upon a promise which might be out of date, or upon the negotiations which were alleged—perhaps truly and perhaps falsely—to have taken place between the Government and those who had the confidence of the people of

Sir Henry James

Ireland on this subject; but he would come to a speech which was made a few days ago at the Mansion House in Dublin by the Duke of Marlborough, the Lord Lieutenant, in which he distinctly admitted this question of University Education was one in the first rank of importance, and he said that this year or some other it must be dealt with. He further expressed the anxiety of his Party to deal with it. The speech of the Lord Lieutenant was followed by one from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, whom he rejoiced to see at his post. That was a mysterious speech, because, as the right hon. Gentleman said, it was addressed to the common sense and moderation of the Irish people. He wanted Irishmen to reduce their demands to moderate dimensions so that some settlement might be arrived at, and this question be no longer made a business of battle-dore and shuttlecock. Of course, the Chief Secretary did not bind himself to anything by that expression, but he did admit the necessity of dealing with the question; and he would now ask him—and he thought he was quite within his right in so doing—whether it was the intention of the Government to do anything during the present Session on the subject? Her Majesty's Government had considerable encouragement to give a favourable answer to the question. The noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, speaking on this delicate and interesting subject, announced, as he was informed—for he was not present in the House at the moment—that difficulties lay in the way of dealing with it by one Party which did not stand in the way of its settlement by the other. In fact, he believed the noble Marquess had said that he expected the question would be dealt with by Her Majesty's Government. Under these circumstances, let the Government state what they really intended to do, and let them not be afraid to put forward their programme in this matter. They could not complain that any topic upon which they had hitherto legislated for the Irish people, even including the Coercion Bill, had not been fairly and frankly discussed, and whenever Irish matters had been introduced they had been properly discussed. Therefore, if the Government would introduce a measure on Irish University Education it would be fairly discussed; and if the Bill was rejected it would not inflict upon them any very wonderful defeat, because Bills of their own had been thrown out on previous occasions and the Government still existed. At all events, he thought the Irish people had a right to know what the intentions of the Government were. He now desired to refer to the question of the Land Laws, which was one which could not be allowed to remain in its present condition. It was not merely a matter which concerned the comfort and existence of the farming classes in Ireland, but it concerned the consumer in England. In the present state of the relations between the landlords and tenants in Ireland, the people of England who purchased from the people of Ireland did not get one-half out of the produce of the land which the land could give them; and this was directly traceable to the existing law. Ireland could not, perhaps, expect that any broad and liberal view would be taken of this subject by Her Majesty's Government; but with regard to the purchases by tenants through the medium of the Landed Estates Court, there was a perfect and necessary case made out for legislation. Certain clauses of the Act of Parliament were a complete failure as far as the object for which they were framed was concerned, and a Committee of this House had reported in favour of the alteration. Could any case be stronger? There were other branches of the Land Act besides the Bright clauses which had been a failure; and even Irish Northern landlords in this House had been forced to admit an alteration. They had heard something to-night about a Valuation Bill for England. He hoped they were not threatened with a valuation for Ireland. Practically the present valuation of the country meant that the landlord was entitled to demand a rent something like a third over the present valuation. An alteration of the law would give landlords another argument for increasing rents, and that, with the fall in the value of land in Ireland, would be a great injustice. These were matters which it was a duty on the part of Irish Members to bring prominently, and even pressingly, under the notice of the House, and it was their intention to do so. If they did not, he thought they had no business there.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am perfectly aware I have no right to address the House a second time; but under the present peculiar circumstances, I think I may claim the indulgence of the House to offer a few observations upon some remarks that have been made in the course of the evening. I will say, in the first place, that I have not been surprised at the observations which have been made upon the omission from the list of measures which I mentioned to the House of a good many Bills on subjects which are interesting both to hon. Members and the House at large. But I must point out to the House that, as to the list which I mentioned, the Government, in deciding upon the course that should be taken, felt that there was a danger to be guarded against—namely, the danger of smothering legislation by proposing too large a number of subjects at once. And, undoubtedly, the error which we sometimes fall into of announcing a very large number of measures, all more or less important and interesting, has the effect of rendering it very difficult to proceed with and pass any measure at all. The other day, when we were considering what should be the statement to be made to Parliament, I wrote a line to the Government draftsman, and requested him to send me a note stating the preparation of the different Government Bills that had been intrusted to him for preparation, and in reply he sent me back a list of 18 Bills, all of considerable interest. Four of the principal Bills which I have mentioned were not included in that list, because they had been prepared in other Departments. It was, therefore, perfectly obvious that if we had proposed to introduce a very large number of Bills, and had stated that that was the programme of the Session, we should have been not only exposed to considerable ridicule, but justly reprobated for making an impracticable proposal. We should have been told that we were making a great show, and would accomplish nothing. We thought it wiser and better, and more convenient for the House, that we should make a selection of a smaller number of measures; but I admit that that selection was a matter of difficulty, and that there are measures of importance that have been referred to which we must consider as included in the programme of the Session. We shall do the best we can to fulfil that programme, and in addition to the Bills I have mentioned, I hope that a few others not unimportant or uninteresting will be brought forward and considered before the end of the Session. I can well understand the remarks that have been made by hon. Members, and especially by hon. Gentlemen who represent Irish constituencies, as to what they seem to look upon as the inadequacy of our proposals with respect to Ireland. I trust, however, they will find that we are not inattentive to Irish wants; while we, at the same time, do the best we can in the way of legislating for the whole of the country, and undoubtedly for Ireland as a part of the country. Our sins, I think, have been made to appear a little worse than they are by the remarks of some hon. Gentlemen. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), for instance, went to the extent of saying that we were abstaining from introducing any measure of importance with respect to Irish matters, and not only were we going to introduce coercive regulations for restricting the rights of minorities—which I hope he will see by the Resolutions is not the case—but that we even declined to take notice of so important, but comparatively minute, a matter as the recommendations of the Committee which inquired into the condition and management of the Public Works Department in Ireland. He made an observation in reference to what was said at an earlier stage of the evening as to its not being our intention to call upon the Chairman of that Board to tender his resignation. I do not wish it to be understood that we undervalue the Report of that Committee upon which the hon. Members for Galway and Wexford gave their assistance. To a certain extent it may throw light on some of the questions which are brought before us with regard to Ireland. At the present time, there is no doubt that the Board of Works in Ireland is very much over-weighted with business. We are seriously considering whether, even for the performance of its present functions, it may not be necessary to strengthen it, and it is possible that proposals may be made which would add to its functions. Hon. Members for Ireland will remember that we are now approaching the time when the Commission on the Irish Church Temporalities has nearly completed the 10 years for which it was originally appointed, and it will very soon become a matter of importance that we should consider what is to be done, both as to the future administration of that large fund, and as to the mode in which it is to be applied. A portion was taken out of that fund last year and was applied to purposes connected with Intermediate Education in Ireland; and, so far as we have yet had an opportunity of watching that experiment, it appears to be working successfully. But it is one of very recent growth, and it requires some little time to watch carefully, and to see how the experiment is likely to succeed. Even after that sum has been taken from the Church surplus a very considerable amount remains to be disposed of, and the mode in which that amount is to be disposed of is a question requiring very deep consideration. I think there is no doubt that there is one object to which a portion of it may be very properly applied; and although I am not at this moment in a position to state exactly how it can be done, I have no doubt that a portion of that fund could be made use of in settling a question of great interest and some difficulty—with regard to the pensions which are to be granted to the teachers in Irish elementary schools. I hope we may be able to make a proposal on that subject which may be of advantage in helping towards a settlement of the question. It is one of great importance to Irish Members, and one to which we have had our attention directed for several years. Whether beyond that any arrangement can be made for the application of the surplus to public objects in Ireland is a matter requiring great consideration; and it is also a matter for consideration how far the strengthening of the Irish Board of Works may be made to bear on any arrangements that may be introduced for dealing with the funds arising from the surplus of the Church temporalities. These are matters which I hope the hon. Member for Galway and others will understand that we are not forgetting, or passing over without consideration. I am not, at the present moment, in a position to make any proposals on the subject; but the matter is receiving our attentive consideration. There are other measures besides those relating to Ireland, which have been adverted to, and with some of which we hope to be able to deal; but I will not at present say more with reference to measures relating to that country. The hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) has put to me a question with regard to legislation affecting merchant seamen, a subject to which he has always paid great attention. There is a measure bearing upon that subject among those to which I have referred, and I hope it may be possible to make a proposal dealing with it. It is a subject of great difficulty, and it has not been placed in front because I am not able to say how far we may be able to get on with other measures. I confess I have heard something to-night from another hon. Member which has a little alarmed me, even as to getting through with the measures we have mentioned—I allude to the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James)—who has told us that a number of questions may be raised on the Criminal Code Bill. His warnings, however, have been given in a most courteous manner, and, I am sure, in a very friendly spirit. I will not take note now of what has been said about Scotch measures, although the hon. and gallant Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour) seems to think it rather hard on Scotland that, because she is a well-governed and peaceful country, she should not have her share of legislation. No doubt we are anxious that that should not be the case; but I may suggest to him that it is, perhaps, because the Scotch are a peaceful and well-governed population that they need legislation rather less than any other part of the country. Be that, however, as it may, I hope it will be found that Scotch interests have not been omitted from our consideration. I now pass from domestic questions, merely observing that I disclaim the extraordinary construction which has been put by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) on some words which fell from me when he said I attributed the distress to the frost. The observation which I really made was to the effect that the cessation of the frost might have led to a certain diminution of the suffering which unhappily prevailed. I pass from these domestic matters, and wish to notice one or two questions which bear on matters of foreign policy. The hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) asked a question about extradition. There is no difficulty about the United States; but the question is one which is under the serious consideration of the Government. A good many questions have been asked about Cyprus. Amongst others, it has been asked when the Cyprus Budget was to be brought forward. I used the phrase "Cyprus Budget," not in the sense of a Budget that we were to bring forward and submit to special discussion in this House. What I said was that when the statement of the revenue and expenditure of Cyprus was laid before the House hon. Members would see, I hope, a satisfactory result. I hope we shall soon be in a position to lay a good deal of information before the House with respect to Cyprus; and most assuredly there will be no indisposition to lay all the information that can properly be laid before it. The hon. Member for Frome (Mr. H. Samuelson) has given Notice of a number of Motions for Returns respecting Cyprus, and I think there will be no difficulty in giving a part of what he asks for. But with regard to the Motion as to the Commissioner, and the state of government in the Island, I think it better that we should be allowed to present that information in as convenient a way as we can. We have heard a great deal about legal questions, and, as a layman, I must confess I have been a good deal puzzled by the observations that have been made. So far as I can recollect, there was a complaint made by an hon. and learned Gentleman that barristers and lawyers were not allowed to practise in the Courts in Cyprus. Now, I may observe, as a matter of fact, that the administration of justice in Cyprus, though a little irregular, is remarkably satisfactory in its results. There is very little crime, while there is no great difficulty in procuring justice in civil cases. I do not know that the difficulties of the lawyers are so very serious; but, at any rate, we are anxious to remove whatever irregularities may exist. Certainly, it is satisfactory to think that in an Island where there has been a great deal of corruption so great a reform has been instituted in so short a time, that crime has much decreased, and that, so far as corruption among high authorities goes, it is almost unknown. We may be tolerably satisfied with the general progress of the Island. With regard to the Capitulations, I think a great deal more is made of that point than is needed, and difficulties have been somewhat conjured up on the subject. No doubt there are inconveniences and questions which have to be considered; but there have been no difficulties between us and foreign Governments. There have been communications with these Governments; but the real point is, the Capitulations were introduced because of the extremely bad administration of justice under the Turkish system, and it was found necessary for foreign Powers to guard themselves against the consequences of the bad administration of justice. But the bad administration of justice having ceased, the Capitulations will naturally fall to the ground. I have no doubt that the difficulties conjured up will prove to be much of the same shadowy character as the difficulty mentioned just now, arising from the fact that English subjects have no appeal to the Turkish Court at Rhodes from the English Court at Cyprus. The noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) put a question to me with regard to a subject upon which reports have appeared—the proposal, namely, for a joint occupation of Roumelia after the Russian troops have been withdrawn. The state of the case is this—that during the Congress of Berlin the idea was put forward that in case any disaster should arise after the Russian occupation it should be remedied by a joint occupation. Austria and England approved of it, but Russia opposed it, and the other Powers expressed no opinion, and no decision was arrived at. The subject was mentioned in confidential communications between the other Powers; but it has not advanced beyond the point at which it was left in Berlin. We have not heard much of it lately; and it is believed that it is a subject which the Porte does not look with any favour upon; and the other Powers look with indifference upon it. With regard to Greece, I do not know if there is much to be said at the present moment. The proceedings with regard to Greece are founded on the recommendations of the Congress, and negotiations are proceeding. I think there has been some misapprehension in stating that they were broken off. They are still going on, but I am not in a position to say anything about their progress. With regard to the remaining question of India and Afghanistan, the noble Lord asked when we should be in a position to make a statement as to the views of the Government with regard to the final settlement of that question. I had hoped that we should by now have been in a position to make a statement, but we must wait for a short time. I hope we shall soon be in a position to make that statement. We have obtained the point we wished to obtain; but the disappearance of Shere Ali has rendered it difficult to find the means of treating with any authority in Afghanistan. Still, I do not think that that will prevent us from making a satisfactory settlement. The House must not run away with the idea that there are great advances and annexations in contemplation. The hon. and gallant General (Sir George Balfour) asks for some information with regard to the Revenues of India and the effect that this expenditure will have on them. That is a very natural question for him to ask. At present I cannot give anything like an Indian Budget; but in the course of a few weeks—indeed, in less than a fortnight—I think we may expect to have a Financial Statement made by the Finance Minister of India, and we shall then know in what precise condition the Revenues of India stand. But a communication has been made to us of a general character with regard to the expense which has been occasioned by the military operations, and also with regard to the degree in which the financial position of India is likely to be affected by that very remarkable circumstance, the depreciation of the silver currency, which, by affecting the rate of exchange, does add £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 a-year to the cost of the Administration. And under these circumstances, the Government of India have intimated to us that they are desirous of making a proposal that the Imperial Treasury should come to the assistance of India by advancing a loan not exceeding £2,000,000 for a certain number of years without interest. I may mention, in anticipation of the statement to be made by the Finance Minister of India in the course of a week or two, that the loan will not be made in the present financial year, but in 1879-80; and that measure is one which, if it can be taken in a manner beneficial to India, Her Majesty's Government will submit with great confidence to the House of Commons. There is a general expression of opinion among Indian authorities that India ought to bear, and can bear ultimately, all the expenses of these hostilities; and there is no desire on the part of India to ask for or accept aid, except in the way I have mentioned, which will be of very considerable advantage and assistance to her. I have taken this opportunity of stating informally the proposal I shall, in due time, make to the House. I will only add that I hope the spirit which has prevailed in the House during this discussion is to be taken as an indication of the spirit in which we shall be able to conduct the Business of the Session. It is perfectly inevitable that there should be great differences of opinion as to the course we propose to take, and we cannot expect our measures not to be warmly and fully debated; but I feel perfectly convinced that hon. Members will best do their duty to those whom they represent by fair, and open, and reasonable discussion, and by meeting in a corresponding spirit the efforts we shall make to promote the convenience of the House. We, on our part, will do our best to bring forward our measures in such a way as to give the House the best opportunity for discussing them.

MR. SHAW LEFÈVRE said, he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman that he not answered his question about the purchase clauses of the Irish Land Act.

MR. W. E. FORSTER remarked that the question of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had not been answered, as to taking possession of the Khurrum Valley.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY also reminded the right hon. Gentleman of the Catholic University Question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER remarked that there were many cases in which it was understood that when communications and requests were made and no answer was given, the matter could not at the present time be answered. He was not prepared to make any proposition, or to intimate, on the part of the Government, that they had any proposal to make in regard to two of the subjects mentioned. They deserved the most serious consideration; but he thought he had sufficiently intimated that the Government had no proposals to make at the present time. They had no proposals to make as to the Irish Land Clauses. They did not undervalue the recommendations of the Committee; but although he might say, speaking for himself, that there were recommendations which he could not accept or agree to, he was not prepared to say that there were not clauses to which the attention of the Government had been directed, but they had not at present any proposal to make. With respect to the Khurram district, he hoped, before long, to be able to state what were the proposals of the Government and the contemplated arrangements in regard to the Afghan Frontier.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that Irish Members were placed in the most difficult possible position, for the reason that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in the most pleasant manner, last December, promised that there were many messages of peace for Ireland in preparation. However, the only mention of Ireland in the speech was the Grand Jury Question. There was not only no reference to the University Question, but no reference to the great Question in which the Irish people were deeply interested—the Land Question. As to the University Question, they were told that many Bills were in the hands of the draftsman; and that such difficulties were found with them that no University Bill could be entertained. The leading papers of England had been led to believe that the Government were doing something, and yet it came on hon. Members by surprise that no reference whatsoever was made to the subject. There had been little time for consultation, but short as the time was, he had written out an Amendment which he would offer as a protest against nothing being done in the matter. He would move an Amendment to the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair the following words:—

“That the omission of all reference to legislation on the questions of Reform in the Land

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Laws and of the University Education of Ireland, both in the Queen's Speech and in the Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer this evening, is calculated to produce great discontent in Ireland, and is an ill return for the increased burthens which the warlike policy of the Government is calculated to entail on the Irish as well as on the British people.”

MR. O'CONNOR POWER seconded the Amendment. Until the question of University Education was dealt with to the satisfaction of the Catholics of Ireland, there could be no religious equality in that country similar to that enjoyed by their Protestant fellow-countrymen. He had indulged the hope that when the question of religious education was disposed of they would be able to take up the larger question of Primary Education in Ireland, and deal with the whole subject without taking note of religious differences, and in that way doing a great benefit to the country. What the Government proposed in the shape of legislation for Ireland was simply to take away a Grand Jury system distasteful to the people of Ireland, and give them one in all respects equally objectionable. Such tinkering legislation could not be accepted. That was the whole sum and substance of what Ministers proposed to do with regard to Ireland. The Irish people would ask themselves whether it was worth while to send 103 Irish Members over to London year after year for so small a boon. He denied the Constitutional right of that House to legislate for Ireland. He maintained that the English Parliament was neither willing nor able to legislate for Ireland, and that he was justified in repudiating the control which that House exercised over Irish affairs.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “the omission of all reference to legislation on the questions of Reform in the Land Laws and of the University Education of Ireland, both in the Queen's Speech and in the Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer this evening, is calculated to produce great discontent in Ireland, and is an ill return for the increased burthens which the warlike policy of the Government is calculated to entail on the Irish as well as on the British people,”—(Major Nolan),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

MR. P. MARTIN said, the people of Ireland were dissatisfied at the manner in which they were treated. Hopes were continually being held out, to be followed by disappointment. University Education had been for years the primary grievance of Ireland. He charged the Government with having, through the newspapers under their control, circulated the report that they intended dealing in a satisfactory manner with the Irish University Question, and then withdrawing from what they had professed their anxiety to carry through Parliament. Lately the Law Adviser of the Government, attending a meeting of an Orange Lodge, to celebrate the return of Conservative Members, heard it stated that it was a gross calumny and slander on the Government to suppose for one moment that they had any intention of dealing with this University Question. It might be said that the Roman Catholic Prelates of Ireland had made demands which the Government could not concede; but those Prelates represented not merely the feelings and wishes of their flocks in that matter, but also those of all the educated and fair-minded Protestants in every part of that country. When the English Conservatives had adopted denominational education for England, why were they not to have it for Ireland? If Ireland had been a dependent Colony of the Crown, she would, like our other Colonies, have had endowed Catholic Colleges. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had enumerated some 15 Bills which the Government were to bring forward, and out of the whole number there was only one for Ireland, and that was a Bill which they had indignantly rejected last year. The people of Ireland asked for bread; but they found that they only received in response stones. He believed that the course the Government was pursuing would, day by day, render them more unpopular with all classes in Ireland. Anxious though he was to facilitate Business, he would tell the Government that they would hear more of this question of University Education in Ireland, as the Irish Members, in justice to their constituents, would take care that it should on every possible opportunity be continuously, steadily, and persistently pressed upon the attention of the House. The Land Code, too, was a subject which the Irish people demanded to have considered, and he maintained that at a time of great distress in Ireland, when the pressure of taxation was so severe, it was the duty of Conservative statesmen to speak some consoling words to people who experienced so much suffering. It was, also, a great mistake on the part of Her Majesty's Government to suppose that the question of the Board of Works was a mere Departmental one. On the contrary, it was one of the greatest possible importance, as all works of public improvement were rendered impossible on account of the confused and complicated character of the code which that Board had to administer. He warned the Government that they were trifling with the Irish people by dealing as they had done with these questions of University Education and Land Reform. If the Government fancied they could get rid of the Irish Members by mere mocking phrases they would find they were entirely mistaken. If such conduct were persevered in, they would find the people rise at the back of the Irish Members, and show the Government the necessity of being as alert in remedial measures for Ireland as they were upon the Bills promised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he differed with his hon. Friends who thought the Government wanted to hoodwink the Irish people on the question of University Education. For his own part, he viewed the matter in a very different light, and he believed that the right hon. Gentleman who led that House and a large majority of the Members of the Government were actuated by a sincere desire to give them such a measure as would be acceptable to the Irish people, and, at the same time, confer upon themselves a great amount of popularity. He believed that under the circumstances the mot d'ordre had been given to the different papers in the interest of the Government, and that the leading journal had accordingly written those inspired articles which, no doubt, every hon. Gentleman in that House had read within the past fortnight. The change of tone on the part of that journal was unusually sudden. From holding out the greatest possible hopes upon the question of Education for Ireland, The Times had suddenly turned round, and then every man at all conversant with public affairs asked himself what had created this bouleversement. He himself did not profess to very acute political knowledge; but he had asked several persons in town, and they had told him that in this proud England there was an Imperium in Imperio. At present Lancashire ruled the British Empire in the Cabinet as well as outside it—it was considered a little Principality, beautiful in its political construction, which enabled the Tories to rule in England as well as elsewhere. As a consequence, the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman opposite and of the noble and learned Lord who introduced the Intermediate Education Act last year were set aside, because certain Lancastrians said to the Government—"Ye shall not concede to these Irish Catholics what we Evangelicals of Lancashire tell ye ye shall not give." They represented that if such a concession were made, it would be all up with Conservatives in Lancashire at the coming Election. This was the reason why the wishes of 4,000,000 Catholics in Ireland had been disregarded. He considered such a result, arising from such a cause, pitiable; and it was sad to see the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, contrary to his own inclinations, rendered dumb upon this question. Were this Governmental change of front owing to the action of the Irish Orangemen, which he did not believe, he could understand the situation. The Government might say—"They supported us in our time of deep despondency, and we shall not forget them now." This he could understand. The ancient opponents of Irish rights had triumphed.

"Our tyrants then,
Were still at least our countrymen."

But he felt it a degradation that Ireland should be sacrificed to the intolerance of a single English county. He supposed his hon. and gallant Friend, not having given Notice of his Motion, had merely proposed it to create that most necessary discussion.

MR. O'CLERY said, the idea which had prevailed during the last 10 days that the measure on University Education had collapsed because of the impracticable pretensions of the Irish Catholic Bishops was a fallacy. On the contrary, they earnestly desired a settlement of the question. He believed the Ministry were really deterred from bringing forward a measure by the representations of a section of the Irish Conservative Members. In his judgment, this was a mistake on the part of the Government, who ought to remember the support they received from the Irish National Representatives last year on the Intermediate Education Question. Beyond that, so far as the Irish Roman Catholic Members were concerned, he could appeal to the Government to say if they had not, during the five years the Government was in power, supported them in every proposition for denominational education, even against the English Liberals.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he was sure that the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had moved the Amendment (Major Nolan), did so merely as a means of raising a discussion, and could not seriously mean in that attenuated state of the House to anticipate any decision which the House would have other opportunities of coming to on various Irish questions. The Government had been charged with entirely neglecting the interests of Ireland, and the hon. and gallant Member had by anticipation denounced one important measure which the Government intended to introduce—namely, that relating to Grand Juries; and it had been alleged that the measure brought in last year had been rejected by the Representatives of Ireland. He failed to remember any occasion on which it was so rejected. The fact was that many hon. Members expressed a preference for going on with another measure which it was known the Government had prepared. That other measure—the Intermediate Education Bill—was in due course introduced and carried, and it was admitted that it deserved the thanks of the people of Ireland. He would not place himself out of Order by attempting to give any outline of the Grand Jury Bill. If they were to discuss at that early period every one of the nine measures forshadowed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as well as the other measures which might be brought in, a great deal of time would be wasted. But it was not so much sins of commission as sins of omission that the Government were charged with. They were told that they were trifling with the most cherished opinions of the

Sir Patrick O'Brien

Irish nation. ["Hear, hear!" from Irish Members.] One hon. and learned Gentleman had charged the Government with having suborned the Press and having inspired articles in the newspapers—

MAJOR O'GORMAN: Hear, hear! so they have.

MR. P. MARTIN said, he had never stated that the Government had suborned the Press. What he did say was that the gentlemen of the Press seemed to anticipate what the Government were about to do from time to time, and it was not met by any denial from the Government.

MR. J. LOWTHER most distinctly begged to say that no article in any newspaper had been in any way inspired by Her Majesty's Government, nor did they accept the slightest responsibility for any opinions expressed by the Fourth Estate of the Realm. While freely alluding to the English Press, no reference had been made by hon. Gentlemen to any organs of opinion in the Sister Island. He did not wish to follow up the matter by asking the reasons for that omission, which, however, was very marked, and seemed to call for some explanation. If that subject was to be further dwelt upon, the House would consider that before approaching a question of gravity like University Education in Ireland the Government should have some assurance that measures likely to commend themselves to the judgment of Parliament would also command the confidence of the people for whom they were intended. Some remarks had been made on certain observations of his own on a recent occasion at the Mansion House in Dublin to the effect that the days had gone by when this question should be tossed from Party to Party like a mere shuttlecock. What he had said was that the question of Intermediate Education had proved one thing sufficiently—namely, that such a subject as Education would never be adequately dealt with until Party spirit was laid aside. That Act was no Party measure, but was carried with the general concurrence of all Parties, with the exception of a very small minority; and he intimated that if ever a time came when the other branches of the Education Question could be satisfactorily settled it would be in some similar lull of Party strife. To that opinion he adhered. He knew certain hon. Members regretted that Ministers had come to that decision, and that some people would perhaps like to see the fortunes of an Administration commanding a large majority in the House shipwrecked on this Question; but they could hardly complain if those responsible for the conduct and policy of the Government did not see matters precisely in the same light. Then it was said that the great Land Question of Ireland had been wholly excluded. The views of the Government might not commend themselves to all parties interested; but it was the duty of the Government to consider carefully the line which they should adopt with regard to every question. The hon. Gentleman who had alluded to the subject of land had only touched one portion of the question—a question which in its breadth might be described as consisting of proposals for removing a certain commodity called land from the persons to whom it belonged to other persons to whom it did not belong. The suggestions made by the Committee over which the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had presided, and which dealt only with a distinct and very limited portion of what was known generally as the Land Question, had not escaped attention; but while there were, no doubt, matters to be commended to the attention of Parliament, he could hold out no hopes that the Government would be prepared to deal with the subject in the comprehensive manner which the hon. Member for Reading urged upon the Committee. At the same time, he was not without hope that on that subject they would be able to make some reasonable suggestions which would meet with the approval of Parliament. Reference had been made to the question of the re-construction of the Board of Works. That Board was entirely under the control of the Treasury, and he was informed by his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury that a scheme relating to that body had been under the consideration of his Department, and that in due time it would be submitted to the House. He hoped that the hon. and gallant Member who had brought the Amendment forward would not attempt by pressing it to a division to obtain a snap vote, after the statement which had been made showing that the interests of Ireland were not being neglected.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : I do not intend, Sir, on this occasion to discuss the views which have just been expressed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. Lowther) upon what he calls the great Irish Land Question, or I should be inclined to doubt whether, holding the position he does, it is altogether a judicious observation on his part to describe in a mass all the schemes which have been proposed for dealing with the Land Question as schemes for depriving one set of people of their property for the purpose of transferring it to another set of people. When the right hon. Gentleman recollects that some of these proposals to which he is, I believe, opposed, are approved by many of the Members from the North of Ireland—Gentlemen who generally support the Government—I think he may find reason to doubt whether he has used an altogether judicious expression. At all events, the principal measure to which this statement refers is that which has been under the consideration of a Committee of this House. No doubt, the principle of that measure is the transfer of property from one set of holders to another; but still I do not think there is any objection to the recommendation of the Committee, because the transfer will only take place upon just and equitable principles, as fair and advantageous to one party as another. I do not, however, rise to reply to the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman. My object is to explain the reasons which will influence me in the vote I am about to give, if the Amendment is pressed to a division. I am very far from denying that the Members for Ireland may not have very considerable reason to complain of the statement made by the Government. Still, I think there are very grave objections to the passing of any Amendment such as has been proposed by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Major Nolan). My hon. Friend the Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien) has stated, as one of these reasons, that it is inconvenient that we should be called upon at a moment's notice to vote a Resolution of this kind. I quite admit the force of the argument that has been used—that until the statement of the right hon. Gentleman had been made it was impossible to know what Irish subjects were going to be dealt with. But when the right hon. Gentleman read a list of measures to be dealt with it was perfectly well known that neither the Irish University Question nor the Land Question were intended to be handled by the Government in the present Session. I think, therefore, it was due to the House that the earliest possible Notice should have been given of this Amendment, and that when the House was more full than at present. Hon. Members should have been informed that there would be this opposition and division. But besides this objection, there are others which have not yet been referred to. I think this House ought to be very careful in assenting to Resolutions of this kind, and ought to be sure that they are in conformity with the general spirit of its proceedings. Now, I believe it would be a proceeding nearly, if not altogether, unprecedented to vote a Resolution which is founded not upon a Bill, nor upon Papers before the House, but merely upon a verbal statement made by a Minister. As far as I could catch the words of the Resolution read from the Chair, it also appears to me to be open to objection of another kind. I do not think it is usual, and I think it would be hardly dignified for the House to state that a certain thing is an ill return for the services and sacrifices which the Irish people are called upon to make. In fact, in my opinion, Resolutions of this kind ought to be much more carefully prepared and much more fully considered than there has been any opportunity for doing upon this occasion. However, as I have said, I do not wish to deny that Irish Members have some considerable ground for complaint. I have already referred to the matter of Irish University Education, so that I need not say any more on that subject. It certainly is unfortunate that among all the subjects for legislation at their disposal the Government should only have a Grand Jury Bill to offer to Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland said he had no reason to know that the measure would be rejected by the majority of the Irish Members because they had not had the opportunity of considering it; but there was a feeling showing that the lines upon which it was formed were not such as were calculated to give satisfaction to a very large number of Irish Members. Besides, there is something in the past history of these Bills which is not calculated to inspire confidence. An Irish Grand Jury Bill has been promised, and generally introduced, in almost every Session of Parliament since I can recollect, but they have very seldom made much progress; and I cannot very much wonder that Irish Members should consider that the Bill is introduced very much as a matter of form, and is intended to share the fate of all its predecessors. Another part of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is also, I think, open to objection. I understood him to say that though there was only this legislation to be offered to Ireland this year the Government had it in contemplation, at some future time, to devote some part of the Irish Church surplus to the payment of the pensions of the Irish School Teachers. I do not think that is a very judicious proceeding on the part of the Government. If the Government has measures to propose, by all means let them bring them forward; but I hardly think it is fair to treat the Irish people in this way. To hold out these promises as bribes for good conduct on their part, and to tell the Irish Members that if they behave well they will, at some indefinite period, be indulged with another slice of the Irish Church surplus. That does not appear to me to be a dignified mode of treating the question, and I regret that the sop should have been held out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. At the same time, while I sympathize with the complaints of the Members from Ireland, it is quite impossible for me, for the reasons I have stated, to support the Resolution.

MR. MELDON said, he wished to make but one observation with reference to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that night, and the one with which he favoured them at Dublin recently. Upon the good taste of the latter speech he did not intend to comment. It had, however, made a great impression upon large numbers of the people of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman told them that the Government, while admitting the importance of the University Question, did not think it right and proper to introduce any measure on the subject, because it would be made a Party question. He had also read a speech of the noble Lord who had just sat down (the Marquess of Hartington) at Liverpool, and it had given him intense satisfaction. That feeling he knew was shared by a great many people in Ireland, and it was due to the fact that the noble Lord declared he did not disapprove of the Government introducing a measure on this question of Irish Education, and that he, for one, would not offer any factious opposition to it, or oppose it in any Party spirit, if the measure were such as had been suggested. He read that speech with great satisfaction, and he hoped that he had interpreted its meaning fairly. If the Chief Secretary for Ireland had also read that speech, he (Mr. Meldons) did not understand how he could have made the announcement that he had done. He must say, however—and he said it with deep pain—that there was an impression abroad in Ireland that since the right hon. Gentleman had been appointed a policy of exasperation had been initiated and carried out, and that he was the adviser of it. His predecessor did not do much for them; but he showed his desire for conciliation, as far as his Party would let him do so. ["No, no!"] He was speaking his own opinion. But, on the other hand, it could not be denied that for some months past there had been a policy of exasperation tried in Ireland. It should be clearly understood, also, that they had not taken action in this matter without notice. They had not raised a debate on the principle of Land Reform, or of the establishment of a University; but they did say that it was the duty of the Government, after the speech of the noble Lord at Liverpool, to have made some proposal to the House on these two subjects.

MR. GRAY said, the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) opposed the Amendment because sufficient Notice of it had not been given, and because it was unusual to base an Amendment upon a mere verbal statement. But he would remind the House that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Major Nolan) gave Notice of his Amendment immediately after it had been elicited from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the Government were not going to deal with the question of University Education. As to the second point; because the Government had taken the unusual course of not making their statement of domestic policy in the form of an Address from the Crown, they were to be debarred from their Constitutional right to move an Amendment. For his part, he thought the responsibility for this Amendment should be fairly put on the right shoulders, and those shoulders were not on his side of the House. His hon. Friend gave as early a Notice as was practicable, and, therefore, the fault that it was not earlier and more formally before the House was not his; and, in his opinion, his Party was justified in proceeding to a division. There might, of course, be a difference of opinion as to the wisdom of moving such an Amendment, with so many Irish Members absent; but now that it had been moved it would be puerile to withdraw it, and therefore he hoped it would be pressed to a division. As to the general question, he thought the Irish Party were punished in a way that they deserved for their conduct at the opening of the Session. The Irish Party was a small one, and it could only make itself respected, and its influence felt, by strict organization. They appeared, on the contrary, to be utterly disorganized. The Government and the Government organs were now studiously formulating the idea that the Irish Party, which at one time was formidable, was now broken up, and no longer formidable to anybody. The Government assumed that statement to be true, and treated Irish Members according to the strength which they now imagined them to possess. He and his Friends would take that lesson to heart. They would remember the contemptuous manner in which the Irish nation had been treated, and Her Majesty's Government would by-and-bye find that the Irish Party was not so weak and powerless as they thought. They were promised a Grand Jury Bill, which the majority of the Irish Members had already rejected, for they were told that the measure was not materially changed from that of last year, and they were also to be treated to a series of Resolutions calculated to curtail the rights and powers of minorities. That was the Ministerial programme as regarded Ireland. It would create considerable exasperation in that country, and he was certain the Irish Members were only expressing that feeling in the Resolution which had just been moved. He thought the Government would have done far better if it had attempted to settle the question upon which the hearts of the Irish people were bent, instead of proposing a series of gagging Resolutions; but he, for one, was not afraid to face the issue, and they would soon see which would get the better of it.

MR. PARNELL said, if he spoke candidly he hoped it would not be thought he spoke unwisely, at any rate from his own point of view. It was now almost a matter of history with the Irish Party that concessions were not to be won from any English Government by a policy of conciliation. At the beginning of the Session, when a question of the utmost importance was occupying the attention of Parliament and the Empire, many of the people of Ireland desired that their Representatives should bring before the House this question of Irish Education, and other kindred subjects. That desire was over-ruled, for it was represented to them that such a course would excite exasperation, and that the feelings of Members would be so influenced by it that a settlement of the University Question would be postponed, or perhaps prevented altogether. Under these circumstances, the Irish Members forebore to press their grievances. He was one of those who thought that that time was a fitting time for them to explain their grievances, and by showing their own belief in them to impress the House with their reality. They were overborne, however, and when the attention of the Government was directed to the omission of all reference to Irish affairs, the Home Secretary held out hopes that there might be some measures in store for Ireland. His hopes were not unduly excited; but some hon. Members did think that at last there was some hope of an English Government being honest, and doing justice to Ireland. But again the stern lesson had been taught them; again they had believed in the honour and justice of an English Government, and again they, once more, found themselves deceived. ["Order!"] He said, in beginning, that he meant to be candid, and he hoped his candour would not injure any great principle or any great cause. If the Government had deliberately chosen to play into his hands, and to advance the designs that they had chosen from time to time to attribute to him, they could not have chosen a better way. He must not be told that the articles in The Times were not inspired, and were not put out as feelers to ascertain how far the Government might go. It had now come to this—that the Irish Representatives must make up their minds how they were going to deal with Irish questions, and how they were going to show that great Assembly that they felt the importance of these questions from the bottom of their hearts. When they had done that, and not till then, the first step would have been taken in the settlement of these questions.

Mr. Gray

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, he was sincerely glad at everything that had taken place that night. He was delighted beyond anything he could express that the Government had treated these great Irish questions in the way they had done. Nothing more rejoiced his heart than to find that the English Government were still doing as they had done for centuries, and still continued to trample on the Irish people. Nothing, also, more rejoiced his heart than to feel for the Government—as he was sure every Irishman should, and did feel—the utmost hatred and contempt.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 72; Noes 25: Majority 47.—(Div. List, No. 3.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. DILLWYN said, before the Speaker left the Chair, he thought they ought to have some further information on the Corrupt Practices Bill. It was an important measure, which had been before the House a great many years, and in view of the coming Election it should certainly be dealt with this year. The Government had distinctly pledged themselves to bring forward the Bill early in the Session. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Notice of the question has not been given.] Then he would bring the matter forward again on Monday. There was one other matter. He understood that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was about to propose a loan of £2,000,000 to the Indian Government without interest for two years.

He did not propose to discuss the matter now; but the Government would be misleading the House and the country, as they had often done before, and would be misleading the people of India also, if they were to say that they ever expected this money to be repaid. They had much better propose to give the money to India at once, for he knew it would be useless to expect that it would ever be repaid.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

BANKERS' BOOKS (EVIDENCE) BILL.

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Herschell, Sir Charles Mills, Mr. Rodwell.)

[BILL 65.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to amend and extend an Act passed a few Sessions ago, which had been found to work well as far as it went. By that measure, solicitors were allowed to use copies of bankers' books in certain cases instead of the books themselves. In the present measure, it was proposed to allow bankers to send certified copies instead of the actual books, unless the bank was itself interested, or a Judge considered that the case was one in which the books themselves should be produced. Of course, this would be a convenience to bankers; but bankers only required their books for the convenience of their customers, and if the books were taken away it was really the public who were the sufferers. Again, it saved time and trouble in Court to have a handy account which could be passed easily about, instead of a ponderous folio. He believed, therefore, that the Bill would be found to be for the general convenience. The hon. Baronet concluded by moving the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir John Holker) said, he approved of the principle of this Bill, and as the former Act had not been found to work well he thought the best way was, as proposed, to repeal it, and substitute another. Generally speaking, bankers and bankers' clerks were called to prove the receipt and payment of certain sums of money, and as they could only do so by referring to their books it seemed to him very reasonable that they should be saved the inconvenience of having their books brought into Court. There was an omission in the Bill, however, which required rectification. There was no provision for giving notice to the other side that a party intended to avail himself of the Act, and that was only fair, in order that the other side might, if they chose, call the witness themselves. There was an indication in the 8th clause that some such proposal was intended, and if the hon. Baronet approved the suggestion the alteration could easily be made in Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS BILL.

(Dr. Cameron, Mr. Clare Read, Mr. Ashley, Sir Henry Jackson, Mr. Edward Jenkins, Mr. William Holms, Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

[BILL 47.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

DR. CAMERON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that as first introduced it would be remembered that it was of a much wider scope; but it had afterwards been decided to cut it down, and limit its operation to the persons who were prepared voluntarily to submit themselves to its provisions. It had been proved to the Committee on the subject that on this basis a vast number of cases could be treated, and a great deal of good might result. In that modified form he had last year secured for the Bill the support of the House on the second reading, and in the course of the debate some 20 Members took part, every single speech being in support of the Bill in its present shape, and the second reading of the Bill being passed nem. con. On the present occasion, his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) had given Notice of his intention to oppose the Bill. He understood that he would not object to the Bill if it applied to public institutions only. If his hon. Friend thought the matter was so important as to demand the expenditure of public funds on public institutions, he went further than the Bill now proposed. He understood that his hon. Friend entertained a strong dislike to private lunatic asylums, and thought that this Bill would establish a number of institutions of a somewhat analogous character. In his opinion, there was not the slightest analogy between the two. A lunatic was committed to an asylum on the certificate of two medical men. He was sent there for an indefinite period, and while there any complaint made by him was treated as the raving of a lunatic, and any witnesses he might bring would be considered in the same way. The principle of the Bill was entirely different to this. A person could be liberated by order of the Inspector appointed under the Bill, or by order of any County Court, and at the very worst he was bound to be liberated at the end of 12 months. Then, if he felt himself aggrieved, the patient would be entitled to an action for damages. He thought his hon. Friend was, therefore, altogether mistaking in imagining that there was any real analogy between the institutions suggested in his Bill and private lunatic asylums. The hon. Member concluded by moving the second reading.

The Attorney General

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Cameron.)

MR. DILLWYN: The only reason I have for objecting to the Bill is that it appears to contemplate a violation of the liberty of the subject.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 14th February, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Intemperance, appointed and nominated,

AFGHANISTAN—THE RUSSIAN MISSION AT CABUL.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: Your Lordships must have thought me, during the observations with which I troubled you last night, of a somewhat inquiring turn of mind. I asked many Questions of Her Majesty's Government, none of which—as sometimes happens to me—were answered. I remember that Lord Lansdowne (the third Marquess) was much amused by an Irish Peer, after asking a witness a question in a Committee, telling him that he asked the question because he knew what the answer would be. I have no idea how some of the Questions which I asked yesterday might be answered, and probably Her Majesty's Government are in the same predicament; but there is one Question which related to a matter of fact, which I take the liberty to repeat. Your Lordships will remember that in the despatch of the Secretary of State for India describing the policy of the war in Afghanistan the objects were stated to be that that country should be "strong, friendly, and independent." Yesterday, the First Lord of the Treasury described the results of the war, and he interrupted me while I was speaking—as he had a perfect right to do—and said he had not used the words "strong" and "friendly"—which I admit it would have been impossible for him to say—but "independent" and "self-governed." I asked for further information as to how this desirable end was to be obtained, and also asked whether there had been any communications with the Russian Government on the subject; and, if so, whether with any result, and if that result could be communicated to Parliament without inconvenience to the Public Service? It will not be thought unreasonable if I now repeat the Question.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There are some communications which are now in the hands of the printer; but which, I hope, will be in your Lordships' hands before long. I am afraid I did not hear all the Questions which the noble Earl put; but perhaps he had better wait before discussing the question of communications with Russia on the subject until the Papers have been produced.

EARL GRANVILLE: I am afraid the noble Marquess only entered the House as I was finishing my Question. It is, whether there has been any result to the communications with Russia on the subject of Afghanistan; and, if so, whether he has any objection to communicate it to Parliament? If the noble Marquess thinks there is any objection, I am the last person to press him for an answer.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There were some communications with Russia just about the time Parliament separated for the short Recess. The result of those communications was the withdrawal of the Mission from Cabul. The nature of those communications will be explained by the Papers, which, I hope, will be in the hands of the noble Earl in a day or two.

THE VOLUNTEER FORCE—FINANCE AND ORGANIZATION—REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT BURY: My Lords, I have the honour of laying on the Table the Report of the Committee appointed some time ago by my noble Friend (Viscount Cranbrook), when he was Secretary of State for War; and it is thought desirable that in doing so I should, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, give some short explanation of the circumstances which led to the appointment of the Committee, the course of its procedure, the recommendations they have made, and also the course Her Majesty's Government are prepared to take with regard to those recommendations. I make no apology for troubling your Lordships with these details, because anything which relates to the Volunteer Force of Great Britain is of enormous importance to the country, and of great interest not only to many Members of this House, but to a large body of our countrymen. The Volunteer Force has very much changed its character in the last 20 years, during which it has flourished. Its history, briefly—although I hardly need remind your Lordships of it—is that in 1859, under circumstances which we all remember, the Volunteer Force was established by the authority of the Lords Lieutenant of the counties under the old Act of 1804. In 1862, two or three years after, a Royal Commission was appointed, which advocated the payment of a certain sum to Volunteers by way of assisting them in their expenses. It was not, at that time, thought that the whole of the expenses of the Volunteer Force ought to be borne by the State. The Capitation Grant originated in 1862, and in 1863 the present Volunteer Act was passed. There was a Departmental Committee in 1869-70, in consequence of the recommendations of which certain additions were made to the sum which had been laid down as necessary to be given as a Capitation Grant by the Royal Commission of 1862. In 1871, there was another and a very considerable change in the constitution of the Force. In that year, the Regulation of the Forces Act removed the controlling power from the Lords Lieutenants of counties, in whom it had resided before, leaving only to them the power of recommending for first commissions in the Volunteer Force, and transferring the control to the Crown. In 1873 another, and, perhaps, in its effects a still larger, change took place. The Force had increased greatly in numbers, strength, and efficiency; and the Mobilization Committee appointed to inquire into various military matters, recommended that the Volunteer Force should be amalgamated into the body of the Army. From that time they were considered practically as soldiers, differing only from other soldiers in their terms and conditions of service, which were strictly defined and extremely limited. Those are the principal legislative changes made in the Volunteer system during the 20 years of their existence; but during that time there were also great changes in their personnel, organization, and degree of efficiency. At first, it was not contemplated that the State should pay the whole of the expense. At first—it was not, perhaps, unnatural—the expense of the Force was met partly by local subscriptions, aided by the Capitation Grant. In course of time these local subscriptions, if they did not disappear, have become so diminished that it is obvious if the Capitation Grant, or aid from the State in some form or another be not fixed at a sum sufficient to meet the requirements of the Force, that Force could hardly be held together. Again, under the peculiar circumstances of the Force, at its commencement a great deal of power was left in the hands of individual commanding officers. I will not say that every man did that which was right in his own eyes; but every commanding officer throughout the country had to overcome local difficulties, and to meet local requirements by his own personal influence, and with such means as were available. It was not to be supposed that there could result from that system anything like sufficient homogeneity, if I may so call it, to enable it to dovetail into our other Forces, when, in 1873, the great change was made which converted it into an integral portion of the Army. Under those circumstances, there arose a general belief that the constitution and organization of the Force required revision, and revision outside the Force itself. There was an absence of supervision which, however inevitable, and, perhaps, salutary in the early days of the Force, was no longer desirable; and it became a matter of serious reflection when considered in connection with the future position the Force was to occupy. It is a curious fact that almost every commanding officer I have talked with considers himself to have been placed in an exceptional position. If I asked any commanding officer—and I appeal to the knowledge of all those noble Lords who have at all associated themselves with the Volunteer movement—how he met any particular difficulty, he invariably answered—“My position was exceptional, but this is the way I dealt with it.” Such being the circumstances, it is evident that some alteration was necessary, and that it should be effected by the Government. The then Secretary of State for War, in the beginning of last year, appointed a Committee to look into the condition of the Force. The orders which he gave to that Committee were—

“(1) To inquire into the necessary requirements of the Volunteer Force, and whether they were met by the grant; (2) whether if the grant was not sufficient for the purpose, in what form assistance should be given; (3) whether any alteration in the organization of the Force was necessary; (4) whether increased efficiency was desirable, and, if so, in what direction it should be attempted; (5) whether, if the present system of Capitation Grant was extended, it would, or would not, tend to economical administration.”

Your Lordships will see from these items the full and extensive character of the inquiry; but there were other subjects referred to by the same Committee, relating to important matters, but to which I do not intend even cursorily to direct your Lordships' attention this evening. I will therefore state what the Committee did in carrying out this inquiry. In the first place, they made a most minute investigation into the way in which the money was expended throughout the whole Force. For that purpose they drew up a series of questions addressed to all the officers commanding Volunteer corps, 293 in number. They were required to send in a tabulated statement of every item of expenditure, and they were to do this without reference to whether or not that expenditure was wholly covered by the Capitation Grant. If it were in excess of that grant, they were to state from what source they obtained the difference; at the same time, the Committee sent to each commanding officer a series of questions calculated to elicit from them their opinion as to the requirements of the Force, and the various changes they suggested should be carried out. The answers which came to this demand for information were very full in detail, and the consequence was that, at an early period of their proceedings, the Committee were placed in possession of the most minute details as to every item of expenditure, and also the opinion of every commanding officer as to what changes should be made and their nature. Fortified by these expressions of opinion, the Committee felt itself in a position with advantage to examine witnesses and elicit further information for themselves. They called before them a great many witnesses, some of them Members of this House and of the other House of Parliament. To all of these witnesses they addressed questions extending over a very wide scope, and having for their object the eliciting of opinion as to any great change which was thought to be necessary in the organization of the Force. After these they called before them as witnesses many prominent Volunteers throughout the country—from the Metropolis and from the great towns, from the country districts and also from Scotland. The evidence they obtained has been laid upon your Lordships' Table to-night, and I think it will be said that the evidence is most valuable in its character, and that the inquiry was most searching. Whether the Committee has been successful in framing, upon the information which they then obtained, a scheme at all commensurate with the importance of the subject will be for your Lordships to judge. At any rate, if I may speak in my official capacity, and not for the moment, as a Member of the Committee, I should say that they have taken great pains, that they have been successful in collecting information, and that they have devoted great attention to it. The first point which they thought it right to recommend was that the establishment of the Volunteer Force should be defined. Hitherto there had been no fixed limit, and as many Volunteers were taken as offered themselves; in fact, the Government was only too glad to have them. Now, it has been thought that as there is a tendency in the Force to increase both in numbers and in expense, and as the Force has become part of the Military Forces of the Crown, it was necessary to follow the precedent of all other branches of the Naval and Military Services, and present annually to Parliament a detail of the numbers to be voted in that year. In technical language, to fix the annual Establishment of the Force. The proposition that we made was that the Establishment should be fixed at 250,000; but when that matter came before the consideration of my right hon. and gallant Friend at the head of the War Office, the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge), and others, it was thought that it was too high, and it was eventually determined that the Establishment should be fixed at 200,000 men. The present Establishment is somewhat above that number; but without going into details, I may say that the number of efficient Volunteers this year is 193,000; and thus, in fixing the ultimate Establishment at 200,000, we shall not necessarily diminish the number of efficient Volunteers, though we may alter the distribution of those Volunteers in the regiments, perhaps in the companies. The manner in which that must be carried out must, of course, be left to Departmental regulation. It is not a thing that can be done at once, and it will take a considerable time. There are several points in this Report on which I will not stay to comment now, and I will go straight to that part of it which deals with the constitution and organization of the Force. It is an essential characteristic of volunteering that a man should be allowed to leave on giving 14 days' notice. That is a condition which all Volunteers have hitherto enjoyed; and, as it has been found to work well in practice, the Committee decided that it would not be well to interfere with that regulation. They, however, felt that it would be advisable that some voluntary agreement should be entered into by Volunteers, which should bind them to remain for a certain time and serve for a certain number of years, if the Government would supply them with their clothing. It is obvious, if a considerable sum of money is expended in clothing a man, and he is to be permitted to leave at 14 days' notice, the Government would be at a disadvantage. We found in the evidence that, in many corps, an agreement was entered into between the men and the commanding officer, which was enforceable in the Courts of Law, by which the Volunteer bound himself, in return for his clothing, to serve for a definite number of years, and to keep himself efficient during that time; but that if, during that time, he should exercise his legal option of retiring at 14 days' notice, he should pay a proportionate sum to the cost of his uniform for the benefit of the corps. The Committee did not think it right to recommend to the Government the initiation of such an agreement; but they thought that this matter might be easily dealt with by the regulations of each corps, and that it might be left to the commanding officers. I now pass to the question of the organization and constitution of the Force. Your Lordships will remember that the scheme for the localization of the Army provides for the division of the whole country into a certain number of sub-districts, and that to each sub-district there are attached two regiments of the Line and a regiment of Militia. The localization scheme also provides that the Volunteers shall be an integral portion of the Army; and that, in case of invasion, they should be called up and attached to these sub-districts. The Committee thought a great many advantages would accrue if the Volunteers were at once permanently attached to their sub-district brigade, which would then consist of two linked battalions of Regulars, two of Militia, and two or more of Volunteers, according to their strength. And at this part of my remarks I may anticipate what I shall have to say presently in regard to the clothing, and mention that we propose that the Volunteer Force shall be clothed like the Regular Army. This, coupled with the association with the Regular Army, we consider will have the best effect upon the Volunteer Service. It will also have another effect—it will, I think, add to the social value of a Volunteer commission, when the Volunteer officers find themselves associated in this way with the officers of the Regular Army. It is a very complicated subject, and we found many difficulties in our way. There are a great number of small battalions and small corps scattered throughout the country; and while these exist in an independent and isolated form, due economy is hardly possible. The expense of volunteering (other than that of clothing and arming the Force) is mainly due to the charge for drill-sheds, head-quarters, and head-quarter staff; and unless some means are devised of diminishing that expenditure, a great addition would have to be made to the Capitation Grant, which the Committee have not thought fit to recommend. It would be impossible to obtain due economy of administration in the face of these arrangements; and we therefore propose that, so far as is possible, the recommendation which was made by the Committee of 1869-70 for the consolidation of administrative regiments should be carried into effect; and we do not propose to stop even there, for we further propose that in towns where a large number of small regiments exist—of course, with due respect to, and regard for, existing arrangements—that those regiments should be gradually joined together, and be made into larger ones. This would facilitate the organization with regard to the sub-district, and it would also meet another requirement in the Report of the Localization Committee—namely, that for the formation of provisional battalions. The suggestion is that, in case of necessity, provisional battalions should be formed out of the Volunteers, taking 25 per cent out of each regiment in the district. The Committee felt that, under the present circumstances, that arrangement would hardly be possible. To take 25 out of every 100 men dressed differently, organized differently, and unaccustomed to work together, and who are really and practically dissociated from one another, was a proceeding which the Committee thought would not work well in practice. But if this recommendation that the small battalions shall be consolidated into large battalions is carried out, and if these were to be joined with the sub-district brigades, then it would be quite easy, considering that they were accustomed to work together, to take 25 per cent for the formation of provisional battalions. My Lords, I now turn to the question of discipline, instruction, and efficiency, a branch of the inquiry to which I need not say the Committee devoted a great deal of attention; but on which, as it refers mainly to detail, I will not detain your Lordships at any length. With regard, however, to efficiency, those who have watched the Force will observe the great improvement which has taken place since the Volunteer movement began, when small companies were established which were little more than rifle clubs, and which were controlled by no military regulations. I am bound to say that every application for increased stringency and efficiency has been most cheerfully obeyed. Every time conditions have been imposed as the stipulation on which Government aid should be granted they have been complied with by the Force; and, as in the past, we have found every additional concession was made the occasion for demand of increased efficiency. The Committee thought they could not err by working on the same lines, and when they proposed that some additional Government aid should be granted in a particular direction, that they should demand in return for it increased efficiency. From the whole body of the evidence which I have laid on your Lordship's Table to-night, I think it will be seen that everything which has hitherto been given to the Volunteers has been given with a condition attached to it, and that, in all instances, the condition has been cheerfully fulfilled. While on this branch of the subject, there is one small point to which I may refer, and which, though a matter of detail, is a matter of some importance. We propose a small change in the interest of efficiency in regard to the number of drills required from a recruit on joining the ranks. At present, 30 are required before a man can become efficient; but in the following year he is only required to perform nine, the ordinary number of drills for a Volunteer. Taking into consideration the large number of matters in which a recruit has to be trained, and the short time at his disposal, we were of opinion that to become a fully-trained Volunteer in 30 drills was hardly to be expected. We therefore propose that the obligation to perform 30 drills in the first year should remain as at present, but that the recruit should be called upon to perform a like number in the second year, instead of nine as now. I believe that that requirement will be met with acquiescence, and I can only say, from the evidence which was laid before us, that I do not think this will in many cases entail more service than is given now in practice by Volunteers who join the ranks of some regiments where more stringent regulations are enforced. I now pass to Artillery Volunteers. Among a large body of that Force there is an idea that it would be easy to make a considerable increase in the formation of Field Artillery. We investigated that point, and the Committee came to the conclusion that it was not easy to form Field Artillery with the materials at our command. It is not that the men would find it difficult to learn the drill, the riding, or any individual thing; but Artillery is such a highly-polished arm, and involves such a multiplicity of duties, that it is impossible to suppose that Volunteers, having limited time only at their disposal, could become proficient as flying Artillery, or form a corps like the Army Field Artillery. The Committee, however, came to the conclusion that it would be possible to form Field Artillery with heavy draught horses, on some such basis as has already been seen in operation at Volunteer reviews, and that some extension of the Artillery corps in that direction would serve a useful purpose. With regard, also, to Artillery Volunteers, we find that they had very great difficulties to contend with. They ask for more instruction, which is, of all others, the kind of request least easy to refuse. They said—"We give our time and attention, and we are willing to find everything except money." The same thing applies to the Engineers; and here I should like to say that, in my opinion, the Artillery and Engineer corps have devoted fully as much time and attention as any other branch of the Volunteer Force to the duties imposed upon them, and that they are in every way worthy of encouragement. The Committee have recommended the Government to give some consideration to the claims which they have advanced for increased facilities for instruction, and my right hon. and gallant Friend is inclined to adopt the suggestion all the more willingly that it will not be much additional expense. I come now to "Clothing and Equipment." The Committee went very thoroughly into this matter. The records of our investigation in this direction are very voluminous, and I need not trouble your Lordships with them. It will be sufficient for me to say that we propose that the different regiments of Volunteers shall be clothed, like the corresponding arm in the Regular Service, in the national colour of scarlet; that the clothing shall be supplied out of the Capitation Grant, so as to involve no additional expense to the country. It is true that, theoretically, the Force can now be supplied with clothing out of the Capitation Grant; but in practice that is not so. The Volunteer earns his Capitation Grant in one year, and it is paid in the next—it is, therefore, always in arrear. Articles supplied out of the Government stores must be paid for on application. It is therefore impossible, unless he obtains an advance from his banker, or pays for it himself, that a commanding officer can obtain the clothing from the Government stores. We felt that it was quite impossible that our recommendation should be carried into effect, and the Capitation Grant be made to bear the charge, unless some facilities were given to a corps to avoid their running into debt. We propose, therefore, that the clothing should be supplied on application from the Government Clothing Department, not on the principle of immediate payment, but on the principle of taking 10s. per man per annum till the whole of the debt is paid. The consequence is that in between three and four years a suit of clothing made to wear four years would be paid for by the corps; and if the alteration we have suggested in regard to the four years' service agreement should be carried out, on the one hand, the Government would not suffer, and, on the other hand, the Volunteers will be supplied with clothing on easy terms, and the corps will be very much less liable than hitherto to run into debt. We have found that the present method of clothing the Volunteers is most expensive. The men have been obliged to go to local contractors, who could not hope to be paid for a very considerable time, and who, of course, in consequence added something to their price. We found it to be one of the great reasons for the corps running into debt that they were under the necessity of providing the clothing for their men on such unfortunate terms. I think I have sufficiently indicated the direction of the Committee's recommendations in regard to clothing, and I now pass on to another matter. The main point, my Lords, to which the attention of the Committee was naturally directed, was whether the Capitation Grant was sufficient for the service. Your Lordships will allow me to read a few of the items in which the money of the Volunteers is spent. "Expenses at head-quarters, including the ordinary drills, the care and maintenance of arms, marches out, reviews, repairs of arms, gun and drill practices, payment of the permanent staff, band, refreshments, interest on loans, prizes, and expenses of Artillery training, expenses for national and county associations, payment for loss of time in camp, reading, gymnasium and recreation rooms, allowance for treasurers, quartermasters, &c., &c." I have just named a few of the items to show how vastly divergent are the claims which come on the Volunteers for their money, and how difficult it must be on the comparatively small sum of 30s., or a little over 30s. per annum per head, to keep a regiment quite clear of debt. Generally we found, in the great majority of corps, that the total military expense was in excess of the amount received from the War Office—it was only in a few instances that a corps was supported on what was received from the War Office. It would not be safe to assume that because a few corps kept within the amount of the Capitation Grant that the Capitation Grant was sufficient; nor was it safe to assume the converse of the proposition, and say that because only a few corps kept within the grant, the grant was necessarily insufficient. The Committee, therefore, came to the conclusion that the point could only be decided by a very detailed analysis of the Returns. They, therefore, first proceeded to determine, as a standard for their own guidance, what items of expense were in reality necessary for the efficient maintenance of the corps, and which would, therefore, be properly chargeable against the public; and, secondly, whether the Capitation Grant was sufficient to cover the expenses which thus had been laid down as, in the opinion of the Committee, necessary. This the Committee thought it necessary to do, in order to establish which I may call a standard of comparison; and, keeping that standard in their own minds for their own guidance, they proceeded afresh to analyze the Returns of the expenses before them. When they came to that, they found that a very curious state of things was disclosed. They found that out of 278 corps that sent in the Returns, only 38 of these corps kept their total expenses within the amount of the Capitation Grant; while 240 exceeded the grant. But then a close examination of the figures in the Returns showed that, in a great majority of instances, the excess occurred in items not properly chargeable against the public; only 88 of the corps had exceeded the Capitation Grant in items which could be properly charged against the public; and upon that ground the Committee felt themselves bound to answer the question put to them, as to whether the Capitation Grant was not sufficient for legitimate purposes, and to say that they could not recommend any addition to the Capitation Grant. My Lords, I am perfectly well aware that to a great number of people the decision of the Committee will be a very great disappointment, and I can only thank your Lordships for having allowed me to enter into the details on the matter, because I felt that it was not only your Lordships I was addressing. And I wish to convey to the general body of Volunteers, as well as the public, the fact that the Committee which has been investigating their affairs was not appointed to register a foregone conclusion; but honestly to inquire whether or not the Capitation Grant was sufficient for its purpose, and to decide upon the evidence alone. The War Office felt that they were not in possession of the information which would enable them to satisfactorily settle that point, and the Committee which for 11 months has been sitting inquiring into this matter, has, in the most single-minded way, been directing its attention not to support a foregone conclusion, but to form their own conclusion on evidence brought before them; and therefore, though it may be a disappointment, and probably will be a disappointment, to a large number of Volunteers, to find that the Capitation Grant is not to be increased, and that the Committee have not been able to see their way to recommend that increase—they must remember that there were on that Committee more than one officer of 20 years' Volunteer experience—men who would be much more likely to err in the direction of leniency towards the Volunteer Force than in the way of stringency in refusing the increase which was possibly expected. But though the Committee recommend no increase in the money grant, they find that in practice the Capitation Grant will not be sufficient to keep up a corps, unless great economy is practised in the administration of the various corps. That economy must be attempted in clothing, in head-quarters, in rifle-ranges, and in various other matters. In respect to the matters of clothing and rifle ranges, the real panacea for existing evils, and the real way to reduce the expense and thus help in the due administration of the Capitation Grant with economy, is, I believe, consolidation. There were one or two items of expense—I think there were three items—which the Committee were of opinion could not be well borne out of the present Capitation Grant. But the Committee thought it would be better, as these items were necessary to keep up increased efficiency—to give a separate allowance for those items on condition of increased efficiency on the part of the Volunteers, rather than to add the money on to the Capitation Grant. One of these items was in the matter of camps. The Committee were of opinion—founded on evidence brought before them—the Committee arrived at the opinion that a week in camp was equal to nearly the drill of a year in forming the Volunteers. The men in camp are associated in considerable numbers; they are subjected during a period of some days to military regulation; they are under what practically amounts to military law; in fact, they perform all the duties of soldiers in camp, and learn to do soldiers' work. They are on the spot, and are available for drill at any time, and there is a sort of military atmosphere about the whole proceeding which is extremely essential to their military well-being; and, therefore, taking all these matters into consideration, the Committee are of opinion that if any additional amount was to be given to the Volunteers it ought to be given in the way of encouraging camps among them. The Committee have therefore recommended that view to the Government—subject, of course, to what may be done in the matter in "another place" when the Estimates are presented; and I think I may say that my right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War is prepared to recommend the adoption of the proposal of the Committee in that respect. The proposal is that for every man going into camp 2s. a-day shall be allowed, besides certain small travelling allowances. What the aggregate cost of this proposal will be it is impossible to tell until it actually comes into operation; for we cannot tell how many men will take advantage of the concession, and of what size and what number the camps will be. It is, however, a very substantial addition to the present allowance of the Volunteers in camp; and I have reason to believe, by the experience we have gained in the sittings of the Committee, that it will be a very satisfactory one to the Volunteers themselves. There were two other items—namely, "bands" and "interest on loans." With regard to the first subject, we thought it impossible directly to sanction bands, which are not recognized in any of the other Auxiliary Forces. But it is proposed to excuse bandsmen from musketry drill, which I believe will give considerable facility to the formation of bands. With regard to the interest on loans, under the new arrangement by which the uniform will be paid for out of the Capitation Grant, it is anticipated that the necessity for borrowing money for clothes will disappear, and consequently the "interest on loans" will disappear with it. I will not weary your Lordships by recapitulating all the recommendations of the Committee;

Viscount Bury

Viscount Bury

there were several other points which were inquired into—one was the condition of the old adjutants—that is, officers appointed previous to the new system, under which Volunteer adjutants are officers on full pay of the Army. These officers had a grievance, and those grievances were fully inquired into and investigated. I will not detain your Lordships with further detail; all further information will be found in the Papers which are laid on the Table of your Lordships' House. There was one point in regard to the medical officers, and the formation of a new medical department, on which the Committee have made certain recommendations. I will conclude by saying that it is only right that the Committee should bear their willing testimony to the general sound and efficient condition in which they found the Volunteers. It is a Force which has increased from year to year, and has always answered cheerfully every call made upon it. Some of the proposals of the Committee involve an expenditure of public money; and therefore, of course, these proposals will have to be discussed in "another place" before they can be looked upon as finally agreed to. In conclusion, I wish to remark that the recommendations of this Committee have been approved in principle by my right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War, who, however, wishes to reserve to himself, as regards the details, a wide liberty of action if it should be necessary to exercise it. Within the limits I have mentioned he has generally approved of the principle of the recommendations of the Committee. I have now only to apologize to your Lordships for having detained you so long, and to thank you for the patient and courteous hearing which you have given me.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, he had listened with great pleasure to the greater part of the statement just made by the noble Viscount, and during almost the whole of it he thought he could agree with everything that had been said. In his concluding remarks, however, the House was told by the noble Viscount that the Secretary of State reserved to himself perfect latitude in regard both to principles and details; and, if that were the case, he did not understand what had been the use or advantage of making the statement at all. He did not see that their Lordships had much to thank the Government for; for all the questions that had been glanced at were questions exclusively for the other House of Parliament, which alone had jurisdiction in matters of finance. He understood, however, that, in so far as they had any power, their opinions would be asked. He would assume that the Committee had very carefully considered the question—that their recommendations would be communicated to their Lordships, and the grounds on which they were made; and, assuming that the opinions of their Lordships were to have some force, he was happy to agree with almost everything that the Committee appeared to have approved. As regarded the Force itself, he was happy to say that, in proportion as the Volunteers had had demands made upon them, they had most cheerfully responded. He had said more than once, in "another place," that when Englishmen undertook a duty they wished it to be a reality; that the Volunteers did not want to play at soldiers; and that to make their service substantial would be, not to diminish the inducement, but to increase it. They were a growing Force, and one of which the country had reason to be proud. He rejoiced extremely that the noble Viscount was proceeding on the lines of the localization system which he found before him. He did not think that a limit should be fixed to the Establishment of the Volunteers. What would have happened if they had placed a limit to the number of of the Force 20 years ago? It was still a growing institution, and it would be wise not to place a limit. He could not avoid referring to the death of General Peel, of which they had just heard, of which he might, in some sense, be considered the originator. Twenty years ago, General Peel wrote to the bench of magistrates, of which he (Viscount Cardwell) was a member, asking their support in the first formation of Volunteers. Who could have imagined, 20 years ago, that from the beginning, then so small, they would have seen in the first 20 years the present noble Force? He regretted General Peel had not lived to hear the approval given by Her Majesty's Government to the continuance of the Force. So far as he had collected from the statement of the noble Viscount what the Report was, he agreed with all the other recommendations of it; and he trusted that whoever might live another 20 years would see as favourable a result from their proposals as they now saw from those adopted 20 years ago from the Circular of General Peel.

EARL COWPER quite concurred with the noble Viscount that it would be a mistake to fix a limit to the numbers of the Volunteers. They had gone on steadily increasing, and it would be a damper now to tell the Force that no more of it was wanted—for that would be the practical effect of the recommendation. He regretted that it was decided the Volunteers should go into scarlet. They had worn gray for 20 years, and had become attached to it; and, at the same time, it should be remembered that the Regulars might not be well pleased to see the Volunteers presenting themselves in the professional colours of regularly trained soldiers. Moreover, there were many men who looked very well in gray who would not look well set up in scarlet. He was of opinion it would be better to proceed cautiously in the consolidation of administrative battalions. Some of them were composed of companies very far apart, and the internal arrangements, particularly the finances, were better managed by the captain on the spot than by the colonel at a distance. He was sorry to hear there was to be no increase in the grant, as officers at present had to be chosen for their pecuniary rather than for their military qualifications; but he was pleased that the position of Volunteers as a part of the defensive Force of the country was now regularly recognized, not only by the public, but by the Government.

LORD TRURO said, there were several points in the Report of the Committee which had been referred to that did not give anything like universal satisfaction to the friends of the Volunteer Force. One of those was the question of uniforms. Again, he thought the recommendation of the Committee on the subject of drills was not satisfactory. He thought many would be deterred from joining the Force if they were compelled to undergo 30 drills in two successive years; for it would be too great an interruption to their regular occupations. From all that he had heard from the noble Viscount that evening, he could come to no other conclusion than that the recommendations made would not, on the whole, be advantageous to the numerical force or to the military efficiency of the Volunteer Force.

VISCOUNT BURY replied briefly, and, in so doing, reminded the House that he had brought the matter forward in an unofficial manner, believing that that would be the best mode of bringing the subject under the public attention.

EARL GRANVILLE pointed out, as a matter of procedure, that the noble Viscount who had just addressed the House had made two speeches based on a Paper not yet before their Lordships; while, earlier in the evening, the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had deprecated any discussion upon another matter until Papers were laid before their Lordships. He thought the old Rules had better be adhered to.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— THE REINFORCEMENTS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD TRURO rose to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether application was at any time made by the Civil or Military Authorities at the Cape of Good Hope for additional military forces; and, if so, on what date it was received; whether the same was entertained; and, if so, the date on which the reinforcements were despatched; also the number and description of the forces applied for, the strength of each battery and regiment when embarked, and the number of volunteers taken to complete their complement respectively? The noble Lord said, he trusted the Question would not be considered premature, seeing that at present they had received no details of the disastrous affair, the announcement of which had been communicated to them, or to the various steps which had been taken by the Government. He had put the Question on the Paper with a view of obtaining information which would satisfy the public mind whether the steps taken by the Government antecedent to the present crisis were sufficient, or whether, on the other hand, there had been any omission which would in any way render the Government responsible for what had happened. He desired, also, that the public might have the means of judging whether the steps which had been taken were taken in such a manner as to be effective and in consonance with the soundest judgment which had been given them. A part of the Correspondence relating to the subject of his Question had already been referred to. That Correspondence showed that no less than three applications were made to the Imperial Government at various times for assistance in the shape of officers, troops, and regiments. He knew it was stated that the Papers would be laid on the Table of the House on Saturday or Monday—they would show, beyond doubt, that the requests made by Sir Bartle Frere and Lord Chelmsford had not been fully complied with—but what was the real position of things with regard to their applications? The first application was made at the desire of Lord Chelmsford through Sir Bartle Frere. It was an application for two special classes of officers, for two regiments of infantry and one of cavalry. ["No!"] The words of the despatch were that the presence of "one regiment of cavalry would be of enormous importance." At first there was a distinct refusal to give any additional support whatever, with the exception of certain officers. He could not see the advantage of sending those officers to drill Native troops, seeing how impossible it was to train them to order within a short space of time, and he looked on their services in that respect as valueless. Then, after having refused all those troops, the Government subsequently, upon a third application, sent two regiments of infantry.

Lord Truro

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he had to apologize for interrupting the noble Lord; but he wished to know whether he was asking his Question or answering it?

LORD TRURO said, he was making some observations with a view to elicit a reply to his Questions from the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, who, speaking last night, appeared to be under some misconception. His (Lord Truro's) desire was to show that the first intention and policy of the Government was that there should be no attack made on Zululand. They refused, in the first instance, to give any assistance to the Colony of Natal; but they subsequently complied, and gave two regiments for its protection. But what had they done now? Although they gave a limited amount of troops as compared with the number demanded for the purpose of defending Natal, they changed their policy and waged war against the Zulus, and that without waiting for additional reinforcements. It was said by the noble Earl that they had now sent a more than ample force, probably excessive reinforcements; but that they did after the disaster had occurred—in the first instance, they refused to send any troops whatever. As to the regiments going out, their Lordships knew the condition in which regiments were sometimes sent, and that to make up their full strength they were obliged to have 200 or 300 volunteers from other regiments; who, therefore, would have to fight under officers to whom they were not accustomed. They were, therefore, inefficient for immediate active service, however excellent as soldiers the volunteers might be, as they ought to be known by their officers, and know and have reliance in their officers. He hoped that the noble Earl would give their Lordships some information as to the calibre of the guns which had been and were about to be sent out to South Africa. For his part, he could not help thinking that the public mind would not be satisfied that it was not until repeated applications had been made and pressure had been put upon the Government by able, prudent, and cautious men, that they complied with the demand for reinforcements, and then sent fewer than had been demanded, and that at a time of great emergency, and when there was a possibility of the dire calamity happening which had since taken place.

EARL CADOGAN said, that the noble Lord (Lord Truro), in putting and answering his Questions, had endeavoured to draw him into a discussion on the general merits of the war which was now raging in South Africa. He most respectfully declined to be drawn into any such discussion. He would do his best to answer the noble Lord, although he could not promise that his answer would differ very much from that which he had given on the same subject last night. The noble Lord seemed to think that he was under a misconception with respect to the Correspondence. Well, he did not like to return the compliment; but the noble Lord had failed to show in what respect he had misconceived it. It was true that in Sir Bartle Frere's despatch, dated the 14th of September, stating that General Thesiger thought two regiments of infantry "necessary," he added that one regiment of cavalry would be of "enormous advantage;" but in a despatch written on the same day by General Thesiger—namely, the 14th of September—and which was not included in the Blue Book, being a despatch to the War Office, which would be in their Lordships' hands immediately, the General detailed the forces he would require, and requested that two regiments of infantry might be sent; but he made no mention of cavalry. It was true that the Government did not at first see fit to send out the reinforcements, but did send the special officers demanded. A further request was made in a Memorandum written by Lord Chelmsford, and dated the 28th of September, which concluded by stating that—

"For offensive purposes alone the Natal and Transvaal Colonies require three battalions of infantry in addition to the forces we have already got,"

and he added that a battalion of the 24th Regiment was already available, and requested that the remaining two should be sent from England. No request was then made for a regiment of cavalry, and the two regiments of infantry were sent out. The noble Lord asked the date at which they were despatched. He was sorry he did not know the exact date, but he thought they were sent the first week in December. The Papers, however, to be furnished by the War Office would answer the noble Lord's Question. With regard to the last part of the Question, he had only to state that if the noble Lord moved for a Return of the nature of one which had already been moved for on the same subject in "another place," there would be no objection to its being granted.

LORD TRURO, referring to the question of reinforcements, said, he should have thought that the desire for a cavalry regiment so distinctly and energetically expressed by Sir Bartle Frere in one of his earlier communications would have been sufficient to have induced the Government to have supplied the want without hesitation.

THE MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

EARL CADOGAN proceeded to say that he wished, on behalf of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, to make a statement of a personal character. The noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville), in his speech last night, was said—and in his (Earl Cadogan's) recollection correctly—to have attributed to the Secretary of State for the Colonies a statement that the policy of the Government was "annexation in all parts of the world." His right hon. Friend had requested him to state to their Lordships that he must repudiate altogether the use of the words attributed to him. Everyone who knew the noble Earl must be aware that he would not willingly impute to another language he had not used; but as his right hon. Friend had no power of addressing their Lordships, he had requested him to say that he did not know from what report the noble Earl had quoted, but that he certainly did not use the words ascribed to him, and he was confident that those he did use could not have conveyed such a meaning to the audience he addressed.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was extremely sorry if he had misquoted the right hon. Baronet. He had not brought down the report from which he had quoted, because he was not aware that the subject was going to be brought up. He had been struck by a passage in which, adopting a sentence which was not quite new, after talking of the competition to which this country was subject in Europe and America, he was reported to have said—"We have been subject to competition in Europe and America—cannot we then call in a new Continent to redress the balance of the old." Whether this applied to the annexation of Zululand he could not say. He further was reported to have said, referring to what he called the bold and necessary step of annexation in South Africa taken by Lord Carnarvon, that he regretted that Lord Carnarvon did not join in the same policy in other parts of the globe. As, however, the right hon. Gentleman disavowed the language thus imputed to him, he entirely accepted the disavowal.

THE PLAGUE IN RUSSIA—SANITARY PRECAUTIONS.

QUESTION. MOTION FOR A PAPER.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON asked Her Majesty's Government, What measures they have taken, either separately or in conjunction with other Governments, to ascertain the nature and most effective treatment of the pestilence now raging in parts of Russia? and to move for copies of any sanitary regulations issued as regards English ports and of quarantine regulations in force in Malta and Gibraltar. The importance of the subject could hardly be over-estimated, for although there was some uncertainty as to the nature and the best mode of treating the disease, there could be no doubt that it was of a contagious and deadly character, bearing a strong resemblance, in the majority of its external symptoms, to the worst class of Asiatic plague that had raged in former years. Perhaps there was no one of their Lordships who was more entitled than himself to call attention to this matter, because he had not only seen Asiatic plague raging, but had himself suffered from it so severely that, although the attack occurred many years ago, he still entertained a lively impression of its horrors and danger. Most of the Governments of Eastern Europe had already adopted precautionary measures against the introduction of the plague within their borders; and he thought it desirable to ascertain what steps Her Majesty's Government, for their part, had taken in regard to it. He would specially ask the noble Duke what measures had been taken by the authorities at Malta and Gibraltar. He was glad to see that the College of Physicians had already moved in the matter. So far as the existing evidence went, there was reason to believe that the most effective means of preventing the importation of the disease was quarantine; and although perfectly aware of the great inconvenience of this remedy, he trusted that, in view of the terrible interests at stake, no merely theoretical objection to it would be allowed to prevail.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: In reply to the last part of the Question, I can assure the noble

Earl that the subject of the plague has occupied the very serious and earnest attention of Her Majesty's Government, and they are already taking such measures as have seemed to them advisable in dealing with the plague, with the view of preventing its reaching this country. Germany and Austria, if I am not mistaken, have already received permission from the Russian Government each to send a competent physician to assist in an inquiry as to the origin of the plague and the best means of treating and dealing with it when it arises. Her Majesty's Government have also made a proposal to the Russian Government to be allowed to send a physician to take part in the same inquiry; and I have been in communication with the College of Physicians, and have requested that they would be good enough to recommend to Her Majesty's Government some gentleman whom they would think to be a fit and proper person to take part in such an inquiry, provided always that we receive the permission of the Russian Government to do so. I have also instructed the officers of Customs to inspect very narrowly the bills of health of all passengers and crews of ships coming from the Black Sea and the Sea of Azof; and I have been in communication with the medical advisers of the Government, requesting them to point out what goods they consider most calculated to carry infection. I have also been in communication with the quarantine officer of the Privy Council, a very eminent gentleman, and I have asked him whether anything can be suggested in the mode of disinfection employed that may be advantageously used, should, unhappily, this dreadful scourge visit this country, which I do not myself anticipate. I will read an extract from a letter I have received from Dr. Wiblin, the resident Medical Superintendent of Quarantine at Southampton. He says—

"With reference to your inquiries on the subject of disinfection, I can very safely and satisfactorily inform you, after a very long experience, that every possible security from infection of persons and goods may be relied upon by the free employment of nitrous acid fumes, produced by pouring fuming nitric acid upon copper filings. This is very easily done, and the results are most satisfactory. No living atom or molecule or man himself can exist in these fumes for more than a few seconds, as Dr. Seaton can testify from his personal experience at the Motherbank."

Whether that is satisfactory or not, it shows the strength of this disinfectant. He continues—

"Any given number of plates or other convenient vessels are arranged with given quantities of copper filings, and then the acid is poured into the plates. The portholes and other openings are then closed for 12 hours or longer, and the goods subsequently exposed to the purifying influence of the atmosphere for days."

So far as this disinfectant goes, I think my noble Friend will admit we have sufficient practical knowledge of what can be done in case the necessity should arise. I have also put myself in communication with the College of Physicians upon this subject; and I have had an interview with the eminent President of that body, Dr. Bennett, who informed me that the College are to hold a meeting upon this subject, and promised to communicate to me the result of the discussion, and any suggestion which might occur to him or his colleagues after they had gone thoroughly into the matter. As regards the regulations on the subject, I feel that under the quarantine laws we have ample power to take any measures that may be necessary should the plague reach this country; and we are prepared to act at a moment's notice. I have instructed the Customs to detain any vessel from any part of the world if there are any suspicious circumstances connected with that vessel when it reaches this country, and that they are at once to telegraph to the Privy Council Office, when I shall take the requisite means for dealing with it. At the Motherbank there is an ample quarantine establishment of three vessels; and upon an emergency we could easily obtain, in different parts of the country, other vessels for the purpose of separating healthy passengers from those who may be sick, and preventing communication with persons on shore. It has not been thought advisable to keep up permanently a very large establishment of quarantine vessels. That would, of course, be very expensive, and it would be a useless expenditure of public money if we thought, as we do, that we had the means of acquiring these vessels at any time, should the plague visit this country. I am informed by the Colonial Office that Gibraltar has not reported having imposed any quarantine against the plague. Malta has provisionally, and subject to rectification, imposed quarantine of 20 days on arrivals from Greece, Montenegro, the Turkish Empire, including Egypt (except ships passing through the Suez Canal), Tripoli, Tunis, Black Sea, and Sea of Azof—which, in case of ships of war, is reduced to nine days. The propriety of ratifying these arrangements is being considered by the Colonial Office, Admiralty, and Board of Trade. Malta has imposed this quarantine because Italy has taken a similar course, and would have imposed quarantine on arrivals from Malta if the Island had not taken this course. With regard to the regulations issued, and which my noble Friend proposes to move for, I hope he will be satisfied with having elicited this answer from me. The regulations are numerous and bulky, and it would not be convenient for any purpose that they should be laid on the Table. I can assure him that the matter has had the very earnest attention of the Government, and will not be lost sight of, though we have no ground for believing that there need be any alarm or apprehension of the arrival of the plague in this country.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he was satisfied with the answer of the noble Duke, and would not move for Papers.

INTEMPERANCE.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Moved that a Select Committee be appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the prevalence of habits of intemperance, and into the manner in which those habits have been affected by recent legislation and other causes.—(The Lord Aberdare.)

Motion agreed to.

The Lords following were named of the Committee:—

|                     |                      |
|---------------------|----------------------|
| L. Abp. Canterbury. | V. Gordon.           |
| L. Abp. York.       | V. Hutchinson.       |
| D. Westminster.     | L. Bp. Peterborough. |
| E. Beimore.         | L. Bp. Exeter.       |
| E. Onslow.          | L. Bp. Carlisle.     |
| E. Minto.           | L. Hartismere.       |
| E. Morley.          | L. Penrhyn.          |
| E. Dudley.          | L. Aberdare.         |
| E. Kimberley.       | L. Cottesloe.        |

The Committee to meet on Tuesday the 25th of February, at Twelve o'clock, and to appoint their own Chairman.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 14th February, 1879.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBERS SWORN—Lieutenant Colonel Charles George Tottenham, for New Ross Borough; Sir Thomas M'Clure, baronet, for Londonderry County.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Standing Orders, nominated; Selection, nominated; Inclosures, appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution in Committee—Ordered—First Reading—Banking Laws Amendment* [73].

Ordered—First Reading—Election Petitions (Costs)* [72]; Valuation of Property* [71]; Municipal Franchise (Ireland)* [74]; Employers' Liability for Injuries to Servants* [75]; Summary Jurisdiction* [69]; Prosecution of Offences* [68]; Coroners* [67]; Public Works Loans* [70].

Second Reading—Racecourses (Metropolis) [48].

Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—Sale of Food and Drugs Act (1875) Amendment [56].

Committee—Ancient Monuments [52]—R.P.

Third Reading—Disqualification by Medical Relief [22], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

AFGHANISTAN—DECLARATION OF GENERAL ROBERTS.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If it is true that on the 26th December last General Roberts held a Durbar at Hagarpir, in the Khurum Valley, and made a speech to the Khans and headmen of the tribes, impressing on them emphatically that the Ameer's rule had for ever passed away, and that they must henceforth look to England as their sovereign power and to the Government of the Empress; and, whether the Indian Government had the authority of Her Majesty's Government to cause that declaration to be made, or Her Majesty's Government has since accepted and adopted that declaration?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, with the permission of the House, I will answer at the same time a similar Question which stands in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for Longford County (Mr. O'Reilly). We have not as yet received, either in official despatches or in private letters, any information on this subject. I have read the statements in the newspapers as to General Roberts to which the hon. Members refer; but the House will see that I am not yet in a position to say whether those statements are accurate or not.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
ACT, 1878 — CATTLE FROM THE UNITED STATES.—QUESTIONS.

MR. RATHBONE asked the Vice President of the Council, Upon what grounds the Government have ordered the slaughter at the port of landing of cattle arriving in this Country from the United States of America; whether any cases of pleuro-pneumonia have occurred among any cattle arriving from the United States except those brought over by the "Ontario;" how many cargoes of cattle from the United States have arrived since that of the "Ontario"; whether there has been any correspondence with the Government of the United States, or its representatives, or with our representatives in that country, on the subject, and whether there are any minutes relating thereto; and, if so, whether he will lay Copies thereof upon the Table of the House; and, whether the Government have any, and, if so, what proof that the animals in the "Ontario's" cargo which were affected were American and not Canadian cattle?

MR. CHAPLIN asked the Vice President of the Council, If he can state to the House, whether Her Majesty's Government have received any information as to the outbreak of disease among cattle in the United States of America; how far and to what extent it is true as reported that contagious pleuro-pneumonia is prevalent at the present time in that country; whether Her Majesty's Government are satisfied that the general sanitary condition of cattle therein is such as to afford reasonable security against the importation of diseased animals therefrom into this Country; and, if not, if he would explain why the Order in Council exempting American cattle from the operation of the provisions of the fifth Schedule of the Contagious Diseases Animals Act relating to foreign animals—viz.: "They are not to be moved alive out of the wharf," is not suspended immediately, instead of remaining in force till the 3rd of March?

MR. MUNDELLA asked the Vice President of the Council, If he will state the number of live cattle, sheep, and pigs imported from Canada and the United States respectively in the first and second half-years of 1878, with the number found suffering from contagious disease; if he will also state the circumstances under which the recent Order in Council was issued requiring the slaughter of all American cattle at the port of debarkation, and whether there is any probability of such Order being speedily withdrawn; and, if he will lay all the Correspondence relating thereto upon the Table of the House?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the facts upon which the Order in Council was made are very simple. For some time past the Privy Council have from different quarters received intimations that there was in the United States a considerable amount of disease among cattle and other domestic animals. I have in my hand a Report, or rather a Message from the President of the United States communicating to the Senate in February, 1878, information in relation to the diseases prevailing amongst swine and other domestic animals. In the Appendix, page 144, of this Report, are the opinions of the different men of authority and experience upon the subject. I need not trouble the House with their Reports; but I will read a few lines from Professor James Law, one of the most eminent of those consulted. He says, page 144—

"Lung Fever.—This is the most insidious of all plagues, and this malady we harbour on our eastern seaboard, where it is gradually but almost imperceptibly invading new territory . . . . There is abundant evidence of the existence of this affection in Eastern New York, in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, and the district of Columbia. (See Government Report on Diseases of Cattle, 1871, and many instances in current agricultural journals). Within the last year I have been advised in the case of three outbreaks,—one in Eastern New York, one on Staten Island, and one in New Jersey. At present it excites little apprehension, but we are asleep over a smouldering volcano. Spreading from the port of New York, it has already gained a substantial hold upon different States, including the district of Columbia, and has invaded and been repeatedly expelled from two more, and it is only requisite that it should reach the sources of our stock supplies in the West."

infect our railway cars and Eastern States generally. . . . England has lost over 10,000,000 dollars from rinderpest in the present century, but she has lost hundreds of millions from the less-dreaded lung fever."

He concludes by imploring the Government to eradicate this plague at once. Well, Sir, the Lord President did not feel justified in excluding, upon the information before him, the import of live cattle except for slaughter from the United States until he had conclusive proof of what the nature of this lung disease was, and that there was a real danger of pleuro-pneumonia being brought into the country from the States—there being no single case of that disease being brought from the United States up to 26th of January, 1879. During the last three weeks pleuro-pneumonia of a contagious character has been detected in three cargoes of live cattle, brought over in the steamships Dominion and Ontario, from Portland, and the Istrian, from Boston. An Order was therefore issued, prohibiting import of live cattle from the United States after the 3rd of March, except for immediate slaughter, but not from Canada, which is not only quite free from disease, but has recently issued an Order prohibiting the import of live cattle from the United States. Twelve cargoes have arrived since that of the Ontario, all healthy, except in the case of the Istrian. The date of the 3rd of March was fixed, as it was considered only fair to allow cargoes shipped at the time of the Order to be landed, if healthy. If any disease exists among them, all will be slaughtered. It is hoped that by the 3rd March a foreign animals wharf will be opened at Birkenhead, with every accommodation for the slaughter of animals coming from the United States. On the Liverpool side ample accommodation will be provided by the same date for the lairage; and, if necessary, the slaughter of animals from unscheduled countries, and the present inconvenient landing-place be abandoned. I will lay the Correspondence asked for, together with the Report I have alluded to, upon the Table of the House.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER asked, Whether the information referred to was known to the Government in time to be utilized in the preparation of the measure of last year?

Lord George Hamilton

Lord GEORGE HAMILTON said, he was not quite certain on that point, although he knew it was in the possession of the Lord President when he issued the Orders in Council in November last.

ARMY—BREECH-LOADING ORDNANCE. QUESTION.

MAJOR NOLAN asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, If reports have been recently received from the Heavy Gun Committee, containing reference to the advantages of breech-loading ordnance; and, if so, is he prepared to lay such Reports or extracts therefrom upon the Table; and, if he will state what experiments on breech-loading guns have been determined on for the coming year?

Lord EUSTACE CECIL: Sir, there will be no objection to placing the Reports mentioned by the hon. and gallant Gentleman upon the Table as soon as the experiments are decided upon. At present no decision as to experiments has been arrived at; but designs for heavy breech-loading guns are under consideration, and have been for some months.

HIGHWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVES ACT, 1878.—QUESTION.

Mr. ESTCOURT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Highway and Locomotives Act, 1878, may be considered an optional, or whether it is a compulsory measure?

Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH: Sir, I hardly know whether my opinion is worth more than that of my hon. Friend. I should say that "compulsory" is a hard word, but that the Act is of the same obligation as other Acts of Parliament, though, no doubt, there is reserved to local authorities a good deal of discretion as to the extent to which the powers contained in the Act should be put into operation.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR— THE REINFORCEMENTS.—QUESTION.

Colonel MURE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will grant a Return of the ages and lengths of service of the non-commissioned officers and rank and file, exclusive of band and drummers, of the infantry regiments at present under orders, or that would be despatched to reinforce Her Majesty's Forces at the Cape of Good Hope and Zululand?

COLONEL STANLEY: There would be no objection to giving the Return which my hon. and gallant Friend asks for, could it be given without any interference with the actual duties which these regiments are engaged in prior to their embarking.

COLONEL MURE said, these Returns could be made up after the regiments had been embarked.

COLONEL STANLEY: That is the only reservation I want to make.

SOUTH AFRICA—CAPE COLONY— THE MOUNTED POLICE.

QUESTION.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is true that persons who had contracted to serve the Cape Government in a civil capacity in the "Mounted Police" have been by a Colonial Law compelled, without the option of discharge, to serve in a military capacity in a force called the "Mounted Rifles"; whether those who respectfully refused to submit to this arrangement were not tried by court martial and sentenced to six months' imprisonment and hard labour, which involves their working on the roads of the Colony with common convicts; and, whether Her Majesty's Government propose to take any action in the matter?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he was unable within reasonable limits to give an answer to the Question. If the noble Lord would wait for two or three days until the next volume of the Cape Papers was issued, he would find all the facts in the Correspondence that had taken place on the subject.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will consent to alter the regulations of the Post Office

Savings Banks made under the authority of the Act 24 Vic. c. 14, so as to allow depositors to deposit to the extent of £100 per year, instead of £30 as at present, and to extend the total amount which may stand in each depositor's name to £300, instead of £150 as at present?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that it was the intention of the Government to introduce a measure respecting Postal Savings Banks, and that it would contain new provisions on the subject referred to by the hon. Member.

THE TREATY OF BERLIN — THE GREEK FRONTIER.—QUESTIONS.

MR. WAIT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Government have taken action in support of the Despatch dated 21st October 1878, addressed by the Minister of France for Foreign Affairs to the Turkish Government, in reference to a rectification of the Greek frontier; and, whether he is in a position to inform the House that this important object, recommended by the Treaty of Berlin, is in a fair way of being carried out?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, there is no despatch at the Foreign Office as to the Greek Frontier such as that described in the Question of my hon. Friend—namely, a despatch of October 21 from the French Government to the Turkish Government. With regard to the second Question, I have to state that negotiations in conformity with the Treaty of Berlin are now being carried on.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I hope the hon. Gentleman will allow me to put a Question arising out of his answer. Do I understand him to say there is no French despatch of October 21 in regard to the Greek claims, or merely that there is no French despatch to Turkey?

MR. BOURKE: I answered the Question as it was put down, and any other course would have misled the House. My answer to the hon. Gentleman is strictly correct. The Question of the hon. Baronet is totally different. The despatch mentioned is a Circular addressed to the Powers, which will be found in the Papers. To show how wrong I should be to give a different answer, I will remind the House that the Turkish Government, which, according to my hon. Friend, was addressed by the French Government, is, in fact, the only Power concerned which has not been so addressed.

THE MEDICAL ACTS—THE MEDICAL COUNCIL.—QUESTION.

MR. WADDY asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Government has received from the General Medical Council the Report on the working and constitution of the Council promised in July last; if not, whether the Government has any hope of soon receiving it, and will consent (in deference to the wish for a change in the constitution of the General Medical Council) to postpone legislation for amending the Medical Acts till this part of the subject can be included?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the Government have not received at present any communication from the Medical Council on the subject of the working of the Council. The Medical Council referred the subject to its Executive Council, and since that time there has been no meeting of the Council. The amendment of the Medical Acts as regards education, foreign diplomas, education of midwives, and other important matters contained in the Government Bill of last year, can proceed without prejudicing the subject of the Medical Council; but, as before stated, the Government desire to obtain further information before coming to a decision, and propose to constitute an inquiry into the subject of the constitution of the Medical Council.

THE PLAGUE IN RUSSIA—MEDICAL REPORTS.—QUESTION.

MR. WADDY asked the President of the Local Government Board, in view of the recent appearance of plague in Europe, Whether the several Reports presented to the Local Government Board since the reappearance of the disease in Eastern Countries, and printed in successive Reports of its medical officers, could be brought together and printed as one paper for the information of Members?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he had given directions that the medical Reports relating to the reappearance of the disease should be collated and presented to the House.

Mr. Bourke

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE REINFORCEMENTS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL MURE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will lay upon the Table in their absolute entirety, every line of the Correspondence which has taken place between the authorities, Civil and Military, Imperial, or Colonial, in regard to the question of reinforcements of every arm for the Army in South Africa?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, there has been every disposition, on the part of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Colonies and for War, to give the whole of the information in the possession of the Government with regard to this subject. My right hon. Friend the Colonial Secretary, in the Papers which he has already laid upon the Table, has not only given the usual official Correspondence, but has, in several instances, given personal and private and confidential telegrams such as are not usually laid before the House. He tells me he will look again, to be sure that he has not omitted anything; and my right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War will do the same.

COLONEL MURE: I beg to say that I referred not only to the past, but also to the future.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Of course I intend my answer to apply, not only to what has been presented, but to the Correspondence that has since taken place and will take place.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—REMOVAL OF IRISH POOR.—QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he intends to introduce any measure this Session to remove the evils attending the removal of Irish poor, which this House resolved required redress?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH: Sir, I cannot answer this Question without expressing my sense of the loss which the House has sustained by the death of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M'Carthy Downing), who took so much interest in it. On the last occasion, when I made proposals in the form of a Bill intended to deal with the particular question of removals to Ireland, the House considered that the proposal ought to be extended to England and Scotland. Considering the recent alterations in the general law with regard to removal and settlement, I am not in a position, at this moment, to make further proposals, except this—that I think it would be useful to refer the subject to a Select Committee, with special reference to the case of removals in Ireland. My hon. Friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board will, in a few days, move for such a Committee.

INDIA—REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE—THE INDIAN BUDGET.

QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, To lay upon the Table Summaries of the Revenues and Expenditure, showing those of the actuals for 1877-8, of the regular Estimate for 1878-9, and of the Budget for 1879-80?

MR. E. STANHOPE: We have not yet received the figures to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman refers; but he will have observed from what was stated yesterday that the Budget is likely to be published in India about the end of this month.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT, 1878—SECTION 34 — FARM DAIRIES.—QUESTION.

MR. PAGET asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the registration of dairymen and all other provisions of the Order of Council of the 4th instant, which every local authority in Great Britain is ordered to enforce, are to apply to all ordinary farm dairies in rural districts? He also wished to know who was to decide whether the ventilation and water supply referred to in the sub-section were all that they should be? He also asked the noble Lord to state his definition of "persons carrying on trade;" would it apply to private dairies?—

MR. O'REILLY rose to Order, and protested against the hon. Gentleman putting a series of Questions of which he had given no Notice.

LODGE GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, as regards the first part of the Question, the registration is intended to apply to all those who sell dairy produce, except, of course, private farms and private dairies.

HIGHWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVES (AMENDMENT) ACT, 1878.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY JACKSON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Local Government Board have prepared any model bye-laws for the guidance of county authorities in framing bye-laws in accordance with Clause 26 of "The Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878;" and, if not, whether it is intended to prepare any such model bye-laws?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, it was the intention of the Local Government Board to frame model bye-laws for the guidance of the county authorities as soon as sufficient experience of the suggestions of those authorities had been gained.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

QUESTION.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the subject of the grievances and claims of the Irish National Teachers has received the consideration of the Government; and, if so, what means the Government propose to adopt to remove such grievances and to satisfy the claims of the teachers?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Yes, Sir; the matter has been under the consideration of the Government, and we propose to introduce a Bill on the subject?

FLOODS AND CONSERVANCY BOARDS—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. CHAPLIN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If the Government intend during this Session to introduce any measure dealing with the question of floods and conservancy boards?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that the President of the Local Government Board and the Lord President of the Council had been in communication on the subject, and a Bill had been prepared which would be introduced shortly.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

BOROUGH FRANCHISE (IRELAND).

RESOLUTION.

MR. MELDON, in rising to call attention to the restricted nature of the Borough Franchise in Ireland; and to move—

"That the restricted nature of the Borough Franchise in Ireland as compared with that existing in England and Scotland is a subject deserving the immediate attention of Parliament, with the view of establishing a fair and just equality of the Franchise in the three Countries," said, that this was the sixth time, during the present Parliament, he had risen to ask the House to do a simple act of justice to Ireland. He appealed to Her Majesty's Government to extend to Ireland a privilege which had been extended to England and Scotland in 1867. Was it consistent with truth and honour for them to deny this privilege to Ireland, and yet, at the same time, to lay it down as one of their principles that they extended to Ireland the same rights that were possessed by England and Scotland? When Irish questions were brought forward they were usually met by the reply that claims were being made for Ireland which had not been granted to the people of England; but, in this case, the facts he desired to lay before the House would show that it was totally inconsistent with those declarations to maintain the present law of borough franchise. The present time was very opportune for a settlement of this question. When the matter was brought forward at the commencement of the present Parliament, its supporters were told that its settlement would necessarily lead to a Dissolution. This objection was at that time not without force; but it was one that was no longer valid, because at present they were on the eve of a General Election. It was not a Party question, for it had been introduced by the Conservative Party themselves, under the leadership of the present Prime Minister in 1867. The issue before the House was this, whether Ireland was or was not to be governed by equal laws with England? Since the Resolution was last before the House there had been an expression of opinion throughout this country in the Conservative Press that the Government had not the slightest excuse for further delaying a settlement, and up to the present moment the Conservative Press in England had advocated the assimilation of the borough franchise of the three countries, and hopes had been held out to the Irish people, either through the Press or otherwise, that the Government would take the question up. They had very recently heard it stated that the people of Ireland were not inclined to look with favour upon the action of the Government with respect to this matter. But this was not the case. There had been a very strong feeling in Ireland that the intentions of the Government on this question were honourable. It was only now that they learned to their great disappointment that, instead of the policy of conciliation which was introduced last Session, they were to have a policy of exasperation. It had been stated to him by hon. Gentlemen that whilst they thoroughly approved of his Motion, they should abstain from voting for it, because of the pressure put upon them by the Government. He, however, appealed to the independent Members of the House not to allow themselves to be influenced on this question by the opinion of one Cabinet Minister, but to determine the case on its merits. Last Session they thought themselves entitled, from the tone of the hon. Member's gracious speech, to conclude that a policy of conciliation would then be adopted when the Intermediate Education Bill was indicated. But a change took place in the councils of the Ministry, and it was only under great pressure, and under exceptional circumstances, that the Bill was introduced after all. In the present Session, however, they found that nothing was being done for Ireland, and under those circumstances he was justified in saying that a policy of exasperation had been adopted, and that the principle of conciliation had been thrown to the winds. The present Prime Minister, when introducing the borough franchise for England, laid it down that the franchise was the political right of every citizen who was able to keep a house above his head and to assist in the support of his poorer brethren? What was there in that principle which did not apply equally to Ireland? He challenged anyone to find anything in the circumstances of the two countries that could justify the difference in the application of the principle. The qualification for the borough franchise in Ireland was the occupation of a house rated at not less than £4; but, owing to the mode of valuation, a house rated at £4 in Ireland would be worth £6 in England, so that there was even a greater difference between the two systems than at first appeared. The difference between the electoral condition of England and Scotland and Ireland was very striking. Thus the 31 boroughs in Ireland, having a population of 866,356, had only 54,218 electors, between them returning 39 Members; while Glasgow, with a population of 470,456, had 60,582 electors; Liverpool, with a population of 493,405, had 61,143 electors; and Manchester, with a population of 379,374, had 62,813 voters. The boroughs of England, having a population of 10,600,000, returned 297 Members by 1,539,000 votes; and those of Scotland, with a population of 479,391, returned 26 Members by 203,364 votes. Further, though the number of electors had been trebled in England between 1868 and the present time, the entire increase in Ireland during the same period was something less than 20,000. All this spoke volumes in favour of the claim which he put before the House, and made the strength of his case overwhelming. What distinction was there between the three countries to justify this difference between the proportion of electors to population? The Irish people were quite—and, indeed, in matters of politics, even more intelligent than similar classes in this country. What reason, then, was there that the citizen in one portion of the United Kingdom should be deprived of the political rights held by citizens in other portions? Again, by what process of reasoning could it be made just that an Irishman enjoying a vote at Liverpool should be disfranchised by the simple act of removing to the other side of the Channel? The number of county and borough electors in England and Scotland bore an entirely different proportion to that of Ireland. In England and Scotland the large majority of the electors were in the boroughs, while in Ireland the number of borough electors was insignificant as compared with those in the counties. He did not know any reason why this should be so. It had been said that to introduce household suffrage into the Irish boroughs would bring about a change in that country which might become dangerous; but no danger had resulted in this country from the change effected by the Reform Act of 1867, under which the number of the borough electors had been tripled. He was at a loss to conceive what there was to be said on the other side of that question. The question had been discussed five times in that House; but he could not discover any arguments which he had to answer. It might be urged that his proposal would necessitate a re-distribution of seats. Well, he was not terrified by that suggestion. He was perfectly prepared to meet a re-distribution of seats. He was for giving political power to the great mass of the people irrespective of whether they would support Members on one side of the House or on the other. The present Conservative Government said they were returned by the votes of the English working classes. If so, the extension of the franchise in England had operated for their advantage. He did not, however, agree in the necessity of a re-distribution of seats, because at present they had appointed a Commission for extending the boundaries of boroughs in Ireland. It might be said that they should delay the extension of the franchise until the boundaries of boroughs had been extended; but he maintained that the two things were quite distinct from, and independent of, each other. Let them extend the boundaries of boroughs as much as they pleased; but that was no reason for putting off the extension of the franchise. In England they did not wait for the extension of the boundaries of boroughs before extending the franchise, and he now said they should assimilate the law of the two countries. It had been stated that the people of Ireland had no great feeling on that subject; but he asserted that it had been much discussed throughout Ireland by public bodies, who had shown great interest in the proposal, and were uniformly in favour of it. Petitions had been sent in, but the question was too serious to be decided by Petitions. The feelings of the people of Ireland on the question would have been perfectly well known if not a single Petition had been presented. The rejection of his Motion would, he was convinced, produce great disappointment, and even exasperation, among the Irish people. In addition to the restricted nature of the franchise in Ireland, the enjoyment of that privilege was further circumscribed through the operation of the rating laws. He would appeal to the independent Members of the great Conservative Party not to allow the influence of the Government on that occasion to deprive Ireland of the redress which she now sought. In the interest of the Constitutional Party in Ireland, as represented in that House, he appealed to them as Englishmen desirous of maintaining the union between the two countries to do what was fair, just, and honourable in that matter, and not to throw out his Motion. If that union was to be continued, he asked them not to permit Party considerations to interfere with the vote they were about to give. Early in the present Parliament the House had refused to yield to the great pressure of the Government, and had virtually affirmed that the borough franchise of Ireland ought to be extended, because the Motion was defeated only by a majority of 13, which he regarded as a practical expression of the opinion of the House that the advocates of the proposal had reason and justice on their side. Last Session, again, there was only a majority of 8 against them; and he thought the time had now come when that question ought to be settled. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. GRAY said, he rose to second the Motion for the third time since he had been a Member of the House. He did so with very little hope of the Motion leading to a successful result, for he understood that a more than usually urgent summons had been issued by the Government to their supporters to attend in force and crush this demand of the Irish Representatives. He was informed, moreover, that individual Members of the Government had exercised personal pressure on hon. Members opposite, who were really in favour of the Motion, to induce them to vote against it on this occasion. Yet when they considered that the Government usually commanded a majority of 60, and that this measure, proposed by a private Member on the Liberal side, had only been defeated by majorities of 5, 13, and 8, it must be admitted that they had virtually gained the victory. There had not been a shred of argument against the proposition. It was said that an assimilation of the Irish borough franchise with the English would swamp the existing constituencies and revolutionize the representation. Had the change made in England in 1867, and completed in 1869, had any such effect? Why should that be bad in Ireland which was thought good in England? By the legislation of 1867 and 1869 the English borough constituencies were trebled, and the Government deemed the change beneficial because it had brought them into power. The present proposal, on the other hand, would not even double the Irish borough constituencies, and yet it was held up as a revolutionary measure, which would destroy property by the force of numbers. That argument exemplified the saying that any stick was good enough to beat a dog with. What had puzzled him most in considering the attitude which Ministers had taken on this question was—what was the real motive which was actuating them? This Session had no doubt been initiated by a policy of exasperation towards Irish Members; but there must be some motive underlying that. A desire to irritate and insult could not account for it. There must be some motive underlying the determination of the Government to delay this measure, which must be granted sooner or later. Could it be that Ireland had been so tranquil that, as the Coercion Act was about to expire by lapse of time, the Government hoped, by exasperating the people, to drive them to some act which would furnish an excuse for the continuance of the Coercion Act? [A laugh.] The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. J. Lowther) smiled; but the idea was not so far-fetched. When the English people desired a reform of the franchise they took determined measures, in order to show that their wishes should not be resisted, and hon. Members had not yet forgotten the disturbances in Hyde Park. If, however, similar riots occurred in the Phoenix Park at Dublin, the Government, instead of appointing one of the promoters of the movement to a Judgeship, would probably violate the law, as they had done on previous occasions, and instead of granting to the Irish people a Reform Act, which was their right, would give them a Coercion Act. Every expression of public opinion in Ireland was treated as sedition. As to the allegation that the Irish people had not sent up Petitions in favour of reform, he might remark that they might naturally feel disinclined to petition Parliament, inasmuch as their opinion, when expressed constitutionally through their Representatives, was not received in the House of Commons with the slightest regard or respect. The action of the Government had taught the Irish people that they were regarded as being outside the Constitution, and that any concession that was given to them was given for the policy and convenience of the Government, not for the benefit of the people, and it was never given in the manner nor at the time that the people required it. In point of fact, however, there had not been during the Recess a single public meeting in Ireland at which a Resolution was not passed in favour of assimilating the Irish to the English franchise. The popular Press of Ireland was also unanimous on the question, and had written warmly in support of the Motion. What further expression of public opinion could they have? If the motive he had suggested with respect to the Coercion Act was not the real spring of the action of the Government, he could suggest one even more ignoble though perhaps less criminal. They might, perhaps, have thought it desirable to exasperate some of the Irish Representatives in that House, and thereby to obtain an excuse for applying to them some exceptional measure. So many Irishmen had been enfranchised in England that in Manchester alone there were more Irish voters than in Dublin. These men had commenced to make their power felt by means of organization. Now, if by the refusal of the present demand and of other claims, the Government could obtain an excuse for applying to the Irish Party exceptional legislation, they might be able to excite such a prejudice against the Irish in England that the fact of the Irish vote being cast in favour of a candidate would rather injure than serve him. Or it might be that they had a still more pettifogging motive. It might be that they were merely postponing a settlement until after the General Election, in the hope of keeping a seat or two for a few years longer. These motives might be natural enough; but were they such as ought to actuate statesmen? He seconded the Motion without the slightest hope of its being carried. But in spite of the present majority of the Government, in spite of the Whips, in spite of the pressure on individual Members, who, if left free, would vote for the Motion, the time must come when this question would be settled; and all that the Government would gain by their attitude in exasperating the Irish people would be to make them feel that what otherwise they might be grateful for as a measure of peace, conciliation, and justice to the country, had been obtained in spite of them and not by their help.

Mr. Meldon

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the restricted nature of the Borough Franchise in Ireland as compared with that existing in England and Scotland is a subject deserving the immediate attention of Parliament, with a view of establishing a fair and just equality of the Franchise in the three Countries." — (Mr. Meldon,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. CHARLES LEWIS, in opposing the Motion, said, that if he had to trouble the House with arguments and figures that had been previously used there, it arose from the necessity of the case in the Mover of the Motion not having given the House a scintilla of fact, and only laying before them one part of the case. He had carefully confined his remarks to considering population only, and a reference to what he called a policy of exasperation. Such a policy was not inaugurated on the Government Benches, but by those below the Gangway on his own side of the House. It had commenced in that House, and had been reiterated over and over again, with every sort of extravagant threats, out of the House, both with regard to the Ministry and hon. Members; but they would certainly have no effect on the Ministerial side of the House. For if he knew anything of the spirit or sense of honour which inspired hon. Members on the Government side of the House, it would certainly not be by threats such as had been used that their conduct on that or upon any other question would be influenced. The Mover of this Resolution had said that the whole of the Conservative Press of England were in favour of this measure; but he (Mr. Charles Lewis) ventured to doubt that statement. The hon. and learned Member had evidently been misled on that point. The subject of the extension of the Irish borough franchise, no doubt, appeared to many to be an easy one; but until people took the trouble to study it, they were misled by the fine phrase "assimilation of the franchise in England and Ireland." The House was told that all his hon. and learned Friend modestly asked for was that a Conservative Government should do now for Ireland what they did for England in 1867. But there was one thing which they did not do, and that was to hand over the electoral power in one part of the United Kingdom to persons rated below £4, and that was what was now proposed. So long as they excluded women from the franchise and required a man to pay rent and occupy a house, and so long as there were endless barriers to the introduction of that which he hoped he should never see in England—universal manhood suffrage—they would have to fall back on the principle from which the Legislature of England had never departed—that the franchise was not a mere right without conditions. One of the conditions necessary to annex to any lowering of the franchise in Ireland beyond the present point would be to show that the class which came in was qualified to exercise, as a body, the franchise conferred on them—that by doing so the House would not be enfranchising ignorance, bigotry, and superstition, and a class subject to those particular faults; and, above all, would not be handing over that electoral power to persons utterly unable to hold the status of citizens in any ordinary sense. The Seconder of the Amendment had said that the House and the Government never showed any respect to Irish opinion or Irish Petitions. Well, he knew something about the Sunday Closing Bill, and he believed that the House and the Government had submitted to it against their will in deference to Irish opinion. Again, was the Irish Church Act and the Irish Land Act passed by Parliament because they liked those measures? He believed he was correct in saying that there was not even a division on the second reading of the Irish Land Act, though many in the House thought it an infringement of one of the great safeguards of property—the right of free contract. With regard to the Resolution, he observed that it did not deal with the question of re-distribution; because the worst thing for the borough Members would be to touch the representation of boroughs in Ireland. ["No, no!"] How was it that the eager exponents of Irish opinion were found, not in borough, but in county Members, and that, on every such occasion as this, the curriple was harnessed with the hon. and learned Member for the county Kildare and the hon. Member for the county of Tipperary? And then the settlement the House was asked to deal with had been made in a Liberal House of Commons. No division was taken on the question of going below £4. The Liberal Party agreed to it because it was a far more liberal proposition than that which had been made by Lord Carlingford the year before, when he proposed £6. It was said they ought to assimilate the law between England and Ireland; but that argument proved too much, because, in that case, they ought not to have disturbed the balance between the two countries in the case of the Land and the Church. The fact was, the House of Commons had frequently treated Ireland more favourably than England in the matter of the franchise. Ireland had a £12 county franchise for some years; while, in the English counties, the franchise was £50. It was said that this Government would give Ireland nothing but Coercion Acts; but the fact was it

Mr. Charles Lewis

cut down by two-thirds the Coercion Acts it had found in existence—it had made them a humane instead of an inhumane code. It had done away with the midnight searchings and other parts of the law which had been found harsh in operation. He often wondered why his hon. Friends opposite were so fretful about the borough franchise. Surely they had got a pretty good share of borough Members! There were 37 borough Members. Twenty of them rejoiced in the name of Home Rulers. What that meant they had not yet settled. They had had recent congresses and conferences and leagues; but, as far as the result was concerned, they had only squabbled over £300, and had not yet decided whether they should go on with three or two Leaders or with none at all. That was the condition of the Home Rulers; but they were strong in Parliament. He admitted that there were 10 Conservative Members out of the 37 borough Members; they were not particularly strong, and several of them were threatened with extinction. What was the class that was proposed to be introduced by this measure? Were they intelligent shopkeepers, or the best part of the working class — artizans, artificers, mechanics, &c., occupying a respectable position? No; they were men who lived in hovels, with members of the animal creation mixing with them. They were men who were rated at 10s. per annum; men who did not occupy among the working class that position of solidity and respectability which was the ordinary character of the working class in all our great towns, and which they would find, no doubt, in the great towns in Ireland. They used to hear great speeches about what was intended and what would be done by every series of reform measures; that they would enfranchise intelligence; that they would enfranchise those who had been educated, those who were educating themselves, and who were a credit to the country to which they belonged. He had no right to lay too great a stress on rent; but it was one test. Living in a respectable tenement was a great social test. The vast majority of the persons who were proposed to be brought in were rated below £2. To extend the franchise to such people would be to degrade it. Would the class proposed to be brought in be men who read newspapers, who gave attention to the discussion of great public events, home and foreign? Would they be free from improper influence, or, on the other hand, would they be amenable to clerical influence? Would they go to the poll to express their own convictions, or the wishes of the Church to which they belonged? He did not wish to say anything against any particular religious community, but when the whole of Europe was trying to resist priestly influence—when it was being resisted in England, whether on the part of one Church or another, he asked the House not to do anything to extend the priestly influence of any Church. In all the boroughs of Ireland, except the large boroughs of Belfast, Cork, and Dublin, there were only 24,463 male occupiers rated over £4. There were in those boroughs no less than 34,806 male occupiers rated at £4 and under. So that this proposal would bring in 10,000 more than the total number of existing voters. The English Reform Act of 1867 did nothing approaching that. He would include the three large boroughs of Belfast, Cork, and Dublin. In the whole borough constituency of Ireland there were 73,623 occupiers rated above £4; at and under £4 there were 56,902, or about 45 per cent of the whole were rated at and under £4. Now, he asked the House to consider whether they ought not to give a little weight to property and valuation. What was the valuation of the property of the two classes? The valuation of those rated above £4 was £1,226,000, while that of the class rated at and under £4 was £116,000, or an average valuation of £2 per head. In Galway, out of 3,554 houses, 1,896 were rated at and under £2. Galway returned two Members. There were 2,173 out of the 3,564 houses in Drogheda that were rated under 40s. In Waterford, out of 4,544 houses, there were 1,878 rated under 40s. In 1866 there were in the whole of the Parliamentary boroughs of England only 130,256 male occupiers under £4, while there were 1,222,300 above that amount; or, in words, one-tenth under and nine-tenths above it. Let the House compare these figures with those which he had given with respect to Ireland, which showed that more than one-half the male occupiers were under £4. The Government was threatened with all sorts of pains and penalties if they did not do for Irish borough constituencies what they did for the English constituencies in 1867; but he denied that the Government had done in 1867 what they were called upon to do now for Ireland. They gave a wide and liberal extension of the borough franchise; but they did not do for England what they were asked to do for Ireland by its so-called friends, but real enemies—namely, to transfer the electoral power to the lowest, the most ignorant, and the most debased of the population. One of the great arguments in favour of the Reform Act of 1866 was that the people demanded it, and that demand was backed up by the intelligence of the country. But had there been any demand by the Irish people for this measure? He did not allude to professional agitators, whether they were found upon the Benches of the House of Commons, in Town Councils, or other public bodies in Ireland. He asked what public opinion in Ireland had been manifested in favour of this Motion? He had again investigated the Report on Public Petitions for 1876, 1877, and 1878, to see if he could discover a scintilla of evidence that the people of Ireland, even under the tutelage of professional agitators, clerical and lay, had presented a single Petition; and the result was not a single Petition from any one of those Parliamentary boroughs that were so ill-treated, because they had not a more popular franchise. It was said, however, that the proposal was supported by the Town Councils of both the North and South of Ireland. Well, in reply to that assertion, he would merely observe that in the Town Council of Derry, whose members were equally divided so far as politics were concerned, not a single resolution on the subject of the borough franchise had been brought forward for the last three or four years, and that it was only at some Home Rule meeting that it had been discussed. But, at the same time, he was prepared to admit that the state of the representation of the boroughs of Ireland was simply scandalous. The whole of the constituencies of Manchester and Liverpool contained a population larger than the entire borough population of Ireland, and the former returned only six, while the latter returned 37 Members. There were no less than 10 boroughs in Ireland with a population of only 7,000; and how were large constituencies, he would ask, to be formed out of the materials which hon. Gentlemen opposite had at their disposal? The fact was that they seemed to be prepared to endow four-footed constituencies, if they could not get any other; and if they could not do that, they would, as the next best thing, endow those who lived with four-footed constituents. But to compare the position of the Irish boroughs and counties together, he would just point out that, while the former, with a population of 866,000, had 39 Members, including two which had been disfranchised, the counties, with a population of 4,548,713, had only 64 Members. The counties, therefore, had twice the population, but not twice the representation, of the boroughs. The adoption of the change proposed would be no real remedy for the existing scandalous state of the borough representation. No more serious question in connection with Ireland could be submitted to the judgment of the House. They would soon have before them that hardy annual, the Motion of the hon. Member for the Border Boroughs (Mr. Trevelyan) for the assimilation of the county and borough franchise, and, of course, it would be argued that what was good for England was good also for Ireland, so that the practical result of a departure from the settlement of 1867 would be recklessly to enfranchise every miserable cottier and hut owner from the Giant's Causeway to Cape Clear; and among its further results, though he was unwilling to say anything against any denomination, he was bound to mention the effect that the measure would have in sweeping away from the field of electoral power many of the most loyal and most respectable of the electors. Moreover, it would, in the end, wholly exclude from Parliament all the representatives of the Protestant religion. ["No, no!"] He was not speaking without his book, as he held in his hand a quotation from a Liberal Irish newspaper, published in his own city, in which, at a Liberal registration meeting held two months ago, the chairman of the meeting had said—

"The equalization of the county and borough franchise will place in the hands of the Catholics of the cities, and probably also in the hands of the Catholics of the counties, the whole burden of political power, or, at least, by far the most important proportion of it.

Mr. Charles Lewis

He entirely concurred in the belief that such would be the effect of the proposed change, and that if the whole electoral power were placed in the hands of persons whose rating was under £4, the best and most respectable class of electors would be obliterated. There were stronger reasons even than those connected with religion—reasons in reference to good order and public tranquillity—for keeping political power in the hands of those who would exercise it wisely, and would not make it an instrument for insulting and degrading the country. Within the last four-and-twenty hours a public meeting was held at Mitchelstown in connection with the approaching Election for the county of Cork. There was a great disturbance, and the only one who could get a hearing was a man known as the "Galtee Boy." This person was loudly cheered when he applied the most cruel and insulting epithets to Mr. Bridge. ["Hear, hear!"] Would anyone say "Hear, hear!" to the next passage he would read? "His (the Galtee Boy's) admirers further displayed their feelings by giving cheers for the Zulus." [Laughter.] Was it a matter to be laughed at by Members of that House that at a time when they were mourning the loss of many brave men who had died in the service of their country, there could be found one in the form of a man to lift up his voice and cry—"Three cheers for the Zulus!" He envied not the man who could cheer even ironically such a sentiment as that. The incident to which he had referred gave point and force to his objection to extend the franchise to classes amongst whom such things were possible; and when the Liberal Members were appealed to on this subject, he asked them to look at what had been done by men who were the prey of agitators and demagogues, and to refuse their assent to a measure which would have the effect of swamping the wealth, the intelligence, and the respectability of the country.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should detain the House only a very short time. The question had been so often debated that it was not necessary to go at any great length over the arguments which had been urged for and against the proposal. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) had brought forward the Motion with the same moderation and ability which characterized his speech of last year. Taking an interest in the question, he desired to refresh his memory as to the arguments which would probably be used against the Motion on the present occasion. With that view, he had read the speech of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) delivered last year, and he found that though it was not quite as impassioned as that which he had just made, it yet contained very much the same arguments. The only fresh arguments adduced were that the results of the measure would be the loss of 10 Conservative Members, and that very few Town Councils had petitioned in favour of it. He should be surprised if they had, seeing that the municipal franchise in Ireland was very high indeed. The question was a very narrow one to his mind. It was simply this—whether household suffrage, which already existed in English and Scotch boroughs, should not also be established in Ireland? The burden of proof lay with their opponents, as the treatment of Ireland was exceptional and needed explanation. For his part, he would be equally ready to apply the same argument to the case of the county franchise, if they were dealing with that question, and to show that an uniform suffrage should exist throughout the Kingdom. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) had maintained that there were totally different conditions in England and in Ireland. The hon. Member took his artificial line of £4, and said that there was a vastly larger number of householders below that rental in Ireland than in England. But was that the principle of the English Reform Bill? The hon. and learned Member for Kildare had dwelt on the fact that a £4 rent was higher in Ireland than the same rent would be in England, and it was true that the whole of the circumstances in regard to the payment of rent was different in the two countries. It happened that rents were considerably cheaper in Ireland than in England; but surely that furnished no reason why a man should be enfranchised in the one case and not in the other! When household suffrage was granted to England, it was granted in order to get rid of the money qualification for the franchise, and to substitute for it the qualification of being the head of a household. That was household suffrage. Every man occupying the position of a householder was to get a vote. If the hon. Member for Londonderry could show that the Irishmen to whom he had given all these bad names had not the hearthstones for which the qualification was given, then he would have a strong argument. The hon. Member had also repeated an argument they had heard over and over again 10 years ago—that the large number of fresh voters that would be introduced were not fit to have the franchise. But in England they had encountered this danger with their eyes open, and it had not come to much. Then, again, there would not be a greater increase in the Irish constituencies than there had been in the English; but he recollected that when the last Reform Bill was passed it was contended that the boroughs would be swamped. Well, his constituency, under that Bill, increased from a little over 5,000 to 26,000; yet he had not been swamped. He was in just the same position now as before; and what was more—and from this hon. Members should take heart of courage—there was the same respect to integrity, education, and ability, and the same legitimate influence of property as there was before the franchise was lowered. He was greatly surprised at the language used by the hon. Member for Londonderry, coming, as it did, from the Member for an Irish constituency. If such words had been used by an English Member, he would not soon have heard the end of it. The hon. Member said if the greatly increased number of voters were brought in, “ignorance, bigotry, and superstition would have influence over them;” and he designated this portion of the population as the “lowest, most ignorant, and the most debased.” That was the strongest charge he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had ever heard made by a Member of Parliament against his fellow-citizens. It was not for him to vindicate the Irish people, but he would say this—that he did not believe the new voters in Ireland would be less fitted for the franchise than the new voters in England after the passing of the Bill in 1867. It was only necessary to show that there was no such difference between English and Irish voters as to warrant an exceptional treatment. He feared that an analysis of crime in the two countries would show nothing in favour of the class that was enfranchised by the Act of 1867 in England as compared with the class that would be enfranchised in Ireland. Then, again, let them look at the question of extravagance. The hon. Member had been exceedingly emphatic about the position of the Irishman in his hovel. He seemed to think that no man ought to be allowed to vote who had an animal living in his house. For his (Mr. W. E. Forster's) part, though he was sorry there should be so low a standard of home comfort in Ireland, he thought much of it arose from a saving economy, a care for the provision of the family, and a desire to keep clear of the poor rates. Again, as to the question of drunkenness, he did not believe the working classes yielded to that temptation more in Ireland than in England. Whatever might be thought of the Sunday Closing Bill, he was of opinion that the way in which it had been received at least proved this—that in Ireland the vice of drinking was less intertwined with all the social habits of the people than it was in England. He was led to this conclusion by what he had seen himself in Galway when the Sunday Closing Bill came into operation. His hon. Friend had also urged that the lowering of the franchise in Ireland would subject the new constituencies to bigotry and superstition, and the influence of the priests. Well, there might be difficulties in ruling Ireland; but Ireland would be not less difficult to rule if the priests had no influence. In his belief, however, the extent of the influence of the Irish Roman Catholic priesthood in elections had been greatly exaggerated, as many of its members had acknowledged with mortification. That influence, however, whatever its extent might be, was generally used in favour of good order, of morality, and of self-denial—three things which went far to make a man a good citizen. In considering this question, the House must not be too much impressed by the notion that if this Resolution were carried the seats of the 10 Irish Conservative Members would be endangered. Upon the whole, would the Irish constituencies be rendered worse if the borough franchise were lowered?

Mr. W. E. Forster

He thought not. After all, the duty of an elector was somewhat analogous to that of the head of a family, and in no part of the United Kingdom were family ties more respected than in Ireland. Without instituting invidious comparisons, he might say that all classes in this country might learn much from the self-denial and self-sacrifice which the head of a poor Irish family showed in bearing great privation. The great thing that made a man a good citizen was his domestic affection, and that feeling was as strong in the breasts of the Irish labourers and artizans as in those of Englishmen. What a number of arguments had been adduced 10 years ago against giving the poor English householder a vote! He advocated giving the Irish householder in boroughs a vote in the hope that those in counties would also receive it in due course. One of the strongest reasons why he had been so earnest in advocating household suffrage in this country was that he had believed that when it was granted people would see the tremendous necessity there was for educating themselves in order to avoid the national danger that would arise from leaving the right of voting to be exercised by ignorant men; and he hoped that by giving the suffrage to the boroughs of Ireland the same necessity would be felt in that country. There would be no great difficulty in persuading the Irish people to avail themselves of means of education—for instance, it was very noteworthy how the very children who came out of hovels to run by the side of the cars carried their books and slates under their arms. He could not understand why they should not act with the same generosity towards their Irish fellow-subjects as they had towards themselves. He could not help thinking that some hon. Members opposite entertained the idea that Ireland was not fit for representative institutions; but that was an argument in favour rather of taking away all right to be represented from that country than for refusing to extend the franchise. Then it was urged that the whole system of the distribution of seats in Ireland was a bad one, and that they should remove that blot upon Irish representation before they attempted to meddle with the franchise. But in England, when the same cry had been raised, they had refused to be led away by it; and he now said—"Let us have household suffrage in Ireland first, and then let us demand a re-distribution of seats afterwards." There were several strong arguments in favour of granting this extension of suffrage to the Irish boroughs. In the first place, what had happened in 1868 in reference to this question afforded just ground for disappointment and complaint to the Irish people. Lord Mayo—whose name he could never mention without feeling the loss that the House and the country had sustained in losing him—had at the time expressed a hope that the House would, with regard to the borough franchise of Ireland, adopt the same principle that had been followed in respect of that franchise in this country. That hope, however, was not fulfilled, inasmuch as the English compound householder whose rates were paid by his landlord obtained the franchise which was withheld from his brother Irishman. Without following the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) in his figures, he might remark that it appeared that the percentage of voters to population in England and Wales was 14 per cent, while it was little more than 6 per cent in Ireland. Another argument in favour of this Resolution was to be found in the strong opinion which Irishmen themselves entertained on the subject. It was extremely difficult to understand how Her Majesty's Government, in the face of the divisions on this question in that House, could refuse to accept the principle of this Resolution; although, of course, they might not be prepared to introduce a Bill on the subject during the present Session. There was one other ground—the strongest of all, on which he would support this Motion—he believed that in itself, in its meaning, and it might be also in its consequences on the Government, the equality of treatment of Irishmen and Irish voters with Englishmen and English voters would do much to promote real union and to stay and silence the cry for disunion. There were three modes in which they might treat the Irish. The old mode, which left much bitterness behind, was to treat Ireland as a conquered country, a subject dependency, making laws for her people with no great consideration for their interests, but a very strict and careful consideration of our own. Then there was the comparatively new mode, although he had heard of it from his boyhood—the plan of separating as much as possible Ireland and Irish legislation from the English Parliament—saying to the Irish people—“Govern yourselves as much as you possibly can; at any rate, let us in England have as little to do with it as possible—as little as Austria has with Hungary.” That view was held by some of his hon. Friends; but the majority of the House did not entertain it. They advocated another view, and that was perfect union and agreement between the two countries; that they sitting there should provide for the interests of both Islands; that England, Scotland, and Ireland should consult together to protect the rights and promote the interests of Ireland in every part as much as the rights and interests of Scotland and England. That was the idea generally believed and adopted in that House; it was founded on the strong opinion and conviction of the English and Scotch people, and it had more supporters in Ireland than some of his Friends supposed. No one, he thought, would be anxious to adopt the first or conquest theory. To carry out the second theory in practice would do harm to both countries, and he honestly believed more harm to Ireland than to Great Britain. But he presumed the great majority did believe in union. If they did, they must accept its conditions. And first and foremost, unless the Irish people were treated in the same manner as the English and Scotch people, there could not be a real union between the two nations; and it was because he believed that this Motion would do much to make that union complete that he ventured urgently to press on the House its acceptance. He believed if hon. Members could get rid of every trace and remnant of the old ascendancy theory, there would be an unanimous vote in favour of his hon. and learned Friend’s Amendment.

SIR JOHN LESLIE said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down was a great traveller; but, judging from his speech to-night, it appeared there was one country at least which he had not visited, and that was Ireland, or he could not have been so ignorant as he had shown himself in dealing with this subject. His proposal was called one for the assimilation of the franchise of the two countries; but that was a fallacy. There could be no such thing as an assimilation between the classes whom the right hon. Gentleman would introduce to the franchise in Ireland and the same class in England. There was no middle class in Ireland such as existed in England. There were some people—and he was one of them—who thought to entitle any man to the franchise he ought at least to be able to write his name; but were such a qualification required in this case, it would wipe out the whole of this great constituency the right hon. Gentleman wished to foist upon Ireland. He regarded the speech of the right hon. Gentleman as another attempt to catch the fish that had so often been angled for by Liberal statesmen—the Irish vote. The fact was, as was well known to those who resided in Ireland, that this was not a real demand from the people of the country. Petitions had been spoken of; but they were non-existent, because the people who wanted the franchise had not got the power to write their names. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) had spoken of exasperating Ireland, and that reminded him that great patriots inherited proud titles. O’Connell was baptised by the nation “The Liberator;” but it had required time for one of his successors—the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell)—to be called “The Exasperator” by a grateful Irish people, in recognition of his patriotic acts. His principal claim to the title consisted in his having opposed and rejected the wise counsels of his great natural Leader, and having brought into the ranks of his own Party the quality of exasperation. He was happy to see that the “Exasperator” was not present at the moment. In conclusion, he begged to say that he was glad that this subject was to-night to be met with more interest than it had been in previous Sessions. To-night the real feeling of the Government side of the House would be shown; because there had been occasions, such as that of last year, when little interest was manifested, and a wrong impression resulted from the vote.

MR. BLENNERHASSETT said, it was the old story of “No case, abuse the plaintiff’s attorney,” with the hon. Baronet and his Friends, as the question was one above Party politics. The question before the House was a very plain and simple one, and it seemed to him almost a waste of time to go over the same ground again; but they were driven to do so once more in order to make it clear why they asked that the principles which had been applied to the English borough franchise should be applied to the Irish borough franchise, and that there should be equal treatment between the two countries on that matter. Nobody could look upon the present state of the borough constituencies of Ireland with any feeling of satisfaction. They had been told to-night, and they had often heard it before, that in the whole of Ireland there were little more than 50,000 borough electors, of whom about 28,000 were in Dublin and Belfast; the remainder, or only about 22,000, being distributed in all the other towns and cities of that country. That was not a state of things which either the House ought, or the Irish people could, look upon with anything like satisfaction. It was, at all events, desirable that those who sat in that House as Members for Ireland should represent some actual political force or electoral strength behind them; but it could hardly be supposed that the Gentlemen returned by the 22,000 voters scattered over all the towns and cities in Ireland except Dublin and Belfast were entitled to speak on behalf of the whole urban population of that country. The injustice to Ireland was made still graver when they remembered that in England and Scotland the great majority of Members were returned by borough electors, while in Ireland the great majority were elected on the more restricted county franchise. Down to the time of the Union there was no substantial difference between the electoral privileges of the two countries. In 1867 a great change was made in the English representative system. The constituencies were then re-invigorated; they took what was called "a leap in the dark," yet a leap after which they found themselves landed perfectly safe. But for Ireland they adopted a much narrower and more restricted suffrage. Their reason for doing that might have been that Ireland at the time was very much disturbed. If so, that reason no longer existed, and they could not fairly or wisely now refuse to bring a greater number of the householders in Irish boroughs within the pale of the Constitution. By maintaining the present restricted franchise in Ireland they maintained, without any sufficient justification, a humiliating difference between the people of that country and their English fellow-subjects. The red herring of re-distribution of seats had been drawn across their path; but the present question had no more connection with re-distribution than with any other matter pertaining to the representative system. The question of the franchise stood by itself; it had been and might be dealt with entirely by itself. The real issue now before them was whether they were prepared, at the General Election which must soon arrive, to say that the inhabitants of Irish boroughs should exercise in proportion the same amount of political power as the inhabitants of English boroughs? In 1867 the English borough constituency was increased from 500,000 to something like 1,500,000; while, by the present proposal, the Irish borough constituency would only be increased from something like 50,000 to 100,000. It was impossible in any representative system that the poorer class should not be the most numerous; and no doubt it was desirable that every class, opinion, and party in the country should be represented. They needed all the elements of national life. But the present proposal would not create an exclusion, as the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) seemed to suppose. The exclusion existed already, and the hon. Member ought to devise some method of securing the representation of minorities, instead of endeavouring to maintain an illogical and unreasonable restriction. There was no principle in a rental of £4, or of any other amount. Such a line was purely arbitrary, whereas household suffrage rested on a broad and intelligible principle. He did not know what effect this measure would have on Party interests; but on general considerations of public policy nothing could be more unfortunate, nothing a greater cause of regret and sorrow to every person who wished to see peace and tranquillity in the country than that the Irish people should be allowed to think for a moment that the question of their electoral privileges was decided by considerations of Party interest in the House. If this impression were allowed to prevail it would undo a great deal of the good work in recent years, and do more harm in destroying the good-feeling that ought to exist between the two countries than could be remedied by any measure the Government might devise. Another objection to the opposition to this measure was that it evinced a distrust of Ireland; and as long as the Government showed that they had no confidence in the Irish people it would be a hopeless task to attempt to conciliate them. There was only one valid ground on which the Motion might be resisted, and that was if the Government could see in it a danger to the security of public order. How could anyone imagine that the establishment of household suffrage in the boroughs of Ireland could be a danger to the security of public order? By admitting these men to the franchise they would admit them to the Constitution, ask them to take part in public life, make them feel they were citizens and not outcasts. The day could not be far distant when this measure must be carried; then why disturb public feeling and cause dissatisfaction by refusing it? Later on it must pass into law. It would be granted by Parliament in a reluctant manner, and they would get no thanks for it. A General Election was not far away. When it came, and stirred up feelings of interest in public life in the country, let it find the Irish towns in possession of their privileges of citizenship. He would, then, ask the House to remove this odious distinction, and do what they said they had so often wished to do—show equal and impartial justice to every portion of the United Kingdom.

Mr. W. E. Forster

MR. SMOLLETT said, he had listened during the last three or four years with great attention to the annual Motion on the subject of the Irish franchise made by the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon). The Resolutions he had moved implied a desire for a new Reform Bill for Ireland, and the hon. and learned Member himself brought forward a very small Reform Bill last year. The contention of the hon. and learned Member was that the inhabitants of the Parliamentary boroughs in Ireland lived under a sense of great degradation in consequence of the present extent of the franchise in that country. The miseries from which they suffered were inflicted by a Bill passed in 1868—the Irish Reform Bill—and the system then introduced, they had been told, had been continued solely for the purpose of placing a stamp of inferiority on the Celtic race, in order that the brutal Saxon should trample on the rights of the Irish people. [Major O'GORMAN: Hear, hear!] That was a sample of Irish rhodomontade which was employed in describing one of the smallest possible grievances—a grievance, in fact, which consisted of the simple circumstance that the inhabitants of borough towns in Ireland who did not pay the Poor Law rates were not entitled to enjoy the franchise. He admitted most freely that when the Reform Bills for Great Britain were under consideration in 1867 and 1868 the franchise was conferred upon occupiers in borough towns on the conditions only that they lived in the tenements a certain number of months, and were subject to the payment of the poor rate; whereas, in Ireland, in 1868, a hard-and-fast line was drawn at a £4 rating—a valuation which excluded a considerable number of men who would otherwise be admitted to the franchise. But the reasons which induced the Government at the time to draw this hard-and-fast line were declared, announced, and fully discussed, and the reasons then given were recognized by the Leaders of the great Parties in the House to be perfectly valid. Nevertheless, he was ready to admit that the Irish Reform Bill of 1868 was very incomplete and very unacceptable; and if the hon. and learned Member for Kildare would alter the terms of his Resolution and bring forward a Motion declaring that the entire representation of Ireland—which, in his (Mr. Smollett's) opinion, was as bad as well-could be—required consideration and amendment, he would certainly vote for it. For the discussions of the last two or three years in that House had abundantly shown that in the small Irish towns, and in the county towns of Ireland, there was not the smallest vitality, nor any political life whatever. In very many of them, even under a very low valuation and a low rate of rating, the constituency was lamentably small. In eight borough towns—Downpatrick, Dungannon, Ennis, Kinsale, New Ross, Mallow, Portarlington, and Youghal, the aggregate population slightly exceeded 40,000, souls, and the average number of the constituency did not amount to more than 230 voters in each borough. It had been asserted that in many Irish boroughs one-half of the rated houses were valued at 40s. of yearly rent and under. It was admitted that there were some 17,000 tenements in Irish towns rated at 20s. of annual value and under that. That was a state of things which hon. Members of that House were practically unacquainted with. The towns that he had indicated ought to be at once swept out of the electoral map as centres of direct Parliamentary representation. If Irish reform were taken in hand, the question must be treated boldly. The incidence of the Poor Law rating would possibly require alteration; but certainly, so long as electoral right largely depended on rating and upon valuation, common sense suggested that a real and not a sham valuation should be enforced both in boroughs and in counties throughout Ireland. He had said that the Irish Reform Act of 1868 was a very insufficient and defective Bill. It was so. When first introduced, the Bill professed to deal with three distinct matters—it proposed to reduce the borough franchise; next, it dealt with the disfranchisement of some small towns; and, lastly, it dealt with the distribution of these seats taken from these towns. These two latter proposals were, in the end, abandoned—most politicians admitted that these small towns were nuisances; but, strange to say, nuisances were always dear to Irishmen. In this instance Protestants and Catholics, Orangemen and Liberals, Conservatives and men with Fenian proclivities, united in declaring that the Representatives of these borough towns were the best Members Ireland possessed—and that no diminution in their numbers would be tolerated. The Cabinet in 1868, living from hand to mouth, unable to withstand this combination and anxious to make an appeal to the country, early in the autumn gave way, and struck the most valuable portion of the Bill out of it. The Ministry proceeded with the franchise clauses only, because they were practically unopposed. Lord Mayo had charge of the Bill. The second reading came off upon the 7th May, 1868, and I shall read a few sentences spoken by Lord Mayo, extracted from Hansard's Debates. He said—

“The Act was based on principles which were identical with those of the English Act. The county franchise was put at precisely the same figure, and the borough franchise was also the same, being given to every tenant who paid poor rates. It was quite true that circumstances had arisen in Ireland that, at an early period, would render an alteration in the principle of valuation necessary, but that was a question of valuation, not of the franchise. There was no substantial reason why the county franchise should be lower in Ireland than in England. With regard to the borough franchise, the point at which an occupier became liable to pay rates was £4, below that amount the occupier was exempt from the payment of rates; therefore adopting residence, and personal payment of rates as the qualification, they could not take any other amount.”—[3 Hansard, cxc. 1960.]

Mr. Chichester Fortescue, then Member for Louth, sitting upon the front Opposition Bench, for himself and Party at once gave his adhesion to this proposal. He admitted there was much to be said in favour of the course which the Government had adopted in availing themselves of the line drawn by the existing law of rating under the Irish Poor Law system, and fixing the electoral franchise at a £4 rating. Mr. Reardon, who represented Athlone, demanded manhood suffrage and 169 Members as the Irish contingent to Parliament; but this proposal was unnoticed, and the Bill was read without a division. The franchise, it would be observed, was fixed at its present limits in Ireland, on the assurance that it was based, as in England, upon occupation and rating. Now, the right of voting was proposed to be given promiscuously to all occupiers, although these were by law exempt from the payment of rates. That was certainly not proceeding to an assimilation of the law. If the system was changed, it ought to proceed upon a change in the laws of rating by enforcing the personal payment of rates, and by excluding the occupiers in default of payment. The hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) had often spoken of the injustice felt by Irishmen through the present state of the franchise. An Irishman who, when employed at Liverpool or Glasgow, was an occupier and a voter, when he returned to Ireland and lived in Belfast or Dublin, though occupying a house of value equal to that in Glasgow, found himself degraded and no longer a freeman. It was not unlikely that such cases did occasionally occur; but if they were common, the disfranchisement was occasioned by the mischief of the present system of Irish valuation, and by nothing else. That must be so, for practically the borough franchise in Scotland was a franchise based upon a £4 rating. That was more particularly the case in the West of Scotland, where Irish workmen mostly congregated. The hon. and learned Member for Kildare had often alluded to the vast constituencies found in Edinburgh and in Glasgow, in contrast with those in populous Irish towns. He seemed to think that the large Scotch constituencies were swelled because every occupier was placed upon the register, and that thousands of them lived in houses of small value. That was not the case. He had in his hand a pamphlet showing the social and vital statistics of Glasgow, compiled by Mr. West Watson, the Chamberlain of the city. The great number of voters was caused by the vast number of houses rated, and rated at their true rental. Mr. Watson showed that, in round numbers, the tenements within the Parliamentary boundary amounted to 112,000—the annual value being £1,223,000. Of these, 40,000 houses were valued at £10 and upwards, 67,000 at from £4 to £10; and thus there were 107,000 tenements, with a valued rental of £4 and upwards in the city of Glasgow. The occupiers of these composed 49 out of 50 of all the registered electors of the city. There were about 5,500 occupied tenements in Glasgow, valued at an annual rental of £18,000. But in that section of the population not more than one in four of the tenements gave a qualification, because the population of the rookeries was migratory, and because many men did not occupy their dwellings for a year, and because many did not personally pay their rates. Possibly there might be 1,250 registered electors on the list of voters occupying houses under £4 valuation. But, practically, the voting power in Glasgow was vested in male occupiers of £4 valuation and upwards—the franchise which in Ireland was held to be a degradation to the Celtic race. The same observations applied to the city of Edinburgh, with a population of 170,000 inhabitants, and with 26,000 electors. It was needless to go into the statistics of that city in detail; but last year the senior Member for Edinburgh told him (Mr. Smollett) that virtually that great constituency was composed of occupiers in the city at a £4 rating and upwards. It might be asked—What was the state of affairs in provincial towns? Well, he lived in the vicinity of a borough town—namely, Dumbarton; and during the present winter he had inquired into the electoral position of that town. Dumbarton had a resident population of 11,000 or 12,000 souls. On the electoral roll there were about 1,800 names, mostly workmen, and some hundreds were Irishmen. There were only 37 tenements in Dumbarton rated at less than £4 of annual rental, and not one in four of those conferred the right of voting on the occupier. Many of those Irish workmen lived in houses rated at £6 annually, and every one of them would be entitled to a vote if they occupied a similar dwelling-house in Belfast or in Dublin. If they were disfranchised, their exclusion must arise from the mischievous working of the Irish Valuation Act, which called for immediate amendment and reform. In the principal cities of Ireland, he believed that one-third of the occupiers were excluded from the franchise because their tenements were improperly valued. How was the valuation in Scotland made? The machinery was very simple. In every borough there was a functionary called an assessor. That official was appointed by the municipality. There was no restriction in the choice of the man, but 19 times out of 20 the choice fell upon the Government surveyor of taxes in the locality. That gentleman was selected because he understood his work, and because the valuation being needed for Imperial uses, if the Government official was appointed by the municipality, the work was done without a charge upon the town. The assessor was invested with large powers. It was his duty to make a rigid inquiry into the annual value of the town. He required from every proprietor a schedule, showing the particulars of his holding, the name of the occupier, the amount of rent paid, and the nature of the tenure. Any person making a false return was subject to a fine of £50. When parties owned and occupied their own tenements, the rent was fixed by the assessor, on his own judgment. An appeal was permitted to the magistrates of the town. In that way a perfectly correct account was got at of the real rental of the borough. The rate was levied on the rental, and from the valuation based on rent no abatement was made to the occupier. The Valuation Roll, framed each year, was the basis of the electoral roll which was compiled by the assessor. If any errors were committed, the matters were subject to revision in the registration courts. In that way, and under that system, it was seen that, in Scotland, household franchise subject to the payment of rates resolved itself into a £4 rental and rating, and that satisfied the ambition of Scotland. But how did they manage things in Ireland? Why, there was no system in that country at all. In Ireland there was a valuation made by a central authority some 40 years ago, and known as "Griffith's Valuation." That valuation was purposely made in town and country upon very insufficient data, and upon the lowest possible estimate when there was depression in the land. At the present time, and after such a lapse of years, that valuation was obsolete and worthless. Yet it had never been revised, and he was credibly informed no alteration of the valuation in hereditaments could be made without the sanction of an Act of Parliament. Yet no efforts were ever made to get that Irish nuisance abated, although the electoral rights and electoral privileges of the people depended largely on an honest valuation. In Ireland that valuation was no test of value or of rent, which any honest valuation ought to be. The fact was universally confessed. Last year, when the present question was discussed, the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) stated that one-half of the people of Limerick lived in dwellings rated agreeably to this Irish valuation of 40s. of annual rent, and a great number of them in dwellings valued at 20s. a-year. On that, the junior Member for the city asserted that the lowest tenements in Limerick were let at not less than £2 12s. of annual rent. That was possibly quite true, and that was, no doubt, the reason why many hundreds of the citizens of Limerick were excluded from the franchise, to which, under a £4 valuation, they were entitled. They lived under a rascally and abominable Valuation Act. Well, he would not detain the House longer. He would not support the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Kildare, which involved a small change in a matter which ought to be dealt with in a broad and comprehensive manner. If they were to believe what they read in public journals, a Dissolution was not far off. They were told a Liberal Ministry would soon be in Office, and they knew the Party opposite was pledged to huge measures of electoral change. They knew the Liberal Party would propose household suffrage throughout the Empire, coupled with, to a great extent, equal electoral districts. With these happy prospects looming in the immediate future, he would advise the hon. and learned Member for Kildare not to divide upon this small matter of the Irish borough franchise; for the whole subject would be dealt with in a bold, although, perhaps, in a revolutionary, fashion by the next Parliament.

Mr. Smollett

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) had so fully set out the arguments in favour of the Resolution that he would not re-enter upon them, but would confine himself to replying to the opponents of the Resolution, and would not detain the House long. He was of opinion that a glaring anomaly had been clearly established, which imperatively demanded a remedy. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) would deny them any remedy, and had stated that the new Irish constituency would be wholly dissimilar to that which was created by the English Reform Bill of 1867; and, further, that the contemplated measure would not be acceptable to Irish borough Members. Well, his answer was that he, as a borough Member, was prepared to support it. The hon. Member had, as usual, called up the hobgoblin of re-distribution of seats; and, indeed, appeared to apprehend that he would himself be got rid of if the measure were carried out. But the hon. Member appeared to forget that when the Liberal Government fell with their Reform Bill of 1866, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, then, and now Premier, introduced and passed a Reform Bill going to a lower level than Lord Russell's Bill, and that he and his Party had reaped, and were reaping, the reward of it. The hon. Member for Londonderry need not, therefore, he thought, if he helped to pass this measure, shake in his shoes in respect of his fate in the time-honoured city he represented. Another hobgoblin the hon. Gentleman conjured up was priestly influence. The hon. Gentleman asked, was Parliament now to set up priestly influence in Ireland when every other country in Europe was setting it at nought? Well, he did not himself admire priestly influence as a predominant feature in politics, nor the undue influence of clergymen of any denomination; but they should remember that the clergy were an educated class, and that even in politics they had a right to more or less influence, and it was, in his mind, an influence of which they had no reason to be afraid. This hobgoblin was a penny-farthing rushlight in a scooped out turnip with which the hon. Member wished to frighten the House. And now, he would ask, had things gone on so well in Europe since priestly influence was set at naught, in North Germany, in Spain, and in other countries? Was there ever a more unfortunate time to refer to the priestly influence in Ireland on politics? It would not be too great; it was too little. In respect to the observations of the last speaker (Mr. Smollett) with regard to the valuation of Ireland, that question was simply trotted out, and in his views with regard to it he was altogether wrong. It was true the valuation was not based—as he should like it to be—upon rental; but the valuation was not open to all the objections which had been taken to it. It had been approached on purely scientific principles; and if it were carried out in detail upon the principle on which it was framed, very little fault, he believed, could be found with the result. As there were many other speakers to follow he would not detain the House longer.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, as it was possible that was the last occasion on which the question before the House would be discussed in the present Parliament, he was not willing to give a silent vote on the Motion. There were, he thought, several points of view from which the question might be considered. Was it right or just that the Irish should possess the same privileges as their English and Scotch brothers? Was it desirable that distinctions and differences, so far as political rights were concerned, should exist between them? It seemed to him that many of the arguments of hon. Members on his side of the House were inapplicable to the question, because they appeared to him to be directed against all reform and against all popular extension of the franchise as a general principle. Coming to the argument ad hominem, he thought it was possible to discuss this question by considerations of whether the lower class of the Irish were as intelligent, as well educated, and as fully entitled to the franchise as the same class in England. He did not think these were comparisons which that House ought to draw in discussing such a question as the present. He should not go into the question as to whether the class in Ireland who possessed the franchise were practically the same as the class who possessed it in England; or whether the same class who in Ireland were deprived of the right to vote would, under similar circumstances, be deprived of it in England. He admitted that if the House were to go into the consideration of the abstract questions he had mentioned it would be difficult to refuse assent to the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member. Turning, however, to the practical point of view of the subject two questions appeared to him to arise—first, whether it was expedient to effect, at the present moment, an extensive measure of electoral reform with regard to Ireland; and, secondly, whether such a step, if adopted, would prove to be beneficial to the country? Having voted in favour of the principle of this Resolution on a former occasion, he was anxious now to state the reasons that had induced him to change his opinion on the subject. He was very doubtful as to whether it was the province of the State to force the franchise upon a population which did not manifest any desire for it. A residence of three years in Ireland had satisfied him that there was not any popular demand such as would warrant the House in passing the Resolution, unless it was, at the same time, convinced that the change proposed was for the benefit of Ireland, and that the exercise of the rights so granted would be for the general good of the community. He did not think anyone who had a knowledge of Ireland could say there was such a demand for the extension of the borough franchise. Where were the signs that one generally looked for as the indication of popular opinion? Where were the Petitions in favour of this Resolution? Where were the mass meetings? and to go further, he would ask, where were the popular tumults in favour of this measure? He might remind hon. Members opposite that it was not very difficult to get up a little popular excitement in Ireland on any subject of general interest. Hon. Members, however, might go to any town in that country, and, putting aside the Land Question, they would find it extremely difficult to get up any excitement in favour of pure electoral reform. There was so utter an absence of popular feeling on this subject that the House would not be justified in accepting the Resolution now before it, unless it had evidence that it would be for the benefit of Ireland. Would it be for the benefit of that country? There was a marked difference between the class in England which was enfranchised by the last Reform Bill and the class which it was now proposed to enfranchise in Ireland. In the case of the former, they were not under the conviction that they were a conquered and persecuted race, who had been held in subjection for centuries by masters who were alien in origin and religion, and who had wrongfully possessed themselves of the land which ought to belong to the people; and there was scarcely any appreciable danger that ideas or objects subversive of the Constitution or of the laws of the Realm would make any headway amongst the new constituencies. Such ideas were not prevalent in Ireland at the present time—certainly not amongst the classes who enjoyed the franchise. The abolition of a hated Established Church, the alteration in the Land Laws, the more liberal and friendly spirit which existed on the subject of education, had entirely banished such ideas from their minds. But if they descended amongst the masses of the Irish people they would come upon distinct traces of such a feeling, upon an inborn suspicion, which governed and accounted for many of their actions, that the Saxon was an hereditary foe, and that the connection with England was the ruin of Ireland. Traces of these ideas did remain and were sedulously fostered by The Nation, and other organs of the so-called national Press. A danger, therefore, did exist with regard to this measure which did not exist in England or Scotland. The first instinct of the newly-enfranchised classes, with their defective means of information, would be to attempt to pay off old scores, and to return men to Parliament pledged to the Repeal of the Union, the disintegration of the Empire, the arrest and confusion of Public Business, and the most revolutionary ideas as to the possession of the land. Hon. Members were aware that there had been a serious difference of opinion in the Home Rule Party as to the manner in which its Members should act. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had the almost unanimous support of those voters in Ireland who were neither Liberal nor Conservative; while the hon. Member for Meath and his Friends drew what support they got from the unenfranchised classes. He did not wish to say anything to annoy the hon. Member for Meath; but he must say that he drew his support from the mob. ["Oh, oh!"] He would put it in another way. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick, in the policy which he was seeking to establish, had the support of the educated, the industrious, and the loyal classes who had the franchise; while the enthusiastic audience that they were constantly reading of in the Irish newspapers rallied round that interesting quartet, the Members for Meath, Cavan, Mayo, and Dungarvan, and were composed, as every impartial Irishman would admit, almost entirely of the ignorant, idle, and drunken. ["Oh!"] He would put it in this way, then—that the most mad and scatter-brained policy which had ever been conceived by any man or party of men found its sole adherents, not in the Irish who had votes, but in those who had no votes, and to whom it was now proposed to give votes. ["No!"] Hon. Gentlemen were interrupting one who had the fortune to reside a good deal in Ireland, and who knew what he was saying. There had been two Elections in Ireland lately, and he would ask why was not Mr. George Delaney returned for the borough of New Ross? [Major NOLAN: Because the franchise has not been lowered.] It was because the hon. Member for Meath went down and spoke for him.

MR. SPEAKER desired the noble Lord to address himself to the Chair.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he was endeavouring to establish the incapacity of the unenfranchised classes for deciding political problems; but he would not pursue that point. If the House carried this Motion, it would give to the hon. Member for Meath that superiority to the hon. and learned Member for Limerick which up to now he had striven fruitlessly to obtain; and the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) did not shake his head at that. What would be the consequence if the hon. Member for Meath found himself at the head of a considerable following obliged to support him, he having arrived at the conclusion that no concessions were to be obtained by conciliating any English Ministry? Would it not be likely to exasperate English feeling, and to prejudice the fair consideration of Irish measures, if the hon. Member and his Friends were to find a numerous and enthusiastic support among the newly-enfranchised classes? The hon. and learned Member for Kildare and his Friends advocated this measure because they were honestly convinced that it remedied an Irish grievance; but the hon. Member for Meath and his supporters, knowing that Home Rule was dead amongst the existing constituencies, advocated it on different grounds, and in order to obtain popular support amongst the classes whom it was proposed to enfranchise. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) hoped the House would not make itself the accomplice and the victim of the scheme. In Ireland they had to deal with a phenomenon which did not exist in this country; there were secret societies, the traces of whose influence was constantly seen in vacant farms that nobody would take, in assaults, and in murders of men of a certain class, like the murder of Lord Leitrim. They could not convince a peasant that if he voted against the bidding of a secret society the fact would not be ascertained and retribution fall upon him. The peasant did not want the vote, because it would be to him a fresh source of anxiety and vexation. [Major NOLAN: Not under the Ballot.] He would be pulled different ways by the landlord, the employer, the priest, and the secret society; and he had not yet learnt the value of the Ballot. The absence of any popularity or enthusiasm in support of this demand, the extreme doubtfulness as to the benefit that would result from granting it, and the want of capacity on the part of the lower classes to decide political questions ought to make the House pause before it assented to the Motion. A knowledge of Ireland, of its history, of its circumstances, and of the aspirations of some of its people, ought to convince Members of the Opposition that there were forces in existence that should modify the extension of the franchise in that country. The most influential and, perhaps, the best written paper of Ireland—The Freeman's Journal—admitted that if the franchise were extended a "clean sweep" would be made not only of the avowed enemies, but of the insincere friends of the popular cause, and the Irish Party in Parliament—which meant that of the hon. Member for Meath—would be greatly augmented. If the House rejected the Motion, it would act in accordance with the views of many intelligent Irish people and with the secret wishes of the most influential and wisest of the Catholic clergy—not bad judges—and not against the wishes of the great majority of those whom it was proposed to enfranchise. He should be asked—"Must these distinctions always prevail, and shall the time never come when there may be perfect political equality?" He believed the time was not far distant; if he thought otherwise, he should despair of Ireland and be alarmed for the permanence of peaceful union. But he believed there was a most favourable change in the feelings of the population—a change which it was in the power of Her Majesty's Government to assist and accelerate if they would be more anxious to legislate on certain subjects than they seemed to be. When a wider diffusion of knowledge and experience should have taught the Irish peasant to take a more reasonable view of the past and a wiser hope of the future; when a different spirit should pervade the popular Press and animate the utterances of the priest; when agrarian crime and secret societies should disappear, and assassins should not only be arrested but convicted; then, but not till then, would be the time when it would be safe to extend the borough franchise in Ireland. He should give his vote to-night from no leaning to obstinate prejudice, from no desire to perpetuate distinctions which he admitted were, to a certain extent, anomalous and invidious; but after a most careful consideration of the question he had come to the conclusion that, under present circumstances, the extension of the borough franchise in Ireland would be productive of most mischievous and deplorable results; not so much to England as to Ireland itself, and, therefore, he felt bound to vote against the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Kildare.

MR. LAW said, he had listened with great attention to the speech of the noble Lord so as, if possible, to learn the reasons which had induced him to change the views he had formerly expressed on this subject; but all he could discover was that the noble Lord ascribed every insurrectionary and disloyal person in

Lord Randolph Churchill

Ireland to the class that would be enfranchised by this proposal, and that he dreaded lest the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) should, in some mysterious way, be magnified as against the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) by the adoption of such a measure as the Resolution indicated. He (Mr. Law), however, submitted that these could not be gravely alleged as sufficient grounds for withholding from Ireland a right which the noble Lord had frankly admitted on former occasions by his vote in that House. And yet he must say no better reasons had yet been given for this policy of resistance. Of course, all the venerable arguments urged by Sir Charles Wetherell and the old Tories of some 50 years ago against any extension of the constituencies had been reproduced now once more, as they were in 1867, when the present Prime Minister proposed a household suffrage for the English boroughs. Lord Beaconsfield then truly said it was impossible that the franchise could ever be finally based on any mere money value; there being no principle or reason in a £4, or £5, or £6 franchise. He gave figures to show that the result of the extension proposed would be ultimately to double the borough voters in England. This calculation, indeed, fell far short of the reality. As already stated in the present debate, many of the English borough constituencies had been not merely doubled, but increased three, four, five, and sixfold, and even more—and that without any evil results—nay, on the contrary, with advantage to the country. Yet, what did those who there acted the part of Cassandra prophesy? Did not the present Foreign Minister angrily exclaim that all the capital, wealth, and intelligence of the country would be submerged under a flood of numbers? Well, then, as all such gloomy prophecies had been falsified in England, what rational fears could be entertained as to the consequences of a much lesser extension of the borough franchise in Ireland? The principle he (Mr. Law) contended for was that the headship of a family was the best security that could be given by a voter for the faithful discharge of his duty to the State. To use Lord Beaconsfield's words, "All the State had a right to ask was that a voter should not be a migratory pauper." And as household suffrage pure and simple was established, and, like all previous extensions of the franchise, had done immense good in England, why should they not deal with Ireland in the same way? It was, he (Mr. Law) ventured earnestly to say, unworthy of the House to consider the question whether the equalization of the English and Irish borough franchise would have a favourable effect on Catholics or Protestants. 'Some of the figures quoted by his right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) were very significant. The percentage of voting power in England and Scotland was, it appeared, 14 per cent. In Ireland it was only 6 per cent. In England, according to other authorities, at the lowest, one man in 15 had a vote; whereas, in Ireland, only one man in 30 had a vote. And yet there was nothing to justify that difference. But, again, hon. Members should bear in mind that in Ireland a £4 rating, under the General Tenement Valuation Acts, was, in reality, a £6 rental; and, having regard to the date at which the valuation of tenements was made—namely, just after the Famine—it was not far from representing what was now an £8 rental in most of the towns. But, further, considering the difference in the demand for houses in Ireland and in England, a house rented in Ireland at £6 would probably bring double that amount in an English town; and, therefore, hon. Members, whilst they insisted on having the Irish borough franchise based on the possession of a house rated at £4, were really requiring for the Irish voter a qualification equal to what would be a £10 or £12 rental qualification in England. One argument against this Resolution was that the present was an improper time for the reform it proposed. But they never knew any measure of reform that was not met with an argument of that kind. There never could be a proper time for a measure of reform which hon. Gentlemen did not like. Again, it was objected that this was a fragmentary measure, inasmuch as it was not accompanied by a proposal for a re-distribution of seats. But how would this Resolution bind the House against a re-distribution of seats? The Resolution merely affirmed that the franchise in England and Ireland should be assimilated. If this involved re-distribution of seats, let it be so. Those at his (Mr. Law's) side of the House were quite prepared to accept it. The only other argument he (Mr. Law) had heard was that of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis), who opposed the Resolution on the ground that the assimilation of the Irish to the English borough franchise would endanger some Conservative seats in Ulster. It was, however, he (Mr. Law) submitted, somewhat unpatriotic to oppose an extension of the franchise for any such narrow Party reasons, or because the change might give a preponderating amount of electoral influence to voters of one religious persuasion or another. Indeed, the argument seemed to answer itself, for it involved the admission that the existing constituencies did not fairly represent the real opinion of the Irish boroughs. These opinions he (Mr. Law) assumed it was the object of our Parliamentary system to ascertain and provide with proper means of expression in that House. If, then, that was the principle, he would say, let the just rights of the Irish people be conceded, and no fear need be entertained as the result. A great deal had been said about the franchise being a privilege, a trust, for the benefit of all, and so forth. Well, be it so. Those on his (Mr. Law's) side of the House thought it was an advantage to the country to enlist the greatest possible number of men in Constitutional action;—to bring, as many as safely might be, within the pale of the Constitution. Why should Ireland what it had given to the people of England? It was idle to expect the Irish people to be contented unless you conceded that equality of political rights which they were fairly entitled to demand. It seemed to him that the only way of bringing about that harmony, which was so much desired by all, that real consolidation and union of the Kingdom, was by doing precisely to Ireland what they did to England; and he hoped the time would yet come when, in such matters as they were now discussing, there would be no separate Act for England, Ireland, or Scotland, but one measure for all parts of a really United Kingdom. The urgent Whip issued on this occasion by the Government was, he (Mr. Law) feared, the most unwise thing they could have done, for it showed they were determined roughly to override the wishes of the Irish people by the strongest majority they could get. In conclusion, he gave a hearty support to the Resolution, and would rejoice if he could believe that Her Majesty's Government would even, at the last moment, assent to the principle, and hold out some hopes that, if not this Session, at least in the next, they would introduce a measure to give effect to it.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that, as one of the Representatives of a very large English borough, he desired to express his cordial sympathy with the Resolution—sympathy which he believed was shared by almost the whole of his constituents. They were not alarmed by the terrible prediction of evil which had been made that night and on previous occasions. They had had experience of the result of a very great extension of the franchise in England, and they had not yet found that their institutions had been at all endangered, or that their lives and property had been jeopardized—on the contrary, they believed that it had been established that, just in proportion as they brought within the pale of the Constitution the great bulk of the people, so did they secure their loyalty, and they found that the people endeavoured to secure their ends only by Constitutional means. He was surprised at some of the arguments which had been advanced from the other side of the House, and he recollected that similar arguments were used in reference to late extensions of the franchise in this country. Then it was declared that many of the artizans who were claiming their share in the representation were disaffected Republicans and Chartists, and that to hand over to them the power which they desired would be very seriously to endanger life and property. It appeared to him that the best way of securing the loyalty of the Irish people was to yield with a good grace to their legitimate demands, and not to wait until there was a popular tumult, in consequence of which they would have to yield to their fears what they refused to the justice of the case. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) used most extraordinary arguments. He gave as one reason why they should not now concede this last claim of the Irish people that in times past another Government had conceded to their wishes in respect to the Irish Church and the Irish Land, by which they abolished what seemed to many of them monstrous injustices which ought not to have continued so long. These concessions were only made after one of the Fenian risings, which caused so much anxiety and trouble at the time. It was a much easier and more Conservative course for the Government to take, having recognized the justice of the case, to yield to it, and not wait for such pressure as the noble Lord opposite suggested would be put forth. It was said the Irish people were apathetic on this question. In what way was the popular opinion of Ireland to be expressed? He remembered that exactly the same thing was said in reference to the English people. When his right hon. Friend and Colleague was addressing large public meetings in different parts of the country, it was said he was flogging a dead horse; and it was only when the Government found the irritation of the country taking a practical form in the shape of pulling down Hyde Park railings that it was convinced of its error, and that there was a real desire for reform. In regard to Ireland, they had this proof—that two-thirds of the Irish Members supported their claim. Even if the Irish people were apathetic—which he denied—on this question, it was the duty of the English people to concede to them the rights which Englishmen now enjoyed. At the present time, when the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) said that he represented the people of Ireland, he did not personally doubt him; but it would be more satisfactory if the hon. Gentleman were returned by a larger constituency than the 200 or 300 who voted for him at the last Election. The last Reform Bill had increased the constituency of Belfast from 4,000 to 20,000; but nobody said that Belfast voters were less respectable since the change. Why suppose a further change in the same direction would do greater harm? What their opponents had to prove was that there was such a marked difference between England and Ireland as would justify them in refusing to grant to Ireland what was enjoyed by England and Scotland. The measure would enfranchise the same class of voters as in England, though in Ireland they lived in a different class of houses. In Ireland the people were undoubtedly poorer; but after all that had been done of late years it was not to be said that a man was to be deprived of the franchise because of his poverty. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) said the people were afflicted with ignorance, bigotry, and superstition, and the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) that they were debased, drunken, and disloyal. Those were very extraordinary charges, considering against whom they were brought. There were 900,000 persons in the existing boroughs in Ireland, of whom 150,000 were heads of families. Only one-third of these had the franchise, and the remaining two-thirds were the persons of whom the hon. Member for Londonderry and the noble Lord spoke. The hon. Member for Londonderry did not content himself even here. He said the people mixed with the animal creation. A good many people did that. A Conservative member of the Birmingham Town Council once declared that the pig was "a particularly companionable animal," and his views were supported by the Conservative Press in the town. Bye-laws were required in all the big towns to prevent the people keeping pigs in close proximity to their dwellings; but he had never heard that the tens of thousands of people in England and Scotland who committed breaches of those bye-laws should be struck off the voters' register. He was struck with the argument used by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray), and he would give a practical illustration of that argument. In Birmingham there were 2,000 Irish voters. They lived in houses none of which were rated at anything lower than £5. But if these men went over to Ireland and lived in houses below £4 they were deprived of the vote. Would not some of those men feel the injustice of such a state of things, which seemed to put a disqualification on Irish soil? He thought it was incumbent on those who sat on both sides of the House, who could not see their way to vote for Home Rule, or for an inquiry whether the people of Ireland wanted it, to show that the English Parliament was capable of doing equal justice between the two peoples.

MR. O'REILLY remarked that all the arguments which had been used against the Motion that night had been urged before, and retracted, and it was certain that they would be retracted again. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) had argued that the proposed electors had views antagonistic to his own, and that their support was largely given to the opinions of the hon. Members for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) and County Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power). He himself had lived for some considerable time in Ireland, and would not by any means confidently predict the political creed of the class whom it was sought to introduce to the electorate; on that point the noble Lord might or might not be correct; but he could not seriously ask the House to refuse to enfranchise a body of men simply because of his own personal dislike of their political leanings. Next came the speech of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) which might be said to be the speech of the evening. There was much in that speech to which he took exception. The hon. Member had talked dramatically of his principle and independence; but that which shook his noble soul was really his fear of some change in the constituency of Londonderry. The hon. Member had spoken in unjustifiable language of the Irishmen who had sent him to Parliament. It was unworthy of him to speak of the Irish people as degraded, besotted, ignorant, corrupt, and superstitious, and as living in hovels, with, forsooth, garrets in them. It was stated that the franchise was not a right, but a privilege. There was a time in Ireland when certainly it was the privilege of a sect; but he hoped they were not going to return to the principles of those days. The glowing speech of the hon. Member for Londonderry must have come back upon the ears of many hon. Members as a faint and inadequate echo of the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) against the extension of the suffrage in England. On the whole, they had had to confront old arguments and old bugbears. The difficult question of the re-distribution of seats had been mentioned as part and parcel of the controversy respecting the franchise; but the common-sense view of the matter was that the extension of the suffrage should precede schemes of re-distribution, to which, if they were moderate and reasonable, he should not be opposed. Then, again, they had been told that little or no interest was taken in the subject in Ireland. That he ventured to deny, though he could not call it a burning question. The Irish constituencies and their Representatives were not blind adherents of any Party. They were ready to accept with gratitude good measures from either side of the House; but at the next Election they would remember what the Chief Secretary told them last year, that he had not been responsible for any of the electoral reforms that had been carried; and that if they were free now at the polling places from any influence that might seek to control their votes, they owed it not to those who opposed it as long as they could, and who now in turn opposed the extension of the franchise which was demanded by the Motion before the House. The Irish Members might be beaten that night; but the cause they advocated was bound to triumph, and it would sweep away the barriers like the tide, the barriers raised against it, together with those who upheld such barriers.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, there had been a sort of conspiracy of silence on the other side, which was very remarkable, the more so because there was reason to believe that a large number of hon. Gentlemen opposite had suddenly changed their opinions on this question. Some of them were going to vote against the Resolution, while others would abstain from voting. One of those Gentlemen (Lord Randolph Churchill) had had the pluck to come forward and make his public confession. It was evidently much against the grain that he did so. On the 15th of last May he voted in favour of the extension of the Irish borough franchise; so that all the alarming things he now saw in the measure must have been absent from his mind less than a year ago. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) had made a violent speech, of a character more suited to a meeting in the North of Ireland than to the House of Commons. He had, in fact, made an Orange speech, and had spoken of the Catholics of Ireland in terms which he had never before heard in that House. The best answer to the hon. Member was that the Catholics of Ireland now returned 20 Protestant Members; and it was not open to anyone to declare that the addition of any large number of voters of that class to the present constituencies would be attended with danger to the Constitution. The hon. Member was a great authority upon electoral statistics; the term "wire-puller" might almost be applied to him; but he had quoted facts and figures which might easily be turned against him. His figures were based on the number of male-rated occupiers, and he had made no allowance for the important points of length of residence, duplicates, &c. Whenever the question of the re-distribution of seats had been under discussion in the House the small Irish boroughs had always been held up as what teetotal lecturers would call "dreadful examples" and "awful warnings;" but even if that were so, it made it incumbent upon them to support their Friends from Ireland when they came there, to take steps to place the representation on the footing which it should take. Hon. Members who had spoken on the other side, in dealing with figures, had picked and chosen their places. His right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had alluded in general terms to the difference of proportion between the two countries in the matter of the franchise. He was in a position to give the figures in detail. There were not nearly twice as many people living in the Scotch boroughs as there were in the Irish boroughs; but there were more than four times as many electors. There were 2,000,000 fewer people in Scotland than in Ireland, and 70,000 more electors. In England, Scotland, and Wales about 14 per cent of the population were electors in the boroughs. In Ireland the proportion was almost exactly 6 per cent. In many English boroughs the percentage was as high as 20, and in some cases 30; while in such Irish boroughs as Clonmel, Ennis, Limerick, New Ross, Wexford, and Tralee the percentage was less than 4, and in Kinsale less than 3. This was sufficient to show that the figures which had been picked and chosen by the hon. Member for Londonderry were not worthy of the attention of the House.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that the arguments used by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) were unworthy of his well-known ability. The noble Lord had admitted that on abstract principles the Resolution was justified; but argued that the persons whom the proposed measure would bring within the franchise were disloyal in feeling, and would be likely to fall under the influence of secret societies. But if there were any truth in this, it afforded the strongest argument in favour of the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon), for the best remedy against the evil would be to bring these persons within the pale of the British Constitution, and that was the platform of the Home Rule Party that evening. The same arguments that were now used against admitting the lower classes in Ireland to the franchise were used on a former occasion against the classes of highest social standing in Ireland, and by men whose intellect—like that of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock—was corrupted by the red tape of Dublin Castle; but events had shown it to be without foundation. If the people of Ireland were driven in to forming secret societies, it would be through the action of those who would exclude them from the franchise. He regretted very much that the noble Lord had seen fit to change his opinion on this question. There were men who now being outside the Constitution were the victims of secret societies and dangerous to the State; and he asked the noble Lord if he was prepared to keep them so, rather than bring them within the pale of the Constitution. What was asked for Ireland was founded on the broadest principle of justice. It was a part of the English Constitution, and he asked that the people of Ireland should be put on the same equality. They were now at the commencement of a Session which was to be devoted to domestic questions, and here was the most domestic of domestic questions. When the Irish Members came forward with larger demands than this—such as Home Rule—they were told that it could not be granted, but that English Members were willing to place the people of the two countries on a footing of equality. When, however, they asked for a measure of equality on the subject of the franchise, their demand was refused. Their request was very small, and was founded on the broad principle of justice. Five times had they asked for that equality, and five times had that measure of justice been refused them. It was said, by way of threat, that the extension of the franchise would involve a re-distribution of seats; but the supporters of the Motion were quite prepared for that contingency, although some of them might themselves be unseated. Indeed, it was a reflection on the political morality of Irish Members representing small Irish boroughs to argue that they would alter the vote they were about to give from any such consideration. They never pretended that the distribution of seats in Ireland was final or immutable, and the Irish people would not shrink from re-distribution whenever it should become necessary. He believed that the reason why hon. Members on the other side of the House opposed the Motion was that they were afraid of the result of that re-distribution; for they knew very well that if the Irish were admitted to equal electoral rights with the English, they would lose their monopoly in the representation of Belfast, Londonderry, and other large towns in the North of Ireland. Compared with those of England, Irish constituencies were certainly small, owing to the fact that the number of voters was kept down by restricting the franchise, and further reduced by unjust rating and registration laws; and yet they were told that the constituencies were too small and must be disfranchised, in whole or in part, in certain cases. It was like the old case of knocking a man down and then kicking him for falling. But the fact remained that Irish towns did not enjoy equality with English towns of the same or even a smaller population; and when, in 1867, the franchise was extended in England, the principle of disfranchising the smaller boroughs was not carried out. Why this principle should be carried out in Ireland in connection with a similar extension of the franchise there he was at a loss to conceive. The borough of Galway had a population of 19,000, and the city of Waterford had one of 29,000. If the franchise were lowered, the constituencies of those towns would be greatly enlarged; but in England they had many towns of much smaller population who returned two Members to Parliament, and yet there were hon. Members ready to maintain that the two Irish towns he had named ought only to return one Member each. The influence of the clergy in Irish elections had, of course, been referred to; indeed, it would scarcely have been a franchise debate if such had not been the case; but the reference came from one who he rejoiced to say was not an Irishman, and who had shown himself to be completely ignorant of Irish life. The remark showed a moral courage amounting to recklessness, for there was no foundation for the theory that they had exercised it in an improper manner. They, no doubt, possessed very considerable influence over the people; but it was quite as legitimate an influence as that exercised by other classes in political affairs, and their use of it contrasted very favourably with the manner in which the influences of the landlords and other classes was exercised before the voter obtained the protection of the Ballot. If such undue influence did exist, the best way to defeat it was to enfranchise these humbler classes of the people, and teach them to exercise their own opinions upon political matters free from the dictation of any man. Another argument that had been used against a liberal electoral law in Ireland was that the Irish people were a violent people, whom it would not be safe to trust with large political powers. He denied altogether that the Irish people were a violent people. As a rule, they were a quiet and inoffensive people, though sometimes they had certainly yielded to the influence of agitators. It was well known that the feeling of England and of Scotland was in favour of this measure of reform, and its defeat would be mainly due to the determination of the Irish Conservative Members to oppose it. He therefore asked them whether they had anything to gain by their resistance? Was it of any use for them to defend that fortress any longer? If they gave in, the people would become more reconciled to them than they were now. If they held out, they would create a feeling of hostility towards them in the minds of the people, which would tend to their almost total exclusion from political influence when at length it was granted in spite of their opposition, for the Irish people were growing more educated and enlightened, and the time was coming when the power of the Irish Conservative gentlemen, who could do so much for their country if they chose, would become extinct. He hoped that the day was not far distant when the English and Scotch Members would join in teaching the Irish people that all races and all creeds in Ireland were equal before the Constitution with their brethren in the rest of the United Kingdom.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER thought that before the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland closed the debate, it was desirable and just that the hon. and learned Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon) should reply to the arguments which had been put forward. It appeared to him that the opponents of the measure had already broken down in their arguments. His hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Gray) supplied by argument that which the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis) was skilful enough to evade. In fact, he evaded the whole subject, and it was to be hoped that his violent Orange speech would not pass for logic. His speech was simply a performance in fireworks; for he went up like a rocket, and came down like a stick, leaving the subject as he found it. The arguments of the hon. and learned Member for Kildare had not by any means been falsified, and it had been shown clearly that the Irish people were suffering grave injustice from the fact that a borough franchise prevailed in England and Scotland which was not existing in Ireland. The strongest reason advanced by the opponents of the Resolution was that in Ireland the mass of the people were poor. Ireland was undoubtedly a poorer country than Great Britain, and consequently there must be greater difficulty in regard to the rental value. The hon. Member for Londonderry and the noble Lord who represented Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) represented what might be called the threatened boroughs, and therefore they shrank from the question of franchise. The Parliamentary occupation of Woodstock by the noble Lord would come to an end whenever there was a re-distribution of seats; and the hon. Member for Londonderry candidly admitted last year that if a measure based on the present Resolution were passed he should no longer represent the city of Londonderry. The latter fact explained the enthusiasm displayed by the hon. Gentleman in opposing the Resolution. It was almost like flogging a dead horse to reply to the speech of the hon. Gentleman after what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), for his harangue—it could not be called a speech—was of the most illogical kind. In the course of his observations, he said that if they passed this Resolution they would enfranchise ignorance, superstition, and bigotry. The hon. Gentleman jumped from one point to the other. If the Irish people were ignorant and not an educated people, who was to blame but the Tory Party, who had for 200 years made compulsory ignorance the law of the land?

Mr. O'Shaughnessy

After putting a price on the head of the schoolmaster and making education penal, they now turned round and denounced the people on account of their ignorance. Of course, the House was amazed when he stated, in tones of mock solemnity, that he was not actuated in the course he had taken by prejudice or bigotry. As to the charge of superstition, was that a compliment to the religious convictions of the Irish people? Was it a fair recognition of their firm attachment to their faith, for which they had made countless sacrifices? When he spoke on this matter, was he not actuated by prejudice and bigotry? It was like "Satan reproving sin" to hear the hon. Gentleman talk in this way, and a Representative of the city of Londonderry ought to be the last to speak of it. The hon. Member for Londonderry suggested that the Irish people ought to be contented with what had been done for them, and stated that there was no necessity to call into political activity a new class of voters. Of course, from him such arguments might be expected. He also claimed credit for the Conservative Government for having mitigated the severity of the Coercion Code. No doubt that Code had been passed by a Liberal Government; but it should be remembered that it was at a time when there was insurrection in Ireland. On the other hand, if the Conservative Government had modified the Code, they had extended its duration for five years; they had tried to renew it with severe restrictions, and if those restrictions had been afterwards mitigated, it was owing to a policy they would rely upon in the future—the policy of Parliamentary opposition, which some hon. Gentlemen found it convenient to call the policy of Parliamentary obstruction. He was told they were to be beaten to-night; but to have a majority against them was a matter about which he did not care one jack-straw, because he felt they were right, and they would again return to the attack, and force the Conservative Party to surrender those positions which it now defended.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, notwithstanding the somewhat discursive range which the debate—especially of late—had assumed, he would try to confine himself to the four corners of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Meldon). It was hardly a period of the evening for following the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. O'Connor Power) into the policy of the Coercion Acts, or other hon. Gentlemen into the policy of the Education Bill, the Land Bill, and other measures which had been referred to in the course of the debate; and it might save time if he was at once to say that, according to his opinions, there was no great principle at stake between them. On former occasions, when the question of the extension of the franchise and matters affecting the representation had been under discussion, the two Parties had usually entertained very widely different views; but, on this occasion, no such difference as a matter of principle could be said to prevail. Reference had been made to the legislation of 1867-8, which settled the question of reform as far as England was concerned. The right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Law) intimated that he (Mr. Lowther) could not claim any personal share in that settlement. That was true, and he approached this subject with superior impartiality, as he was not in any way responsible for the measure. Acting from the impartial point of view, therefore, he did not say that the settlements of 1867 and 1868 could lay claim to the character of finality. He did not say those settlements could not in any shape or form at any time be departed from; but he would remind the House that in 1868 the question of the franchise in Ireland was settled, not by a Party vote, nor by a majority obtained from one side, but by the general consent of the two great Parties in the State. It was a settlement proposed by the Party now intrusted with the management of public affairs; but reference to the debates would show that the limit then fixed at a £4 rating was cordially accepted and endorsed by the Gentlemen who then sat on the Opposition Benches. It would be as well for the House to recollect that without attempting to establish any position of finality in the settlement then arrived at, it was generally understood that piecemeal legislation on the subject of Parliamentary reform was to be deprecated. They had heard a good deal at different times about single-barrelled Reform Bills. Early recollections were the most vivid, and his early

Parliamentary recollections were connected with that period. He, therefore, could well remember that if one thing more than another was distinctly laid down by hon. Members on both sides, it was that any dealing with the question of reform was one which must be comprehensive in its character, and there was scarcely any refutation of the doctrine which was then laid down that these attempts of private Members to tinker the Constitution of the country did not deserve the sanction of Parliament. Hon. Members had referred to the distribution of seats. Whenever the question of reform was taken in hand, it would be the duty of the Legislature to face, not only that, but every aspect of the question. Some thought that to speak of distribution of seats involved a threat coming from that side of the House. [Sir JOSEPH M'KENNA: Hear, hear!] He thought he recognized in that cheer the voice of one who worthily represented, not certainly one of the largest constituencies in Ireland; and it was not for him to say whether the constituency which the hon. Gentleman so efficiently represented would long survive any effectual re-distribution of seats. But, at the same time, he would remind the House that this question was settled 10 years ago—so far as any question could be settled. But by the Amendment before the House, not only would the question of the franchise be reopened, but they would be landed in an Irish Reform Bill; and, moreover, it would be impossible any longer to defend the existing arrangements with regard to England. He would like to know with what logical consistency it could be urged, if an Irish Reform Bill should be ventured on, that the settlement arrived at for England the year before the Irish settlement should not be departed from? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had admitted that at once, and that he looked upon this as a stepping-stone to county suffrage; and he (Mr. Lowther) had no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman would be only too glad that Parliament should once more embark in the occupation of re-casting the institutions of the country and unsettling what it had been confidently hoped all round would have lasted at any rate for a generation. The right hon. Gentleman talked of the justice of according to Ireland what had been already accorded to England, and other hon. Members had used the same language. Now, it appeared to him that the Government did propose to accord to Ireland the same privileges as had been accorded to England, and one of those was the great privilege of freedom from agitation; while the right hon. Gentleman and others proposed to inflict upon her the very doubtful blessing of a period of agitation and unrest. Now, it appeared that a system of frequent changes in the institutions of the country was neither desirable nor acceptable to the people at large, and he should probably not have had to trespass on the time of the House from the place in which he now stood had not that for some time past been the general opinion of the country. Something had been said about the absence of any sign of a real demand on the part of the Irish people for the change which was now proposed; and the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion before the House (Mr. Gray) asked whether it was the wish of the Government that they should follow the example of the people of England by pulling down the railings of the official residence where he (Mr. Lowther) had recently been privileged to reside, as had been done in the case of Hyde Park? and he also made some reference to the appointment of a County Court Judge. Now, he was the last person to say a word in defence of such proceedings as those to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, with respect to pulling down the railings, and especially with reference to the judicial appointments to which allusion had been made; but however much he might deprecate what had then occurred, it at all events furnished some evidence of the existence of a certain amount of popular feeling. But hon. Gentlemen who had taken pains to make themselves acquainted with the opinions of the populace in Ireland did not pretend that there prevailed among them any excitement on the subject before the House. Petitions might represent very little, but it was notorious that none had been presented to Parliament from the general public with respect to it; and he was therefore, he thought, justified in arriving at the conclusion that no real demand for a change existed. He had already referred to the undesirable nature of constant demands for alterations in the Constitution; but if it were deemed expedient, both by the country and by Parliament, that not only one, but several, Sessions should be spent in re-opening such controversies, he saw, from a Party point of view, no reason why the Government should put themselves forward as objectors to such a course of proceeding. Speaking, however, from the point of view, not of Party, but of the interests of the country, he hoped the House would discourage it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I have no wish or intention to reply on the whole of this debate, or to interpose between the House and those Irish Members who may still wish to answer the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. There are, however, one or two observations which fell from the right hon. Gentleman with regard to which I desire to say a few words. The right hon. Gentleman told us that the Government were quite prepared to give Ireland the boon of freedom from agitation; but, as I understand it, that boon is to be conferred by entirely refraining from the proposal of any legislation which would be likely to cause or create any popular feeling in that country. That, however, appears to me not to be exactly the best mode of securing to Ireland freedom from agitation. If the Government, as I understand the right hon. Gentleman, will listen to no popular demand from Ireland, and will bring forward no measures which have any probability of interesting the Irish people, I think that course is far more likely to excite than to prevent popular agitation. The right hon. Gentleman also said that not only would this measure lead to the discussion of the larger question of the extension of the franchise in counties, but that it would also re-open the question of the extension of the franchise in England. Now, I see no reason to suppose that it will have that effect. It is true that we were told in 1868 that the Irish Reform Bill would be a settlement in Ireland such as that which was made in England; but the passage which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) referred to, from the speech of Lord Mayo, who introduced the Bill, showed that it was brought in under an entirely mistaken conception. Lord Mayo said that it would place the Irish franchise substantially in the same position as it was in England. No doubt, it would have been in the same position if the original proposal of Mr. Disraeli had been accepted; but everyone knows that alterations were made in that Bill which greatly modified and extended the original proposals of the Conservative Government of that day. The Reform Act of Lord Mayo has not placed Ireland on the same footing, or anything approaching the same footing, as England, for the fact is that in the English boroughs every male householder substantially has a vote; while, as has been proved, a large proportion of the householders in Irish boroughs have not a vote. How, therefore, can it be said that the Irish and English franchises have been placed on the same footing? A speech, I may add, has been made in the course of this debate of which I cannot take exactly the same view as has been taken of it by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power). He has spoken in terms of disparagement of the speech of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Charles Lewis). I thought that was a remarkable, and I must add, to some extent, a violent speech, which was calculated to produce a remarkable impression upon those who heard and might read it. The hon. Member brought forward, with great eloquence, and apparently with great satisfaction to himself, certain statements, in making which he seemed to think that he was saying something new. But there are many hon. Members in this House who remember the protracted debates which preceded the passing of the Reform Bill of 1867, and they have heard the hon. Member speak in disparaging terms of the class of voters who would be included in the electoral list if the value of the qualifications of voters was lowered. The hon. Member appeared to think he had knocked the case for assimilation completely on the head when he said the English Reform Act did not admit a large number of voters under the £4 voting. But he does not seem to know that the £4 line was not the only line that was discussed in this House in the reform debates in the last Parliament, and that even more terrible denunciations had been levelled against the class of voters who would be admitted by giving the franchise to £6 householders. It is always easy to prove that many more poor people would be admitted than rich people; and that rich people are a much more intelligent class of people, and much more qualified to govern the country than poor. It has always been proved that when large numbers of people received the franchise they would swamp existing and intelligent voters, and bring all sorts of calamities on the country at large. The hon. Gentleman spoke with great pride of the constituency which he represents; Londonderry is, I believe, a prosperous and industrious community, and I am sure that the select portion of the citizens of Londonderry, who return the hon. Member, are a very estimable body of persons; but, as he has said, they possess this fault—that they do not represent Ireland. They may, it is true, be a great deal wiser than the rest of the inhabitants of Ireland, and it may be regretted that all the constituencies of Ireland do not resemble Londonderry; but it is certainly true that they do not represent Ireland, or the feelings and wishes of the people of the whole country, and what we now want is not a voting class who shall be judged by the value of their holdings, but one which shall, in truth and fact, represent the country generally. The old idea of a select body of voters who shall elect the best possible House of Commons, which the hon. Member clings to, has been long abandoned; and what we desire, as I have said, is an elective body which shall secure a fair representation of the country as a whole. The present qualification for Irish voters in boroughs, we are told, does not secure such a representation; and it is sought to repair the defect by the means suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Kildare. There seems to be a very great fear among the opponents of the proposal that it is only a part of a much greater scheme—a stepping-stone, in fact, to some proposal of almost revolutionary tendency; but if the figures come to be examined it will be seen that the proposal is not a great one. The whole population of the boroughs of the United Kingdom is 13,000,000, producing an electorate of 1,600,000, and returning 350 Members. The population with which we are dealing in this proposal is

867,000. They return 37 Members, and the electorate is 54,000; and the whole question, which has assumed, in the minds of some, such gigantic proportions, is whether we are to add to these 1,600,000 a number of voters not much over 100,000. It cannot, therefore, be said to be a very alarming proposal. The hon. Member for Londonderry says that the demand made for the extension of the franchise to the counties in England will be made in Ireland. But that demand will be made whether you agree to this measure or not, and will have to be discussed on its own merits. Though this question is not a large one, it is not a small question from a general and political point of view. Though it refers only to the enfranchisement of 100,000, it concerns the satisfaction of 5,000,000. I do not admit that by accepting the proposal before the House hon. Members would be committing themselves to the much larger questions involved in the supposed electoral rights of the dwellers in counties or even in any other of the divisions of the Three Kingdoms, because it must be generally admitted that as far as the social conditions of Great Britain and Ireland are concerned it is necessary to adopt different modes of treatment, and that each separate proposal will, when it comes to be made, be discussed on its merits. A great deal has been said about exceptional legislation, and we are asked why we should provide exceptional legislation for Ireland in some respects, and equality of treatment in others? It is necessary, no doubt, that in matters relating to the social condition of the Kingdom, the three countries should not be dealt with in precisely the same way. No one has ever contended that the same ecclesiastical regulations are suitable for Scotland, Ireland, and England. In everything relating to the religious condition of the people there must be diversity of treatment. But does the House for one moment suppose that the people of Scotland would be contented if any alteration were made in the religious rights enjoyed by them? If you could not for a moment suppose that they would be, on what ground, then, do you suppose that the Irish people can be content so long as existing differences and distinctions are observed? Reference has been made to the disaffection which pervades a certain number of the class who would be enfranchised in respect of these questions. I am afraid it must be admitted that such disaffection does prevail. But what is the danger of that disaffection? It is not that it may find occasional expression in this House, but that it exists amongst the people. I believe it is far better that if disaffection does exist it should find its expression in every legitimate way, and should not be concealed and repressed, as it is at present, into channels and modes of unconstitutional action. I do not pretend for one moment to say that the passing of this measure would make Ireland a contented or well-affected country; but I believe it is one of a series of measures for the removal of obstacles which exist to the contentment and pacification of Ireland; and it is useless to hope that the country will ever be reconciled to the Constitution under which it is governed so long as this remnant of inequality and remnants of political jealousy with regard to this country are permitted to exist.

DR. O'LEARY said, he rose, with some hesitation, to reply to the observations of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He would not have attempted to do so had he thought that the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition represented all Parties in that House; for although he was entitled to represent the Liberal Party, there was another—the Irish—Party in the House, and as one of them he (Dr. O'Leary) now claimed to be heard. Above all other questions he considered this to be a vital one. The people of Ireland looked upon this question, which had been brought before the House from 1874 up to the present time, as one of the highest importance. On each occasion when it had been brought forward, the Government had pronounced themselves unfavourable to the proposal. Personally, he felt extremely aggrieved at the course taken by the Government on this as well as on other Irish questions, especially as strong hopes were entertained, from the announcements made at the opening of the Session, as to the measures to be brought forward. With reference to the arguments that had been adduced in favour of this question, it was noticeable that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not answered one of them. What did he state? He commenced by an assertion that he was actuated by supreme impartiality. He (Dr. O'Leary) was prepared to admit that, if an impartial view could be taken of a whole case from a particular point of view; but he must say that he did not believe there was one word of truth in the Chief Secretary's assertion of impartiality.

MR. SPEAKER trusted that the hon. Member did not intend to impute a want of truth to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and that he would see the necessity of withdrawing the observation.

DR. O'LEARY said, he had no hesitation in doing so. He did not mean to imply that the right hon. Gentleman was untruthful, but only that his views were most fallacious. He commenced by stating his impartiality; and in his earnest desire that the House should hear the truth endeavoured to show that other questions were involved in this. But this question was not one involving any distribution of seats; it was simply whether certain classes of people in Ireland, in towns or municipal boroughs, should enjoy the same individual privileges as the people of towns in England enjoyed. That was the question, and the only question, before the House. The people of Ireland did not ask for a re-distribution of seats—they only sought to be placed on an equality with people of a like social standing in England. It had been urged by hon. Members that the persons sought to be included in the franchise were not capable of appreciating political freedom. But were the people who were benefited by the last extension of the franchise in England capable of exercising political freedom? He had been returned for Drogheda—the honour was thrust upon him, and he undertook it as a public duty. He gave his voice to the Conservative Government upon the Slave Question; and when he went back to Drogheda and told the people that he had supported the Conservative Government upon that point they approved what he had done. It was his opinion that the more the franchise was extended the more Conservative would be found the vote given: such was his experience. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had told them that the question was one of the re-distribution of seats. If that question were involved, then it was a fair matter for discussion; and, if not, why was that topic introduced at all, except but to prejudice the views of the House? The question simply was, whether the electors of Ireland were to have a like electoral privilege with those in England? The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had referred to the smallness of the Irish constituencies; but he would tell him that the borough he represented contained only one-third of the number of constituents in the borough of Drogheda. The hon. Member for Galway held in his hand a paper which showed the enormous and ridiculous discrepancy that existed between the political representation of England and Ireland. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had also spoken of the advantages of freedom from agitation. What was freedom from agitation? Was it secured by preventing a man in Ireland from having political freedom, when it was allowed to a man with the same wages and an equal social position in England? What arguments had the Chief Secretary for Ireland advanced to show that freedom from agitation existed at present on this question? He gave none, nor had he advanced a single reason why one man should exercise the franchise and the other not. He paused for a reply. In all that the right hon. Gentleman had said, did he give any reason why the Liverpool artizan and Dublin artizan, who were on an equality in all other respects, were not to be put on an equality in point of political rights? Speaking more than three months ago from that Bench, he had replied to the hon. and learned Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), who had defended the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) in an attack upon Mr. Layard. Therefore, he hoped credit would be given him for no factious opposition to the Government. There was a certain number of hon. Members in that House who had adopted, for the last few years, a policy the wisdom of which he would not attempt to decide; but this he would say—that, in his opinion, if the Government persisted in their effort to resist the passing of that Bill, the cry that had been raised in Ireland would justify those Gentlemen in an active opposition. So long as the Government refused to place Ireland and England on the same level, so long would the voice of Ireland, so long would all her sympathy and all her love follow the hon. and learned Member for Louth in his struggles to place both countries on an equality. If the people of Ireland were continually exasperated by her just demands not being granted when the most obvious arguments were brought forward and not a single reply in favour, or justification or explanation of, the existing state of things was advanced from the front Treasury Benches, in that case he proclaimed that all the opposition of Irish Members was necessary; and, for his part, he should join them, and declare open war with the English Government for their neglect and disregard of the interests of Ireland.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Member who has just sat down, and who represents what I may call a small Irish borough, has told us that he has heard, happily not in this House, that an opinion has been expressed to the effect that no political vitality remained in the small Irish boroughs. I venture to think that the hon. Member's presence proves the contrary. I was gratified to hear from the hon. Gentleman that, although he complains that a large number of the inhabitants of Drogheda are not qualified to use the franchise, yet if that boon were conferred upon them the decision of the constituents would not deprive him of the honour of representing them. That is a matter of some congratulation, and I feel sure that we are all very glad to listen to the hon. Member when he stands up to address us. But I am bound to say that he has not, in his remarks to-night, done much to clear up a difficulty which I have felt throughout this debate. We are called upon, on this occasion, to do that which is never very convenient—not to discuss or express an opinion upon a measure presented in the form of a Bill, but to express our approval of the principle contained in an abstract Resolution. I am far from saying that that is a matter we ought never to entertain; but when that abstract Resolution is presented to us, and we are asked to affirm a principle of great importance, we ought to be told what the principle is upon which we are asked to decide. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland said there was no difference, he thought, among us upon that point. I thought him a little too sanguine at the moment; but immediately afterwards rose the noble Lord, and after he had spoken I could not help thinking that there were three opinions wholly irreconcilable entertained upon the matter. In the first place, we had early in the evening a speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), very much in accord with what has been said by the hon. Member for Drogheda. He said, with regard to the principle involved, we had simply to ask ourselves whether there is any reason why a privilege or right enjoyed by a householder in England should not be equally enjoyed by a householder in Ireland? But in that view the question naturally arises as to what is meant to be implied by the possession of the suffrage. Is the right one which belongs to every man worthy of it? If so, the subject is a difficult one, for the question of the hon. Member for Drogheda then becomes important—"Why a man in Drogheda is not to be allowed to vote when a man in a precisely similar position in Liverpool is permitted to exercise the privilege?" To that I answer, why should a man who is living in Torquay, in a more expensive house and who occupies a higher position in the social scale than a man in Liverpool, not be allowed to vote like the man in Liverpool? I was prepared to hear hon. Gentlemen opposite cheer that observation. But there we have a certain principle to be affirmed. Let us know whether that is really the principle involved in the Resolution we are asked to adopt. If that is the principle we are asked to sanction, it must be remembered that this is not a simple question of justice between England and Ireland, but a question of political representation throughout the United Kingdom. That was one question put before the House. Then the right hon. and learned Member for the county of Londonderry (Mr. Law) said—"There have been discussions this evening as to whether the franchise is a right or whether it is a trust. I give the go-by to all such refinements as these, and I put the matter on this ground—I say it is for the good of the State and the community that as many people as possible should be admitted within the pale of the Constitution—that is to say, should be admitted to the right of voting." Well, that principle the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows well is the principle of universal suffrage, qualified, of course, by the exclusion of some persons who may be personally unfit to exercise it. That principle may be offered for our confirmation. But then comes the noble Lord, who is a prime authority upon the other side of the House, and puts forward a wholly different principle from the others, and one which I am bound to say, for my own part, I entirely accept as the true principle. The noble Lord said the question is, how are we to obtain a fair representation of Ireland as a whole? That is the question which we have always on this side of the House—which I, at all events, have been in the habit of putting in all electoral discussions—namely, what is the best way of obtaining a fair representation of the whole country? That question ought, no doubt, to be approached in a fair and thoughtful spirit, and you will find that it is one that carries you very far. It carries you to the question of the distribution of power, and to the mode in which minorities are to be represented; for you cannot get a fair representation of the country as a whole, unless you have some means by which the representation of minorities is secured. It also raises other questions, which, if you deal with the franchise, you ought to consider. The principle involved in the Resolution we are asked to pass is by no means one that has been elaborated in the way in which a proposition of reform of this kind ought to be. I say that we take a right view of our position in holding that changes in the representation—which must necessarily be a source of disturbance to the public mind—must be of such a character as to embrace a proper settlement of all parts of the question. I agree with those who have said that there are anomalies in our present system of representation, not only in Ireland, but in other parts of the United Kingdom; but I say that, upon the whole, we have a fairly working representative system. At present, it is one which enables us to obtain a very reasonable and fair expression of the opinion of the country, and I may say particularly that of Ireland. Hon. Gentlemen opposite say that the present system does not secure the return of Members who represent the feeling of the people of Ireland; but those same hon. Gentlemen always claim to speak in the name of Ireland; and I think we may fairly assume that, however imperfect the system may be in its details, yet we do contrive, by our present arrangements, to obtain a perfectly fair and reliable expression of the voice and opinions of their own country. No doubt the time may come when it may be desirable to review again the working of our representative system; but I do not think that we should act wisely in undertaking that review at the present time. It is not so very long since the last settlement was made, and we remember that, not only in 1867, but in the years that preceded it, and for some time before, the country was agitated, and it is not desirable to revive again that question until we can deal with it as a whole. An Act for Ireland was passed about the same time, and the noble Lord and the right hon. Member for Bradford have stated that that was passed under a misapprehension on the part of the Minister who was responsible for its introduction. I have not considered the speech of my noble Friend Lord Mayo on that occasion; but it was, I apprehend, made in 1867. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: 1868.] Then it was made after the passing of the English Reform Bill, and therefore with a full knowledge on the part of the House of the legislation for England. But the main question we now have to consider is whether we shall pass a Resolution which really settles nothing whatever, and which will affirm a principle of which there are at least three different versions entirely inconsistent with one another. I hope, under the circumstances, that the House will vote in favour of the Motion that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.

MAJOR O'GORMAN was not quite sure whether the Government laboured under the impression that if the franchise in Ireland were extended in the same manner as in England, none but Home Rule Members would be returned by Irish constituencies to that House. In his opinion, that impression, if it existed, was entirely erroneous. The Irish people were essentially Conservative, and the lower one descended into the social structure, the more Conservative would Irishmen be found. If hon. Members doubted his statement, he would bring illustrations in support of his argument. The noble Lord, who was now Prime Minister of this country, defeated and turned out of Office the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich because the latter introduced a £7 Franchise Bill, which was too revolutionary for the noble Lord; but the moment the noble Lord himself came into power he introduced household suffrage, apparently a much more revolutionary measure, and what had been the result? The noble Lord had found Conservatives in the lowest ranks of Englishmen. The opening of the Constitution had placed the hon. Gentlemen, whom he had now the pleasure of seeing opposite, on Conservative Benches. Let them make in Ireland a similar experiment. The £7 franchise never would have returned a Conservative majority. Household suffrage had done it. "Si monumentum requiris circumspice."

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 256; Noes 187: Majority 69.—(Div. List, No. 4.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

RACECOURSES (METROPOLIS) BILL.

(Mr. Anderson, Sir Thomas Chambers, Sir James Lawrence.)

[BILL 48.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Anderson.)

MR. ONSLOW observed that the Bill was before the House last Session, when the second reading was passed by the narrow majority of 2. If it had been supposed that the Bill would be discussed that night, he thought more hon. Members would have stayed in their places to have voted against it. He believed that last Session but for the Bill being overshadowed by the discussions of the Dunkeld Tolls Bill, the narrow majority of 2 in favour of the second reading would have been turned into a large majority against. In the Preamble of the Bill it was stated that racing in the vicinity of the Metropolis was inconvenient and prejudicial to the interests of the public. That assertion he denied, in the belief that the grievance was entirely sentimental. It appeared to him that if racing were to be suppressed in the Metropolis it must also be suppressed in every other part of the Empire. If that were to be done, and the hon. Member would bring in a Bill to that effect, the question could be discussed on its merits. But he failed to see what earthly good could possibly be effected by putting a stop to racing within a certain number of miles round the Metropolis. They would thereby put an end to the amusement of a great number of people, and that without any practical benefit whatever. He failed to see how the Metropolis would be benefited by this Bill, nor why such a provision as the suppression of races within 10 miles from Charing Cross should not be equally applied to Birmingham, Manchester, and Liverpool. Why should London alone be deprived of its race-meetings? At the present time, they had only a very few racecourses within 10 miles of the Metropolis; there were Kingsbury, Streatham, the Alexandra Palace, and, perhaps, Croydon. By the suppression of those meetings they would deprive the people of the Metropolis of a legitimate amusement, which so many thousands of them were in the habit of enjoying, simply because a small number had misbehaved themselves. He felt confident of this—that if the police did their duty there would be no disorderly conduct, and it was only where the police had been conspicuous by their absence that any "scenes" had taken place. The hon. Member had said that he did not wish to do away with race-meetings, but only to bring them under the jurisdiction of the magistrates. He apprehended that if brought under the jurisdiction of the magistrates for the purpose of being licensed, in a very short time all the meetings would be done away with. If there were abuses in those race-meetings, there were also abuses on the racecourses in other parts of the country. It was invidious to single out London alone and suppress race-meetings in its vicinity, and yet permit them to go on in every other part of England. Why had that Bill been brought in? There had been an agitation got up by certain Metropolitan builders, who found that they could not let their houses well nor sell their land; and they thought if these race-meetings were abolished it would much improve their property. In his opinion, the agitation against these race-meetings had been got up solely by these building speculators. These men had been over-speculating in the purchase of land and in the building of houses, and they imagined that there was just a chance of letting these houses if these races were done away with. At all events, they thought that whatever happened they could not be worse off than they were at present. If the hon. Gentleman would bring forward some measure to prevent fraudulent transactions on the part of Directors of public Companies in this country, he would give him his hearty support; but he hoped the second reading of this Bill would not be passed, as he believed it one that would do no good whatever, while it would put restrictions upon a legitimate amusement of the people of this country, and was an egregious example of piecemeal legislation. He moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

SIR JOHN ASTLEY cordially seconded the Motion. He was at a loss to know why the hon. Member for Glasgow should have put this Notice upon the Paper. He had never seen the hon. Gentleman at a racecourse, and he had very frequently attended race-meetings; and he rather fancied that the hon. Gentleman had never been at a race-meeting in his life. Under these circumstances, in his opinion, he was not the sort of man to point out to the House how race-meetings should be conducted. The population of London was very large, and needed a good many outlets for enjoyment; and he could not understand why they should not be permitted to have races within a 10 miles' radius, when it only interfered with the enjoyment of one or two cantankerous individuals. If the hon. Member understood more of the matter, he would see that magistrates, although a very intelligent sort of men, were not exactly fit persons to judge as to whether race-meetings should be held. The Jockey Club, of which he was a member, was, in his opinion, much better qualified to order race-meetings than the magistrates. He hoped the House would not pass the second reading of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Onslow.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR HENRY JAMES supported the second reading of Bill, which he considered was an attempt not to interfere with legitimate racing, but to put a stop to the ruffianism of suburban meetings. Last year they had had speeches from the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) and from the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in which they stated that this was a legitimate matter for the Jockey Club to deal with, and if left to that body they said the evil would be met. But had anything been done? The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, in speaking against the Bill, said that if the Jockey Club did not interfere then he would assist in putting down these meetings. He could not help thinking that the absence of the hon. Member was not quite accidental; but if he were there they would probably hear that the Jockey Club had done nothing. If the Jockey Club would, by any indirect rule, show the House that they were putting down these meetings perhaps that would be sufficient. Hon. Gentlemen who opposed the Bill had said that this was a sentimental grievance; but the fact was that persons attending these meetings in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis took to destroying the peace of the district, and these meetings were held six or eight times a year. It had also been asked why the magistrates should interfere in these matters? It was a principle well known to the Common Law that if persons wished to meet in any great numbers, even for the purpose of a fair, they could not do so without the sanction of the Justices. All they sought by this Bill was to put that law into effect, and stop meetings which were only held to bring together people not for fair racing, but for the collection of gate money, and to increase the trade of public-houses.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had made some reflections on his observations last year. It was true that he had told the House that the races of England were more properly left in the hands of the Jockey Club than in those of the magistrates; and he still entertained the opinion that while the licensing of refreshment-booths and so forth was under the existing law very properly confided to the magistrates, the other arrangements relating to race-meetings should be intrusted rather to the Jockey Club than to the magistracy. The hon. and learned Gentleman had further asked what had been done by the Jockey Club since the last year? He seemed to answer that question to his own satisfaction by saying that nothing had been done. Of course, he (Mr. J. Lowther) was only speaking his own opinion on this subject, and not that of Her Majesty's Government, and he would therefore venture to answer the question. He would affirm that the Jockey Club had done a great deal. First of all they had, by a notice issued last year, requested that no gentleman should act as a steward of any of these race-meetings unless satisfied, upon proper inquiry, that such meetings would be well conducted. It was pointed out that such a notice as that would be scarcely sufficient to answer the object. He had been twitted with the inadequacy of that notice, and the attention of the Jockey Club had been called to the subject. The noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, who he was sorry to see had left the House, acting as steward of the Jockey Club, had caused notice to be issued with regard to race-meetings to the effect that the stake-holders should be prohibited from inserting advertisements until the persons conducting the meeting had made every arrangement for the due maintenance of order. The Jockey Club had thus taken all steps in their power to place matters upon a proper footing, and he would ask, what more could the Jockey Club do? What more could they do to redeem the undertaking made by him on their behalf last year? The effect of the notice to which he had referred prohibited the publication of the advertisements in the official calendar, which acted in this way—that if a horse, in defiance of the refusal of the Jockey Club to advertise, was run, it was from henceforth debarred from ever taking part in any races held under the auspices of the Jockey Club.

SIR HENRY JAMES: Has one meeting been discontinued in consequence?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The meeting of West Drayton has been discontinued.

SIR HENRY JAMES: That was before the notice.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he had also reason to believe that the meeting had been discontinued at Kingsbury; that was to say, would be discontinued for the future. Perhaps some hon. Members were not aware that flat racing did not take place at this period of the year; and therefore he was perfectly correct, from a grammatical point of view, notwithstanding the criticisms of one or two hon. Members opposite, in saying that the meeting at Kingsbury would for the future be discontinued. The hon. and learned Gentleman had also referred to another meeting—that at Streatham; and he might say it was more than probable, from what he had heard, that no meeting would henceforth take place there. The result was this—that the existing state of the law was fully sufficient to put down any nuisance that prevailed, and what was asked by the promoters of the Bill was that they should force an open door, and that a law should be passed to effect a purpose already accomplished without it.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS thought the object of the Bill should be fully before the House. They were asked to put down an universally admitted unmitigated nuisance. The best authorities in the House on matters of racing did not venture to utter one syllable in favour of the meetings sought to be suppressed. There must be some good arguments in favour of the great race-meetings of this country. But all they wanted to do by the present Bill was to put down an unmitigated nuisance. The mischief produced by these suburban meetings was absolutely indescribable, and by passing the Bill the Jockey Club would be saved the trouble of suppressing them. It must also be admitted that up to the present time the Jockey Club had not made much progress in their suppression.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON could not allow what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to pass without some observation. He ventured to think, notwithstanding the strong assertions that had been made as to the active part taken by the Jockey Club, and the results which had happened in consequence of their action, that that action had had no practical effect. It was from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman himself that they would find one of the strongest arguments for the passing of this Bill. He had admitted to the House that in the neighbourhood where these races were held it was impossible to let houses. [Mr. J. Lowther: I never said anything of the sort.] He took down the words which he was under the impression were uttered by the right hon. Gentleman; but they must have fallen, as the right hon. Gentleman repudiated them, from the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow), to the effect that builders in the districts where these meetings were held could not let their houses or sell their land, and that they had got up the Bill in consequence. That proved that there was an injury caused by these race-meetings, and he could not divest himself of the recollection of the truth of the nuisance as brought before him when he occupied another Office. Whilst Under Secretary at the Home Office he received constant reports of the objectionable nature of these meetings; and it was from information furnished by the police, and from other sources that came into his hands, that he became, and still was, an earnest supporter of this Bill. He believed that the nuisance as described by the hon. and learned Member (Sir Henry James) was a substantial one, and that the Jockey Club, however willing to put it down, were not able to do so. They had no power by means of restrictions to insist upon order, and it was for the interests of everyone and in the cause of order that the Bill should be passed.

SIR CHARLES LEGARD said, that as one of the members of the Jockey Club he had attended most of the race-meetings within the vicinity of London, and he had never seen more disorderly conduct there than at the meetings held 200 or 300 miles away from the Metropolis. He objected to piecemeal legislation, and considered that if race-meetings within 10 miles of London were done away with the House ought also to deal with the races at York, Liverpool, Shrewsbury and elsewhere. Why were not the races near those places as detrimental to those towns as those held in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis were said to be to it? He could not understand that public morals were less likely to be corrupted from suburban race-meetings than from those held near other towns; and he might add that he failed to see that there was very much more rowdiness at the suburban meetings than there was at Shrewsbury last autumn, when a lot of people from Birmingham broke into the Grand Stand. For this reason, he objected to such a ridiculous piece of legislation.

MR. ANDERSON observed, that last year the Bill not only passed a second reading, but went through Committee and certain Amendments were then made which had now been introduced into the Bill. In his opinion, the Jockey Club were powerless to meet this evil. Even if they tried to do so they would be unable. The Drayton meeting was not stopped by the Jockey Club, but chiefly because the grand stand had been burnt down. There were two bodies exercising some influence in racing matters—they were the Jockey Club and the Grand National Hunt Committee. Immediately after the passing of the rules of the Grand National Hunt Committee two of the members, actually of the Committee itself, became the stewards of a prohibited meeting. He had no doubt the Jockey Club would do something similar. The subject had been so well discussed by other hon. Members that he would not trouble the House with any further observations on the Bill.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY said, that during the short time he had been in Office he had become aware of the objectionable character of these meetings in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis. The Jockey Club having failed to apply any remedy, he should individually support this Bill.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD said, that if the Jockey Club had really done their duty by these meetings there would have been no chance of this Bill being brought before the House. But the Jockey Club, while looking well after the great race-meetings, had ignored its duties as regarded the smaller ones. No one would suffer more from the passing of this Bill than himself. The racecourse at Streatham was his property, and the passing of the Bill would probably abolish the meeting. Within his knowledge numerous complaints had been made as to the property damaged by persons visiting the Streatham racecourse. Last year 13,000 people went to the Streatham races; one-third of these paid for their admission, but the rest broke in to the course and trampled down neighbouring property, without caring in the slightest degree for anyone. No one could appreciate honest racing more than himself, and he should always support it; but the suburban meetings were got up by publicans for their own benefit, and were supported by the lowest riff-raff of the Metropolis. In his opinion, it was time they were put down, and he warmly supported the Bill.

MR. STACPOOLE remarked that Her Majesty's Ministers were not so unanimous upon this measure as they were upon the last question before the House. He did not see why, if race-meetings should be suppressed near London, they should not be suppressed everywhere. He was opposed to the Bill, which had been got up by a few Sabbatarians and bucolic magistrates.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 102; Noes 53: Majority 49.—(Div. List, No. 5.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT (1875) AMENDMENT BILL.—[BILL 56.]

(Mr. Anderson, Mr. P. A. Taylor, Mr. Whitwell.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Anderson.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, there was a clause in the Bill which he could not agree to at present.

MR. ANDERSON hoped the right hon. Gentleman would allow the Bill to be read a second time, and then referred to a Select Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

ANCIENT MONUMENTS BILL.—[BILL 52.]

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Beresford Hope, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Sir Richard Wallace.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

EARL PERCY said, that it could not surely be the intention of the hon. Baronet who introduced this Bill to ask the House to go into Committee upon it at that late hour. The second reading of the Bill was taken on the 17th December—the very last day that the House sat—and it had been put on the Paper on the present occasion contrary to the usual rule. He trusted some little time would be given to hon. Members to consider what Amendments they should propose. It would also be necessary to have time to put the Amendments on the Paper. He begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Earl Percy.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER appealed to the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone not to proceed with the Bill at that late hour.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK agreed that it would be unreasonable to ask the House to discuss anything on which there was a difference of opinion at that hour. If the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee he would not take anything which was disputed.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY reminded the hon. Baronet of the good fortune which he had met with in the progress of the Bill during the present Session; and he hoped that, under the circumstances, he would be satisfied with the success that had already attended him.

MR. DILLWYN thought the hon. Member was right in pressing the Bill on at the present time, having regard to the difficulties which private Members experienced in the conduct of their Bills.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE must remind the House that this was no new Bill, but one with which it was well acquainted. His hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone asked that the Bill should be allowed to go into Committee, and not that the Amendments might be considered that night. As there was nothing in the general scope of the Bill which was not well known to those opposing it, he thought the request reasonable; and he was sure his hon. Friend did not propose to go further, after getting into Committee.

MR. RAIKES observed, that the Amendments by the Secretary to the Treasury opened a very large question. He must also point out to the House that the Amendments which had been brought forward then might very well have been put down in December, when there would not have been the reason now urged for the postponement of the Bill. The hon. Baronet could not complain of that reason for postponement being offered. It was rather unreasonable, it appeared to him, that the Bill, which had undergone important changes, should be pushed forward in this way. He thought that those who had already shown the hon. Baronet a good deal of consideration might fairly ask him to give them some consideration in return, and consent to the postponement of the Committee.

MR. MONK, on behalf of the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone, stated that he merely wished now to be allowed to take the Bill formally into Committee, and that he would at once postpone the further consideration of it. Under these circumstances, he thought that the House would only be acting fairly towards his hon. Friend, whose Bill had been read a second time on four previous occasions, by allowing it to go into Committee.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) had reminded them that the Bill was one which was well known to the House; but it should not be forgotten that they had also been informed that the hon. Member for Maidstone had made very great alterations in it, which practically made it a new Bill. What the nature of the Amendments was the House did not know; they were only aware that certain alterations had been effected, and that certain arrangements had taken place between the hon. Baronet and the Government. Was it fair, under these circumstances, to ask the House to go into Committee at that time?

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK stated that he had not introduced Amendments, but that they had been suggested, and that he had consented to adopt them, and they appeared in the Bill as it was printed. He did not desire to enter into debate at that hour; but, as his hon. Friend the Chairman of the Committees knew, he would have little chance of going on unless he pressed the Bill then.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 33; Noes 81: Majority 48.—(Div. List, No. 6.)

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. ONSLOW moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. Raikes

EARL PERCY hoped the hon. Baronet would not press the matter on at that time, considering that the second reading had been passed by a mistake, and that there had been no discussion. He thought that he should be content with the progress already made.

MR. HEYGATE, in seconding the Motion, said, that he only did so because of the lateness of the hour; but he hoped the measure would be passed into law in good time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Onslow.)

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that if the House would consent to go into Committee, then he would be perfectly willing to carry out his undertaking. If there had been any misapprehension by the noble Lord he regretted it, and if the noble Lord wished to put down any Amendments, he should be glad to give him every opportunity of doing so.

MR. ONSLOW said, he would withdraw his Motion after what had fallen from the hon. Baronet. His object was only to obtain that explanation.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Friday next.

DISQUALIFICATION BY MEDICAL RELIEF BILL.—[BILL 22.]

(Mr. Rathbone, Sir John Kennaicay, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Ritchie.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Rathbone.)

MR. PELL objected to the provisions of the Bill. It might be asked why he did not oppose the Bill in an earlier stage? His reason for not doing so was his unwillingness to appear in the light of obstructing the Bill during the whole Session. It ought to have been opposed by the Government, for he would ask, what was the use of a Government if it permitted so mischievous a Bill as this to arrive at the stage which this had reached? This Bill was mischievous, inasmuch as it removed from one class of persons a disqualification which everyone underwent who permitted himself to become a pauper. The general idea was that the unhappy persons who were suffering from infectious diseases were thrust into asylums. As a member of the Metropolitan Asylums Board, his experience was that, so far from that being the case, they were embarrassed by the eagerness of persons who were only too ready, instead of isolating their children and keeping them at their own cost, to avail themselves of the accommodation provided for paupers. He would relate his own experience in other ways. A few years ago inquiry was formally made among the small-pox patients in the Metropolitan Asylums District Hospital at Hampstead. Certain questions were put. Amongst them were these—"What is your profession or calling?" "Have you ever, in your life, applied for relief?" Only 11 per cent of the persons seeking admission had ever applied for relief—that was, 11 per cent only of the inmates belonged to the class for whom the asylums were built. And there was something more than that. A number of the patients did not consist of artisans or ordinary labourers, and such as would naturally be expected to be found in the class of paupers; but included, he thought, a commercial traveller, clerks, and a number of domestic servants. Now, this hospital was for the use of paupers only. Why should persons be exonerated from the duty of having their servants properly isolated and treated at their own or the servants' cost? This was one of the not infrequent attempts during the last year or two to nibble away the fringe of the Poor Law of 1834. They should be very jealous of any attempt at reform or amendment of that code of laws. The Bill spoke of persons who were receiving medical relief as in-patients in dispensaries. He had never heard of dispensaries giving medical relief to in-patients. Before sitting down, he must again express his regret that his right hon. Friend who had charge of these matters had not thought it right to oppose this Bill. He did seriously ask him, in the performance of his duty, not to allow such a Bill as this to pass. He begged to move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be re-committed.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "now read the third time," in order to add the word "re-committed,"—(Mr. Pell,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'now read the third time' stand part of the Question."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that the hon. Member for South Leicestershire had given his experience in connection with a Metropolitan Board. On Tuesday last, at a meeting of one of the Boards in London, of which he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was a member, the medical officer reported 17 cases of small-pox which had occurred in a single parish, and that not a large one, in the Metropolis. The outbreak was traced conclusively in 14 cases, and was suspected to have arisen in the remainder from one single case. It was noticeable, also, that all the cases occurred within a period of five days. The medical officer concluded his Report by strongly advocating the principle of this Bill; and he believed that the whole of the medical officers in the Metropolis were likewise in favour of the measure, which had, in fact, been introduced at their instigation and by their wish. The hon. Member had treated this matter entirely as one relating to the Poor Law, and had left out of sight the scientific aspect of the question. Viewed as a matter of public health an entirely different light was thrown on the question; and he, for one, would not have allowed his name to be placed on the back of the Bill unless he was satisfied that the medical officers thought its provisions would be a great gain to the public health of the Metropolis. The hon. Member was also incorrect in stating that the Bill contained an allusion to in-patients in dispensaries; there was nothing of that kind in the Bill.

MR. PELL referred to the passage in which the words were found.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE admitted they might have occurred in the connection pointed out; but certainly the hon. Member had not conveyed to his mind the idea that he was going to introduce any Amendment touching the principle of this Bill. If he only wished to re-commit the Bill with a view to altering its phraseology, there could have been no possible objection to that course. As to the principle of the Bill, he would maintain that it did not in the least infringe the spirit of the Poor Law. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) was the first to raise any question on the point; but he thought that it had been shown that the Bill was no infringement of the Poor Law.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH could not support the Bill as it stood. It was laid down by the Bill that the receipt of medical relief out of the rates was no longer to be an electoral disqualification. That was an objectionable proposal. In Ireland the Poor Law contained a provision to the effect that if a person who had received medical relief afterwards repaid the cost of it he should cease to be disqualified, and that seemed a proper principle. Some confusion existed in the minds of the promoters of the Bill between medical relief under the Poor Law and medical attendance under the Public Health Act. The Bill provided that a person was not to be disfranchised by receiving medical relief at the hands of a sanitary authority; but, in truth, there was no such condition of disfranchisement, and the Bill in that respect pretended to deal with what did not exist. It was well known that hospitals set up by the sanitary authority under the Public Health Act pauperized no one. This and other objections constituted, he thought, sufficient grounds for his refusal to accept the Bill in its present shape.

MR. RATHBONE said, that when the Bill was before the House on a previous occasion it had been discussed fairly and fully. The House was so much in favour of it that the Government, very wisely, did not push their opposition. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had told them that a man was not allowed to vote who had received relief out of the rates in the hospital built by the guardians; but that there was no objection to his doing so if the hospital was paid for out of the sanitary rate. The meaning of that was that the great expense which had been incurred in building hospitals for small-pox and fever under the guardians of the poor would have to be doubled to provide another set of hospitals for a sanitary authority. In his opinion, the ratepayers would thereby be placed under very great additional burdens. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) had said that people were crowding into the hospitals. As a guardian he (Mr. Rathbone) had taken an active part in these matters, in what he believed was one of the largest parishes in England. They had many cases of small-pox and fever, but were so far from finding people ready and willing to crowd into the hospitals, that it was with the greatest difficulty they could be got into them when it was absolutely essential for the benefit of the crowded districts in which they lived that they should be isolated. He had never known an instance of a person seeking to go into these hospitals without being pressed. The hon. Member for South Leicestershire had also informed them that there were a great mass of domestic servants entering the hospitals. To that he would answer that the Bill did not touch them as they had no votes. Under the present system people were made to pay for these hospitals, and were afterwards compelled to go into them; and it was not right that they should be made paupers because they had been compelled to enter the hospitals.

DR. BRADY remarked that the object of the Poor Law regulations with regard to infectious diseases was to prevent the spread of contagion. A man might be taken into one of the leading hospitals suffering from disease, and he might come out of that institution perfectly well; but if he did not pay for the assistance he had received he was disfranchised, and precluded from giving a vote at any Election. He did not think that that was right or just. The clause of the Act had only this one effect—to deprive a man of a privilege he ought to enjoy, because by accident he had happened to get into the power of a Poor Law medical officer. He hoped this Bill would pass, and that they would have no more restrictions put upon people in such circumstances.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 65; Noes 40: Majority 25.—(Div. List, No. 7.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed, with an amended Title.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

M O T I O N S .

STANDING ORDERS.

Select Committee on Standing Orders nominated:—Mr. MOWBRAY, Mr. BRUEN, Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE, Mr. CURITT, Mr. FLOYER, Mr. THOMSON HANKEY, Mr. HOWARD, Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, The O'CONOR DON, Mr. RODWELL, and Mr. WHITBREAD.

SELECTION.

Committee of Selection nominated:—Mr. FLOYER, Mr. THOMSON HANKEY, Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY, The O'CONOR DON, Mr. WHITBREAD, and the Chairman of the Select Committee on Standing Orders.

INCLOSURES.

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed, Six Members to be nominated by the House and Five by the Committee of Selection, to consider every Report made by the Inclosure Commissioners certifying the expediency of any Provisional Order for the inclosure or regulation of a Common, and presented to the House during the present Session, before a Bill be brought in for the confirmation of such Order:—That it be an Instruction to the Committee, That they have power with respect to each such Provisional Order to inquire and report to the House whether the same should be confirmed by Parliament, and, if so, whether with or without modification; and in the event of their being of opinion that the same should not be confirmed, except subject to modifications, to report such modifications accordingly with a view to such Provisional Order being remitted to the Inclosure Commissioners.—(Sir Matthew Ridley.)

ELECTION PETITIONS (COSTS) BILL.

On Motion of Major NOLAN, Bill to limit the amount of the Costs recoverable in Election Petitions, ordered to be brought in by Major NOLAN, Mr. GRAY, Mr. MACDONALD, and Mr. PATRICK MARTIN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 72.]

VALUATION OF PROPERTY BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Bill to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to the Valuation of Property for the purposes of Rates and Taxes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, and Mr. SALT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 71.]

BANKING LAWS AMENDMENT BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That the Chairman be directed to move the House, that leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Laws relating to Banking.

Resolution reported:—Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. JAMES BARCLAY, Mr. BAXTER, Mr. JAMES COWAN, and Mr. COURTNEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 73.]

MUNICIPAL FRANCHISE (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Major O'GORMAN, Bill for the assimilation of the Irish Municipal Franchise to that of England, ordered to be brought in by Major O'GORMAN, Sir JOSEPH M'KENNA, Mr. RICHARD POWER, and Mr. BLENNERHASSETT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 74.]

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO SERVANTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BRASSEY, Bill to extend and regulate the Liability of Employers to make compensation for personal Injuries suffered by persons in their service, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BRASSEY, Mr. MORLEY, Mr. M. BASS, and Mr. SULLIVAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 75.]

SUMMARY JURISDICTION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary Cross, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Summary Jurisdiction of Magistrates, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, and Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 69.]

PROSECUTION OF OFFENCES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary Cross, Bill for more effectually providing for the Prosecution of Offences in England; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, and Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 68.]

CORONERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary Cross, Bill to consolidate and amend the Law relating to Coroners, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, and Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 67.]

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Bill to amend the Acts relating to the Public Works Loan Commissioners and the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 70.]

House adjourned at Three o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 17th February, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Disqualification by Medical Relief* (6); Workman's Compensation (7); Bankruptcy Law Amendment (8); Debtors Act, 1869, Amendment* (9).

MASTERS AND WORKMEN — WORK-MAN'S COMPENSATION BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

EARL DE LA WARR, in rising to call attention to the state of the law with regard to the liability of employers to make compensation for injuries to persons in their service, and to lay upon the Table of the House a Bill to amend the law on that subject, said, that before asking their Lordships to give a first reading to the Bill of which he had given Notice, he must beg the indulgence of the House if he very briefly referred to the state of the law in respect of the liability of employers to make compensation for injuries to persons in their service. The question was one which very materially affected a large portion of the industrial classes of this country, and he thought it could be shown that the difficulties which surrounded the operation of the law, as it now existed in this respect, had in a great measure arisen from the altered circumstances affecting industrial enterprise. The measure, therefore, which he proposed to introduce would not materially alter the existing law; but was intended to adapt that law to the changed conditions of things. He believed that the law, as now interpreted and acted upon, made a master or employer of labour personally liable for injuries which might occur to persons in his employ when it could be traced to any negligence or want of due precaution on his part. The Bill did not propose to alter that—it commended itself as fair and reasonable. But as matters now stood in regard to large undertakings—such as mines, collieries, factories, railways, workshops, or other industrial occupations—the employer rarely had anything or very little to do with the management of business himself, but generally delegated his authority to other persons. What the Bill proposed to do was this—that when any work was carried on, be it a mine, a factory, a workshop, a railway, a building trade, or any such like industrial undertaking, by a company or by persons who did not themselves superintend the management, but delegated their authority and superintendence to managers or others acting in their stead, the employers or company should be responsible for the acts of those persons whom they had, in fact, put into their places and invested with their authority. It was only comparatively of recent occurrence that large industrial undertakings had grown up which made it, in many instances, impossible for the owners and employers personally to superintend the management; and the consequence, owing to the extent of the work, was this—that a considerable number of persons were appointed, with various responsible duties assigned to them, in superintending the work which the employers were carrying on. The Bill proposed to make the employers liable for the negligence or want of precaution of those persons, the same as if it were the negligence and carelessness of the employers themselves. That seemed to be really only an adaptation of the principle of the liability of the employer for injuries to his servants when it arose from his own want of proper care or precaution; and it might have been supposed that such would have been the natural development of the law when circumstances which he had described became altered. But not so. The law had been interpreted differently—and he might add that there was by no means unanimity between Her Majesty's Judges on the subject—for the law, as at present administered, removed all liability from the employer or master, and gave the workman no redress beyond what he could obtain from the manager or person exercising superintendence. A new difficulty in the administration of the law had arisen in the doctrine of "common employment." This doctrine had been developed to such an extent that the manager or other person in authority in the case of a mine, a railway, a factory, or other industrial undertaking was now considered to be in what was called "common employment" with all workmen or servants engaged in the same work. The consequence was that the company or real employer escaped all liability, as the manager or person in authority was considered to be a fellow-workman with all those whom he was appointed to superintend. The Bill he now submitted proposed to afford some remedy, while it would not, as he had said, materially affect the principle of the existing law. It proposed to alter the law of "common employment" so far as to exclude managers or persons exercising superintendence from being in common employment with those placed under them. But it was not proposed to alter the law with regard to those engaged in actual labour, and the employer would not be liable for injuries caused by one workman to his fellow-workman in the ordinary course of his occupation. It was further provided in the Bill that no compensation should be given if the workman himself had contributed to the accident; and whatever might be the nature of the accident, if there had been exercised by those in charge for the time being necessary care and competency, neither the owner nor anyone else was intended to be made responsible for such accident. The main object of the Bill was to render an employer responsible, when it was shown in evidence that the accident might have been prevented by the exercise of care and ability on the part of those in charge to whom the master or employer had delegated his authority. Such were the chief features of the Bill, and he thought it might be affirmed that it did not alter the principle of the existing law; but proposed, rather, to adapt it to the change of circumstances affecting industrial employments. He could assure their Lordships that the greatest moderation had been shown by those who were interested in this question, and that they desired only what was fair and just.

Bill to amend the law relative to the liability of employers to make compensation for injuries caused by accidents to persons in their service—Presented (The Earl DE LA WARR).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The noble Earl has brought before your Lordships a subject of great importance and of very considerable difficulty.

It has been under consideration and debate in the other House of Parliament during the last Session, and, if I mistake not, it was considered in that House before a Select Committee. After the Report of that Committee, Her Majesty's Government, in the other House, stated that they proposed to introduce a measure on the subject; but owing to the state of Business during last Session, it became impossible to do so. Her Majesty's Government are perfectly prepared now to redeem the pledge which they gave. They have prepared a Bill upon the subject, and that Bill will be introduced forthwith into the House of Commons. In these circumstances, I hope the noble Earl will understand that it is not through any want of courtesy or respect to him that I do not pursue the subject any further at present; and although I am sure we should be glad to see the Bill which he proposes to lay upon the Table, I do not doubt he will think it right, after laying it on the Table, to await the progress of the measure which will be introduced "elsewhere."

Bill read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 7.)

BANKRUPTCY LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in rising to call the attention of the House to the General Report of the Comptroller in Bankruptcy for the year 1877, and to present a Bill, said: My Lords, some years ago—in the Session of 1876—it was my duty to call your Lordships' attention to the subject of the Law of Bankruptcy as it now stands. At that time the question did not attract a great deal of public attention, and the urgency of other measures before Parliament made it impossible to carry through the Bill which, on the part of the Government, I had proposed. Since that Session, various occurrences have attracted a much greater amount of public attention to the law of insolvency in this country. I own that I am not sorry that has been the case. I cannot help thinking that very considerable changes in that law are required, and I feel persuaded that those changes would be much better made under the vigilance of a large and interested body than at a time when attention would have been divided by other subjects. I have placed upon the Notice Paper a reference to a Report of great interest and importance—I mean the Report which the Comptroller in Bankruptcy presents annually as to the subjects over which he has control. Several copies of that Report are on your Lordships' Table. It is not very long, and it is a Report to some parts of which I shall ask your Lordships' particular attention. There are two other documents to which it is my intention to refer at the same time, although they are not included in my Notice. One of these is a Report made in the year 1876 by a small Committee of gentlemen whom I asked to favour me with their views upon the working of the Bankruptcy Law as it then stood. That Committee consisted of Mr. Kettle, a most experienced County Court Judge; Mr. Parkyns, one of the Comptrollers in Bankruptcy; Mr. Brougham, one of the Registrars; Mr. Nicol, an official of experience in connection with the County Courts; and Mr. Hackwood, a solicitor in the City of London, who has had much experience in the administration of the Bankruptcy Law. In 1876 I referred to some parts of the Report made by these gentlemen, and I ventured to recommend the document to your Lordships. The third document is one which I propose to lay upon the Table of your Lordships' House to-night—I allude to the Memorial recently addressed to the Prime Minister, and signed by twenty-three of the principal bankers and an equal number of leading commercial houses in the City of London. It will be satisfactory that I should say that in all of these three documents there is a substantial agreement as to the nature of the evils which exist in the present Law of Bankruptcy; and that they go far in agreement as to the mode in which it will be desirable to cure those evils. Avoiding as far as possible all technicalities, I will state as shortly as I can what I myself understand to be the defects of the existing system, and then I will lay before your Lordships the proposals of Her Majesty's Government. The legislation in regard to bankruptcy in this country during the last 40 or 50 years, has—if I may so describe it—oscillated very violently between two extremes. At one time, the theory has been to leave the administration of bankrupt estates to the creditors, and to constitute them the sole judges as to the manner in which the proceedings should be conducted. At another time, the favourite idea has been to take everything out of the hands of the creditors and to hand the estate over to Courts and officials. The first of these theories—that of administering the law through delegates of the creditors—prevailed up to the year 1832. In that year there was a violent move in the opposite direction, the plan not having been found to work satisfactorily. In that year a Court was consequently instituted, with numerous officials, and from that time to 1860 almost everything connected with bankruptcy was done through the medium of the Courts and officials. In 1860 there came a very strong demand to do away, as much as possible, with the control of the Courts, and to place as much as possible in the hands of creditors. The two great Acts of 1861 and 1869 yielded to the demand which had been very clearly expressed throughout the country. The dominion of the Court was reduced to a very great degree, and the administration of bankrupts' property was handed over to creditors to an extent that had never been the case before. There are two broad distinctions as to the manner in which those who cannot pay their debts are dealt with in this country. Sometimes they are made bankrupt in name, and at others they proceed through a course of what is called "liquidation." In the case of a man who is formally adjudicated a bankrupt in name, the law provides that a meeting of his creditors shall be called, who shall appoint a trustee, whose duty it shall be to take possession of his property, if he have any, and to wind up the estate in the best possible way for the benefit of the whole body of the creditors. In doing this the trustee is to be assisted by a committee of inspection, also chosen by the creditors. In theory nothing could be better than this; because one would naturally suppose that the creditors would be the persons most anxious to make the best of an estate in which they were interested; but the practice has turned out very different from the theory. It was very soon discovered that it was a source of profit to become a trustee under bankruptcy proceedings, and there immediately arose a number of persons who laid themselves out to be appointed trustees and to reap the profits that were to be derived from the proceedings. Therefore, when a man became bankrupt, one of these persons found out who his creditors were, and as the creditors were, as a rule, supine and indifferent as to estates out of which they expected to get little or nothing, they did not make much difficulty about giving proxies to these would-be trustees for use at the meeting of creditors, the result being that these meetings became mere matters of form, some person appearing with his pocket full of proxies, which enabled him to propose and carry the appointment as trustee of some friend of his own; and, further, these proxies were drawn in such a way as that they could be used by the trustee at each and every subsequent stage of the bankruptcy proceedings. One result of this in practice has been that there has existed no means of bringing bankruptcies to an end; and as it sometimes happens that the same person is trustee under 20 or 30 bankruptcies, and has control of the balances belonging to each estate, your Lordships will see that, if he wishes to do it, the same trustee can retain in his hands the control and use of all these balances for years. The Committee of 1876—to whose Report I have referred—describe this state of things in their Report. They say—

The Lord Chancellor

“ We are informed that in a certain class of cases it is the common practice for proxies to be held by persons who at the meeting apparently represent the views of independent creditors, but who are in reality paid or retained by the debtor or the candidate for the trusteeship; and that wherever there are assets, out of which heavy costs may be paid, there is much canvassing, and what has been commonly called touting, for proxies. Proxies are, it is also said, often bought and sold, where required to turn the scale in favour of some resolution. It happens, not occasionally, but so frequently as almost to form the rule, that a stranger, so far as appears upon the face of the proceedings, is enabled, by the proxies he has obtained, to vote himself trustee, to fix his own remuneration, to nominate the committee of inspection, to order the payment of his costs, and finally to vote, in liquidation cases, the debtor's discharge.

Such is the way in which the system which was designed to be so beneficial has been worked. And, as showing what I have said as to bankruptcies never coming to an end, I may say that during the eight years which followed the passing of the Act of 1869 only 1,843 out of 7,126 bankruptcies were ever closed with the payment of a dividend; the remainder were kept open and floating for the benefit of the trustees, who had the use of the balances as long as there was any money remaining. So much for cases in which persons are actually adjudicated. I will now turn to the other and much larger class of cases, where the debtor who cannot pay his creditors is not adjudicated bankrupt, but has his affairs wound up “by liquidation by arrangement” as it is termed—which in practice, appears to me even worse than the cases in bankruptcy. Now, my Lords, these liquidations by arrangement came about in this way—The Bankruptcy Statute of 1869 provided a code for the administration of the Bankruptcy Law; but then it was naturally supposed that there might be cases where a debtor might arrange with his creditors without bankruptcy, and two sections were put into the Statute to meet those cases. One of these sections provided for the case where a debtor could agree with his creditors to hand over his property to them without going to the Bankruptcy Court at all, so that they might make the most they could of it. The other related to the case where the debtor offered his creditors a composition, by himself or by some of his friends, of so much in the pound on his debts. These two processes were what was called “liquidation by arrangement.” There is no doubt that nothing could be better in theory. Clearly nothing could be more desirable than that a man should meet his creditors face to face, tell them the whole truth about his affairs, and make the best proposal he could in the circumstances; but, as in the former case, the practice has worked very differently from the theory. What has been the fact? In these cases, a man who cannot pay his debts is able to fix his own time and place for calling a meeting of his creditors—and, I am sorry to say, the debtor takes care to fix a time and place which are not the most convenient for his creditors to meet him. And, moreover, there is nothing whatever with regard to the principal class of those cases which insures the necessity of his giving notice to all his creditors of the meeting. And then, having proceeded in this way, all he has to do is to have the arrangement confirmed, not by a majority of the whole of his creditors, but of those who are present at the meeting; and, therefore, if he can only contrive to have the meeting so arranged that the greater number of his creditors cannot come to it, or that those at the meeting should be friendly creditors, your Lordships may imagine he will obtain a majority of his creditors who were present at the meeting. Well, my Lords, when he gets the resolution passed accepting his proposition—or in the case of a composition, when he has had it confirmed by another meeting of a similar kind—small as is the control where the debtor is a bankrupt, in these other cases there is absolutely no control at all. There is no security to be given by the trustees, there is no audit whatever of the accounts, and there is no provision that the liquidation shall be completed within any given time. My Lords, as I have described, in words not my own, what happened in bankruptcy—I will now take the liberty of describing, also in words not my own—what occurs in these liquidation arrangements. The statement I refer to is made by the Secretary of the Mercantile Law Amendment Society—

“A debtor can now file a petition for liquidation by arrangement, and convene a meeting of his creditors at any time within a month, and almost at any place he pleases, and if at such meeting a majority in number, representing three-fourths in value of the creditors there present, or represented by proxy, pass a resolution agreeing to a composition, and such resolution is afterwards confirmed at a second meeting by a bare majority in number and value of the creditors present or represented, such arrangement is binding on all the creditors. As a rule, the chief creditors rarely attend such meetings, and the result is that the debtor, by the aid of proxies of friendly, bribed, oftentimes of fully-secured, and sometimes of fictitious creditors, can get released from his debts upon almost any terms he thinks fit.”

My Lords, it appears by the statistics given in the Report that actually 75 per cent of the several thousands of compositions which have been made in the year have been under 5s. in the pound, and a very large proportion were even of 1s. or 2s.

Now, that being the working of the present arrangement of bankruptcy and liquidation, I think I have shown the substantial nature of the complaints made by those who object to the existing system. The first, which is strongly dwelt upon in the Memorial from the City, complains—and I am not surprised at it—of the vicious facilities, as they term it, for making private arrangements and escaping the control of the Court; and they complain of the encouragement thus given to reckless and fraudulent trading. My Lords, you will find a most interesting table on this subject in the first page of the Comptroller General's Report made last year for the year 1877. In that year there had been eight years' experience of the working of the Act of 1869, and the Report shows the manner in which those liquidations by arrangement have swelled in number, and how they have completely distanced all the proceedings in bankruptcy. Your Lordships will find, if you turn to the year 1870, that there were in that year 1,351 bankruptcies, while there were of liquidations by arrangement 2,035, and of liquidations by composition 1,616; making together 3,651. There were, therefore, of insolvencies brought to the notice of the Court 5,002. Well, my Lords, eight years afterwards the bankruptcies, which in 1870 numbered 1,351, had fallen in 1877 to 967, while the liquidations by arrangement, altogether free from the control of the Court, had risen to the enormous number of 5,239, and those by composition to 3,327, or 8,566, as compared with 3,651; while the insolvencies brought to the notice of the Court had risen from 5,002 to 9,500, or nearly double, as compared with the year 1870. Now, my Lords, I know it has been said sometimes that this enormous increase was owing to the condition of trade in 1877, and was the result of the depression of the mercantile world at that time. But that cannot be the case; because if your Lordships will take the four years which are generally referred to as the most prosperous years we have had of late—namely, 1871, 1872, 1873, and 1874—you will find that at the end of 1874 these liquidations had risen to 6,924—and therefore the rate of increase cannot be attributed to the depression of trade, but must be traced to the enormous facilities which are given to debtors who wish to be released from their debts on these easy terms. There has, my Lords, been no Return presented to Parliament for the year 1878, because it takes a considerable time to make it out; but I have been supplied with the number of liquidations by arrangement and composition for that year. For 1877 they were 8,566, while in 1878 they had swelled to the enormous figure of 10,332—in 1870 they were 3,651.

The Lord Chancellor

I will now ask your Lordships to go a little beyond those numbers and look to the amount of money which has been sacrificed in these proceedings. Your Lordships will find at the 29th page of the Report some startling figures. For the year 1877 the total liabilities which were presented under bankruptcy and liquidation by arrangement amounted, in round numbers, to £20,000,000. Now, what are the assets to meet those liabilities? They amount to within a few pounds of £6,000,000; but from this a very large sum must be deducted, because, your Lordships must understand, the figures in the shape of assets are merely the estimate made by the trustees at the time of the commencement of the liquidation, and, generally speaking, the experience of the Comptroller has been that these Estimates are much too favourable. From what comes under his notice, he says that at least 25 per cent must be struck off for over-sanguine estimates. We will, therefore, take off 25 per cent from the £6,000,000 of assets. For the expenses of winding-up we must also take off a very large percentage. I am sorry to say that 30 per cent of reduction under this head is too moderate. But we will take it at 30 per cent, which, with the 25 per cent previously mentioned, reduces the £6,000,000 of assets to less than £3,000,000, against liabilities amounting, in round numbers, to £20,000,000. My Lords, that is not a pleasant state of things to contemplate, and I am sorry to say that there is another unpleasant feature still to be described. The Comptroller tells us that he has made an Estimate for the three years ending 1877 of the amount by bad debts arising from bankruptcy in this country. I question whether any of your Lordships have ever considered what the amount annually lost by bad debts in this country is as a whole—by this country I mean England alone—I am not speaking of Scotland or Ireland; and, moreover, I am only dealing with those cases which come to light either before a Court or through the medium of an arrangement between the bankrupt and the creditors. Of course, therefore, I only deal with a fractional part of the whole of the bad debts which are made. There are an enormous number which have little or no assets to meet them, and we have no exact material to work upon; but where we have those materials to work upon in the case of England alone, and taking only those cases in which there is some property to meet liabilities, the Comptroller says he finds the bad debts occurring during the three years ending 1877 amount to £18,000,000 a-year. And he says very truly that these £18,000,000 represent a very considerable tax which the country must pay, because the price of articles is necessarily regulated in such a manner as to cover the bad debts, which consequently fall upon the consumers. My Lords, if a tax of £18,000,000 a-year were levied in another shape, I fancy there would be a considerable outcry against it; and yet at present, though falling every year upon some person or another, it passes unnoticed. The words of the Comptroller on this subject are certainly worthy of your Lordships' attention. He says—

“Individual trade creditors make less or more than average profits as they make more or less than an average amount of bad debts; the average amount being covered by prices, the whole falls in the end on the public as consumers. The loss by bad debts under the Bankruptcy Act alone may be small compared with the aggregate of such losses; but it represents on the average of the last three years a tax on the public of £18,000,000 per annum, which must at least help to increase the cost of living and therefore the cost of production, and so engender a further element of continually increasing prices.”

These, my Lords, are very significant facts. The Comptroller also gives his opinion upon the result of liquidations and the way in which they are usually carried into effect; and I should, before passing to another subject, like to refer your Lordships to what he says on this point. It is as follows:—

“The increase in compositions has been entirely in the worst rates, and I have no doubt it has been the same in arrangements. If there have been in liquidation generally so many as 1,500 fair cases in each year, there were 2,000 bad ones in the year 1870, and 7,000 bad ones in the year 1877. It is not, therefore, a question of the creditors preferring liquidation to bankruptcy, as has been commonly represented, but of an enormous annual increase in the number of insolvencies; the number suddenly falling, as in 1869 and 1870, by several thousands when any measure is passed tending to prevent dishonest insolvency, and rising again year by year as the debtors, or those who advise them, discover means of evading the restrictions of the law."

Further, the Comptroller says—

"The point to which I have especially desired to call attention is the enormous amount of fraudulent insolvency which appears to have been encouraged by the trust deeds of the Act of 1861, and the liquidations of the Act of 1869, judging by its seemingly unparalleled annual increase under these arrangements, but chiefly by the sudden disappearance of several thousands of them immediately following legislation which could not have prevented any but arrangements of a grossly fraudulent character. I cannot doubt that a large majority of the 8,566 debtors who liquidated in the year 1877 did so greatly to their advantage, or that a general appreciation that debtors can liquidate their debts with but little personal or pecuniary inconvenience tends to greatly and continually increase the amount of commercial immorality, insolvency, and loss to the public by bad debts."

Now, I think your Lordships will see that the complaint which has been made in the Memorial referred to, and in these other Papers, of the "undue and vicious" facilities given for arrangements under the present law, is not unfounded, and that some check upon the evil is required. The second complaint of this Memorial is this—that in bankruptcy proceedings there is not sufficient control over the realization of the assets and the investigation of the conduct of the bankrupt; and I am bound to say I think there is very considerable ground for that complaint also. I have shown your Lordships the way in which trustees are appointed—that the trustee is not appointed by a vigilant body of creditors to represent their interests, but is appointed in his own interest as a person who is to obtain a lucrative office in winding up the concern of the debtor. The control which is exercised over him is entirely general, and some additional check on his action appears to me to be required. Before stating the proposal which Her Majesty's Government have to make, let me briefly explain the existing arrangements in regard to jurisdiction in regard to bankruptcy. In the country districts bankruptcy at present is administered in the County Courts. The Metropolis and a certain surrounding area is under the jurisdiction of what is called the London Court of Bankruptcy. Now, in the London Court of Bankruptcy there is a Judge called the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. The Judge is at present Vice-Chancellor Bacon—and I cannot mention Vice-Chancellor Bacon's name without saying that there is, perhaps, no person in this country who has had greater experience or who is possessed of greater learning on the subject of bankruptcy than he. But it was found at the time of Vice-Chancellor Bacon's appointment that inasmuch as he was charged with the conduct of one of the Courts in one of the divisions of the Court of Chancery, where he had a great deal of business to transact, it was quite impossible for him to attend to the routine business of the London Court of Bankruptcy; and therefore an arrangement was made by which the primary jurisdiction for the London district was delegated by him to the Registrars of the London Court of Bankruptcy. These Registrars at that time were six in number; but two vacancies which occurred not having been filled up, they have now been reduced to four. I am bound to say for them also that they have performed with great energy and ability the work committed to their care. At the same time, it is stated, with, I believe, some truth, that it is impossible that Registrars, in administering the system of bankruptcy in London, can carry the weight which a Judge of the first rank would do sitting as a primary Judge in the Court of First Instance. Vice-Chancellor Bacon, as Judge in Bankruptcy, sits, I believe, about one day a week, but only for the purpose of hearing appeals from County Courts in bankruptcy. He does not, as a rule, perform any primary duties as Judge of the London Court of Bankruptcy. That, my Lords, is the state of the judicature in regard to bankruptcy. I mention it now in order that your Lordships may appreciate afterwards the changes which, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, I shall have to propose. The third ground of dissatisfaction is that we have no proper security for the very large funds which come into the hands of trustees under the liquidations by arrangement. Of assets amounting to something like £6,000,000, only £500,000 was in the hands of trustees actually amenable to the Court; while, with regard to trustees holding £5,500,000, there is absolutely no jurisdiction whatever to call for any audit. The trustees are expressly exempted from audit, and they hold the money responsible to no persons except the somewhat careless body of creditors who appoint them trustees. All the unclaimed dividends remain in the hands of the trustees without being in any way secured as they ought to be. In old times, before the recent changes in the Bankruptcy Law, the accumulation of unclaimed dividends in the hands of the Court represented £2,000,000, £3,000,000, or £4,000,000; and there is at present a large amount outstanding and unsecured with regard to which some provision ought to be made. With that explanation I will state the proposals of Her Majesty's Government.

First, with regard to bankruptcy proper—still preserving the distinction between bankruptcy and liquidation—we propose that provision shall be made to meet what has been found to be a source of very considerable unfairness, and that a check shall be placed upon the selection of a Court by a debtor who desires to be made a bankrupt or to arrange with his creditors. At present creditors complain very much that debtors select Courts least convenient for the creditors—a debtor resorting to a part of the country where he has obtained, perhaps, a colourable excuse for presenting a petition by having traded there a short time. Next we propose that the adjudication in bankruptcy is not, as at present, to be made in the first instance by the Court. Very often it happens that a perfectly honest trader is brought into Court and is immediately, by reason of his insolvency, adjudicated a bankrupt; whereas, if this had not been done, all his creditors, being well satisfied with his conduct, would have been glad to have relieved him from the stigma and the odium of bankruptcy. On the other hand, what happens in these arrangements to which I have referred is that a debtor whose conduct has been anything but exemplary suddenly calls a meeting of his creditors and gets his discharge before there has been any investigation of his conduct. We propose to meet that in this way:—In the first instance an order shall be made by the Court which shall be called a provisional order, the property of the debtor shall be secured, and a meeting of the creditors shall be immediately convened. That meeting of creditors is to consider the conduct of the debtor, and what course ought to be pursued with regard to it; and that meeting may do one of three things. It may resolve either that the debtor shall immediately be made bankrupt; or that some further investigation into his conduct shall be made, and that the meeting shall be adjourned for that purpose; or that his affairs shall be wound up under a deed. The bankrupt is to be bound to attend the meeting, and to submit himself for examination. In order to prevent the improper use of proxies, the Court has power to determine whether they shall be admitted or not—or whether the creditors live within such distances that they may attend themselves instead of giving proxies. There is a provision that if any person is found to be soliciting or using proxies in order to obtain an appointment for a trustee, the Court may deprive the trustee of any remuneration. If the majority of the creditors resolve upon bankruptcy, they are to appoint a committee of inspection, and they, and not the creditors at large, are to appoint the trustee, who is to be their officer and servant, with the right reserved to them to dismiss him if they think fit. The discharge of the debtor is to take place in this way—Within the first two years there is to be the consent of a certain proportion of the creditors—a greater number in the first year, and a lesser number in the second year; and after the second year it is to be in the discretion of the Court if the application is made. If it is shown that the debtor has not kept such books and accounts as are usually kept, or a sufficient record of his transactions, or has increased his liabilities by trading at a loss when insolvent, or has contracted debts without a reasonable expectation of being able to pay them, or that the bankruptcy has been produced by rash and hazardous speculations or unjustifiable extravagance, or that he has put the creditors to any unnecessary expense by the frivolous and vexatious defence of an action, or that he has committed any misdemeanour for which he has not been prosecuted—in any of these events the order of discharge is to be suspended for such time as the Court may think fit, or the discharge may be granted subject to conditions with regard to salary, pay, emoluments, wages, or earnings, which may afterwards become due. There is a provision that the trustee shall give security, and that the remuneration shall be limited by a certain maximum being assigned—which is very much wanted. There is a provision that the trustee shall not only pay all monies into the bank, but that he shall pay it to the account of each bankruptcy. It has been found in practice that where a trustee was the trustee of a great number of debtors it was quite impossible to ascertain in any particular case whether the balance which ought to have been forthcoming was actually available. There is a provision which I hope, more than any other, will expedite the winding-up of estates, and it is that at the end of one year after the appointment of a trustee he shall be obliged to hand over all the money and property in his possession to the Court, unless the Court shall find that, under the special circumstances of the case, a greater length of time shall be allowed for the winding-up. I hope that provision will bring about greater rapidity of administration than has hitherto prevailed. A year will be allowed for winding-up an estate, except under special circumstances, which will have to be proved to the satisfaction of the Court. We propose to ask Parliament to authorize the creation of an additional Judge of the High Court of Justice, and in that way to secure the services of a Judge experienced in Commercial Law, who will be able to consider the administration of the Court of Bankruptcy to have the first claim on his time and attention. We propose that the London Court of Bankruptcy shall be a part of the High Court of Justice; reserving still its own peculiar name, it shall be joined to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice; and, as I have said, a Judge in the High Court should be Judge of the Bankruptcy Court. We propose that the jurisdiction of the London District Bankruptcy Court shall be somewhat enlarged. The details appear in the schedules of the Bill. We propose that there should be a power, when the parties desire it, or when the Court thinks it desirable, to transfer any particular case or any question in bankruptcy from any County Court for decision in the London Court in the first instance. With regard to offences under the Bankrupt Law which are punishable as misdemeanours, we propose that there should be power to try any of these before the Judge in the Court of Bankruptcy. As to liquidation by arrangement, we propose that it shall no longer be done, as at present, by resolution, but that it shall be done by deed; and, in order to do away with the abuses arising from proxies, we propose that the assent of the majority of creditors shall be obtained by their signatures either to the deed or to a paper stating the effect of the deed, so that every creditor shall know what it is that he is assenting to. We propose that the deed shall not be valid unless the composition for which it provides shall amount to 5s. in the pound at least. We propose, further, that even after the deed has been registered the creditors may, if they think fit, call a meeting and pass a resolution by a certain majority that the deed is not to be proceeded with, but to be superseded by proceedings in bankruptcy; and if the Court find that there has been any fraud in obtaining the deed, or that it has been vexatiously or frivolously obtained, the Court will have power to declare it to be void. The Court will also have the power to remove the trustee of the deed for any failure in the performance of his duty. The trustee in every one of these deeds shall be bound to account to the Comptroller in Bankruptcy; his accounts shall be audited; and at the end of one year, as in the case of bankruptcy, he shall be obliged to pay over all funds in his hands, unless the Court shall consider that further time should be allowed to wind up the estate.

These, my Lords, are the main provisions of the Bill which I ask your Lordships to read a first time. There are several minor points of importance which will be found in the Bill, but I have not thought it necessary to delay your Lordships by going at length into them. I have only referred to the leading features of the measure. With regard to the mode in which the Bill has been prepared, I may state that the Bill will be found to contain within its four corners the whole Code of Bankruptcy Law; but for the convenience of those who take an interest in the matter, the Bill as printed will show in the margin the different clauses which are simply re-enactments, and those which contain the new provisions. Before I sit down, I may say that among the matters urged in the Memorial from the City it was proposed that the same Court which administers the law of bankruptcy should also be charged with the administration of the estates of deceased persons who die insolvent, and with the winding-up of joint-stock companies. One of our proposals is that the London Court of Bankruptcy shall form part of the Court of Chancery Division of the Supreme Court of Judicature, which is at present charged with those duties, and I shall be prepared at the proper time to state the reasons why, after full consideration, we have decided not to include provisions of that kind. Such, my Lords, are the objects of the two Bills which I propose to lay on the Table—the one the Bankruptcy Law Amendment Bill, and the other the Debtors Act Amendment Bill—which contain the criminal provisions with regard to the Law of Bankruptcy. I move your Lordships to give a first reading to those Bills, and I propose to take the second reading this day fortnight.

Bill to consolidate and amend the law of Bankruptcy, and for other purposes relating thereto—Presented (The LORD CHANCELLOR).

LORD PENZANCE was understood to express his approval of the Bills, and especially of those provisions which required that debtors should keep honest books, and desired that exemplary punishment should be awarded in all cases of over-trading after insolvency.

Bill read 1<sup>a</sup>; and to be printed. (No. 8.)

Then—

DEBTORS ACT, 1869, AMENDMENT
BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Debtors Act, 1869, and for the better punishment of fraudulent Debtors—Was presented by The LORD CHANCELLOR; read 1<sup>a</sup>. (No. 9.)

CONSERVANCY OF RIVERS—LEGISLA-TION.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON asked, Whether the report was correct that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a measure relating to the Conservancy of Rivers in the present Session; and, if so, whether it would be brought in in that or the other House of Parliament. It was exceedingly necessary for the interests of those concerned that the subject should be fully discussed; he therefore hoped it would be introduced at as early a date as possible.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: The report to which the noble Marquess alludes is quite correct. The Government have in course of preparation a Bill to deal with this important subject, which, as the noble Marquess is aware, is a very difficult one. I hope, at no distant period, to have the honour of introducing that Bill to your Lordships' notice.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 17th February, 1879.

MINUTES.] — PUBLIC BILLS — Ordered—First Reading—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Order (Blackwater, Essex) * [76]; Patents for Inventions * [77]; Parliamentary Elections and Corrupt Practices [78]; District Auditors * [79]; Employers' Liability for Injuries to Servants * [80].

Second Reading—Habitual Drunkards [47].

Committee—Bankers' Books (Evidence) * [65]—R.P.; Racecourses (Metropolis) [48]—R.P.

QUESTIONS.

PRISONS ACT—KIRKDALE GAOL.

QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD gave Notice that on Friday he would ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he was aware that printed rules were recently sent to the county gaol at Kirkdale, purporting to come from the Commissioners of Prisons, which contained, among other things, that women prisoners should be put on the treadmill, and whether such hard labour had not been for many years held to be unfit for women?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the House would permit him to answer the Question at once. He understood that in preparing the Papers referred to, which were abstracts of the Prison Rules, orders had been issued to keep the male and female prisoners distinct. And in the copy that was sent to be printed the rules were word for word the same, except the portion relating to females. This was a mistake, and their being circulated to Kirkdale and other prisons arose, as he understood, by one of the clerks sending them out before they had been revised by the Commissioners. He need not say that the error had been immediately corrected.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE DEFINITIVE TREATY.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the so-called Definitive Treaty between Russia and Turkey has been or will be officially communicated by the contracting Powers to Her Majesty's Government; and, as to an alleged stipulation concerning an indemnity of eight hundred and two and a half million francs, claimed by Russia, whether Her Majesty's Government adhered to the statements of Lord Salisbury in his Despatch inclosing copy of the Treaty of Berlin, viz.:

"That it results from these declarations, that Turkey is not internationally bound, and cannot be compelled to pay any portion of the indemnity until the claims of all the creditors of loans anterior to the war have been paid in full?"

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I have to state that no official copy of the Treaty between Turkey and Russia has been communicated to Her Majesty's Government. [Mr. OTWAY: Or will be?] I am not able to state whether any copy will be communicated. With regard to the second Question, the best answer that I can give is to quote the formal declaration of Prince Gortchakoff, recorded in the Protocols of Berlin. In the 11th Protocol, when the subject of the indemnity was under consideration, there is the following entry:—

"Prince Gortchakoff repeats that the indemnity of war will not affect the interests of the creditors of the Porte."

CLERGY CO-OPERATIVE ASSOCIATION. QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been called to the prospectus of the newly-formed

"Clergy Co-operative Association (Limited)," which provides for the carrying on by the clergy of various trades, including grocery, tobacco, wines, spirits, hosiery, tailoring, church furniture, &c., and if the Law Officers of the Crown are of opinion that such trading for profit on the part of the clergy is legal?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER): Sir, my attention has been called to the prospectus of the newly-formed "Clergy Co-operative Association (Limited)," and I have made inquiries with a view to ascertain the constitution of the association and the object it is designed to accomplish. I find that the association is, in fact, a company with limited liability, established under the Joint-Stock Companies' Act, and in this company there are, or are intended to be, a large number of shareholders, some clergymen and others laymen. The objects which the association is designed to carry out are, I am informed, to procure a supply of necessary commodities, such as tobacco, church furniture, and the other articles referred to in the Question, of good quality, and at a fair and reasonable price; to establish a refreshment room; and generally to provide temporal comforts for the members of the society. Now, Sir, such being the constitution of the association and the objects intended to be carried out by it, I cannot regard it as in any way a combination organized for the purpose of effecting any unlawful purpose, or any lawful purpose by unlawful means. It is, therefore, not illegal by the Common Law. There remains, however, the question whether these reverend and very reverend gentlemen who are or may be members of the association will render themselves liable to punishment by the Ecclesiastical Courts for the offence of illegally trading. This is a question upon which I do not feel myself very competent to give an opinion; but my belief is that the gentlemen to whom I have referred will place themselves in a position of safety if they do not act as directors or managers of the business, or personally officiate in the store. On this point, however, I would ask leave to refer the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leominster to an Act of 1838—viz., 1 & 2 Viet., c. 106, ss. 29 and 31.

Mr. Ascheton Cross

COAL MINES—THE ABERCARNE EXPLOSION.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can give any information as to whether the Ebbw Vale Colliery Company intend to make any further effort at present for the recovery of the two hundred and sixty bodies or thereby that yet lie in the Abercarne mine; whether it be correct that there is no law existing at present to compel owners of mines or public works of any description to make an outlay for the recovery of bodies, the lives of which may have been violently destroyed on their premises; and, whether the Government intend to take any action which would compel employers to restore, if possible, the bodies of those that may have been killed in their works, to their relatives?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I was informed by the Inspector, on the 25th of December, that the Chairman of the Company had stated that they could not afford to carry on further the work of recovering the bodies. I at once wrote to the Company expressing my regret at their decision, and saying I was quite sure it would cause great dissatisfaction in the district, and be very painful to the relatives of those who had been lost in the accident, and urging them to do what they could to recover the bodies. They replied that they had already spent £10,000, at great risk to the colliers employed; that to recover the bodies would take 12 or 18 months at £500 a week; and that in justice to their constituents they could not incur the expense. The Inspector says that, in his opinion, it would require about 12 months, at an expense of £25,000 or £30,000. I have written to the Inspector again to press the Company to see what more they can do; but I have no power by law to compel them to proceed, or to furnish them with funds. All I can do is to press them, as I have done.

MR. MACDONALD asked if the Government, considering that there was no law on the subject, would take some action to compel the restoration of the bodies to the relatives?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I cannot bring in a Bill to compel any Company to spend money which they have not got.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—CHART OF SURVEYS.—QUESTION.

MR. DODSON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he will cause to be placed in the Library or Reading Room of the House a chart showing the results of any surveys of Cyprus, and more particularly of the harbour and road of Famagusta, made since the occupation of the island by the British?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, that a chart of Cyprus would shortly be hung up in the Library, and Papers would be produced giving the results of the surveys.

JOINT STOCK BANKS—LEGISLATION. QUESTION.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, as he has announced the intention on the part of the Government to legislate on the subject of Joint Stock Banks, he will, in consideration of the great anxiety of those interested in those Banks, take the earliest possible opportunity of introducing the Bill, or at least of making public the main features of the proposed legislation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am quite aware of the interest on this subject. I am sorry I cannot at this moment answer the hon. Gentleman's Question; but I hope to be in a position to do so next week if he will put it again.

RIVERS CONSERVANCY AND PREVENTION OF FLOODS.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to deal this Session with the question of River Conservancy and the Prevention of Floods; and, if so, whether by a separate measure distinct from the County Boards Bill?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the Lord President would before long introduce in the other House a measure dealing with the question referred to by the hon. Gentleman. It would be quite distinct from any measure relating to County Boards,

PRINCE VICEROY OF IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether there is any, and, if so, what foundation for the report put forward in several English and Irish newspapers, supporters of the Government policy, that Her Majesty's Ministers have resolved upon establishing a Royal residence in Ireland, and that His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught is to succeed the Duke of Marlborough as permanent Prince Viceroy of Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am not aware of any foundation for the report to which the hon. Gentleman refers. I may add that I am not in the confidence of the English and Irish newspapers which he mentions.

IRISH UNIVERSITY EDUCATION—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If the House is to consider it as finally settled that the Government will not deal this Session with the question of University Education in Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, Sir; the Government have decided not to deal with the question this Session.

TURKEY—FINANCIAL REFORM—M. DE TOCQUEVILLE.—QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government has any information regarding a project propounded to the Porte by the Marquis de Tocqueville and others, for the reform of the finances of Turkey, with large powers over the Turkish revenues; how far such project would, if adopted, interfere with the provisions of the Anglo-Turkish Convention; and, whether Papers on the subject will be promptly laid upon the Table?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I understand from my noble Friend the Foreign Secretary that he has this morning received communication of the project to which the hon. Gentleman refers. But it has been received in a confidential despatch, and he is not aware that he has authority to publish it.

COPYRIGHT BILL—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. E. JENKINS asked the Postmaster General, Whether the Government intend to introduce a Copyright Bill this Session; and, whether it will embrace all the subjects of Copyright?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, the Government intended to introduce a Copyright Bill this Session dealing with all the subjects defined as subjects of Copyright in the Report of the Royal Commissioners.

MR. E. JENKINS stated that he should ask leave to withdraw his own Bill, in order that the passage of the Government Bill might not be in any way obstructed.

THIBET—CHUNG-KING.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can lay upon the Table of the House any Report made by the Consular Officer sent, in accordance with a separate article to the Chefoo Convention, on a mission of exploration to Thibet; also the Reports made by Mr. Vice Consul Baber on the capabilities of Chung-King for trade; and, whether it is intended to open Chung-King as a place of general trade.

MR. BOURKE: Sir, no Mission has yet been sent to Thibet, and Mr. Baber has up to the present sent in no Report upon trade at Chung-King, though one may be expected before long. Nothing has therefore as yet been decided as to the opening of Chung-King to general trade.

THE LUNACY LAW—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can now state whether it is the intention of Government to introduce a Bill to amend the Lunacy Law during the present Session of Parliament?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the subject of the consolidation of the Lunacy Law was one which, in the opinion of the Government, ought to be taken up. There were other points of law requiring careful consideration, and probably they might be dealt with at the same time. He would put himself in communication with the Commissioners on the subject.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—ARTILLERY REINFORCEMENTS.

QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR (for Sir HENRY HAVELOCK) asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will consider the advisability of providing the batteries of Royal Artillery now proceeding to the Cape for service with a heavier gun than the light steel seven-pounder?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, the heaviest gun at present in use at the Cape is a 7-pounder, with a Colonial carriage. As a matter of fact, the only demand I can trace for any other kind of gun has been for one of even less weight. But, in order to be on the safe side, one of the batteries under orders for the Cape will take out the 9-pounders with which it is armed; and, if these are not wanted, they will be left in store on their arrival.

ARMY (INDIA)—SERVICE IN INDIA.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can be so good as to explain what arrangements have been made for maintaining a sufficient supply of seasoned soldiers in India now that long service recruitment for the Infantry has been discontinued?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, this question has been a subject of discussion for a long time. In October last I was enabled to cause an Army Circular to be issued to this effect—that men who have enlisted for six years' service with the Colours who are now under orders, or may hereafter be required for service in India, and who have completed no less than three years of their first term of service, may extend their period with the Colours to nine years on the understanding that, in the event of their battalions being ordered home, they may be transferred to another corps or battalion to complete the term. Of course, they are not to be transferred without their own consent.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE NATIVE INDIAN ARMY.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Her Majesty's Government contemplate employing any portion of the Native Indian Army in Africa?

COLONEL STANLEY: No, Sir; it is at present not intended to employ any portion of the Native Indian Army in South Africa.

TURKEY—TREATY OF BERLIN.

QUESTION.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the text of a French Circular Despatch, bearing date October 21, and relating to the carrying out of the suggestions adopted by the Berlin Congress for settlement of the Greek-Turkish differences is correctly given in "The Times" of January 10; whether, in the event of such Despatch having been received, he will lay it without delay upon the Table; and, whether he will at the same time communicate the reply of Her Majesty's Government to that French Despatch?

MR. BOURKE: Yes, Sir; the text of the French despatch given by The Times is correct in all material points. As negotiations are still in progress, it is not possible, at any rate at present, to lay Papers on the Table.

THE RAILWAY COMMISSION—EXPENSES.—QUESTION.

MR. HERMON asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he will inform the House what has been the total cost of the Railway Commission during the four years it has been in existence, including salaries of Commissioners, clerks, offices, stationery, and any other expenses incurred by such Commission, and the number of cases submitted to their decision?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, we have been in communication with the Railway Commission on the subject of my hon. Friend's Question, and I shall be happy to give him a Return, stating the facts which he desires to know, if he will move for it.

CHINA—THE CHEFOO CONVENTION.
QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table a Copy of the Minutes of the Council of the Secretary of State for India which refer to the Chefoo Convention, and a Copy of the opinions of Members of the Council on the subject, if any such were put on record?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The negotiations with the Chinese Government with respect to the Chefoo Convention are still going on; and, therefore, it will be impossible at present to lay upon the Table the Papers asked for by the hon. Member.

AFGHANISTAN—EXPENSES OF MILITARY OPERATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether a Bill will be introduced to give effect to the proposal to advance £2,000,000, free of interest, from the English Exchequer to the Indian Government towards the expenses of the Afghan war; and, if so, when the Bill will be brought in?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I think it is possible that some little misapprehension may exist on this subject. It is not intended to make any advance to the Indian Government at the present moment on account of the expenses of the Afghan War. I merely intimated to the House, on a previous occasion, that it is possible that some such proposal may be made. Such a proposal, however, if made at all, will not be brought before the House until after the statement in reference to the Indian Budget has been made, and that statement will not be made until towards the close of the present month. The proposal, if made, will not have reference to the service of the current financial year, but to the service of the next financial year. I shall, therefore, probably not have occasion to bring it before the House until the Budget time. Of course, it will take the form of a Bill, and be subject to discussion in this House.

MR. FAWCETT gave Notice that he would call attention to the injurious effect likely to be produced both on the finances of England and India if such a form of contribution was carried out.

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—ALLEGED MASSACRE IN KHOST.—QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he has seen in the "Standard" of the 10th a letter from its correspondent giving a detailed account of the way in which General Roberts is carrying fire and sword into Khost, the substance of which is that after one day of fighting, in which our loss was, besides three camel drivers, only two men killed and four wounded, after the fighting was over, and apparently without any attempt to learn whether the enemy belonged to the neighbourhood or came from a distance, General Roberts issued an order that the numerous villages should be "looted," and "when the time for looting had expired, the order for burning was given," and "in ten minutes as many villages were in a blaze;" that during the day the Dragoons were ordered, in charging, to take no prisoners; that, after the fighting, some ninety prisoners were taken into camp from one of the villages, not by the Dragoons, and tied together with ropes, and on their making some attempt to escape they were set upon, and many of them were slaughtered in their bonds, the letter saying,

"The scene of this tragedy was appalling. The dead, the living, the dying, and the wounded, were still tied together, and all were lying huddled up in one confused mass of bodies;"

if Government have any information as to the truth of this account; and, if General Roberts was sent to Khost with orders consistent with the statement in the Viceroy's Proclamation that we had no quarrel with the Sirdars or people of Afghanistan, and would not willingly injure or interfere with them?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I have read the Report in The Standard of the operations in the Khost Valley. We have not yet received any official Report from General Roberts on the subject; but in a telegram to the Viceroy of India, on the 8th of January, he says—

"Enemy collected in considerable strength yesterday, almost surrounding the camp. Night attack was evidently intended, so I thought it advisable to take the initiative, and about noon marched out in three small columns. Result was most successful."

And then he describes the operations very briefly. On the 10th of January he telegraphed:—

"Your Excellency may rest assured that every care is taken to secure safety of camp followers, and that no undue severity has been or will be exercised in our dealings with the people. The result of our short sojourn in Kuram is more satisfactory than I could have hoped, and the punishment inflicted here on the 7th inst. was not more than the occasion deserved, and the safety of the force necessitated. Everything is quieting down now, and I hope we shall have no more trouble. Had I been less prompt it might have been different."

And on the 13th he adds—

"The people have had a severe lesson. But as they are being treated with the greatest kindness and consideration, they are rapidly becoming reassured."

As to the details mentioned by the correspondent of The Standard, I must ask the House to suspend its judgment until we receive General Robert's Report; but, although our forces have been much exposed to marauding attacks, I have reason to think that General Roberts is as anxious as anyone could be to inflict as little punishment for such outrages as is consistent with justice and with security.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—THE LAW OF ENGLAND.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY JAMES asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he would state to the House, whether any Ordinance has been published in Cyprus by virtue of which the Law of England will be administered to hybrid subjects in that island; and, if so, the date of such Ordinance; if such Ordinance has been published, what Law was administered in Cyprus prior to its publication and since its occupation by English troops; to what law are the Christian people of other nations residing in Cyprus now subjected; do Her Majesty's Government claim to exclude the jurisdiction of other States over their own subjects in Cyprus; and, whether an English barrister was by the High Commissioner refused permission to appear on behalf of an English subject in a Court of Justice in Cyprus without the permission of the Turkish Minister of Justice; and, if so, whether such refusal meets with the approval of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. BOURKE: Yes, Sir, a temporary Ordinance has been passed by the Legislative Council of Cyprus establishing a High Court. In that High Court justice will be administered in accordance with the law of England, as far as circumstances will admit, and this Court will exercise jurisdiction over British subjects and foreigners. The Ordinance was made on December 21 last, and will be laid upon the Table of the House. With regard to the next Question, the law administered in Cyprus prior to the publication of this Ordinance was that embodied in the Ottoman Codes; but provision has been made for the attendance of the British Commissioners at the trial of all civil and criminal cases to see that justice is done. As to the third and fourth Questions, the answer I have given to the first Question will answer generally both of them; but I must also say that it would be unsatisfactory to give a summary of the exact state of things under the new law in answer to a Question. As to the last Question, an English barrister was refused permission to appear in a Court of Justice on the ground that, according to the Turkish law, it is necessary that the advocates practising in these Courts should submit themselves to the regulations of the Ministry of Justice. That decision was arrived at by Sir Garnet Wolseley, and under the circumstances his conduct has been approved of by Her Majesty's Government. But I may add that before the High Court, now established under a temporary law, barristers will be able to practise provided always they are duly qualified. I may also mention that the measures which have hitherto been taken to secure the proper administration of justice in the Island are of a temporary character, and a comprehensive scheme of judicial reform and re-organization is now receiving the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

SIR HENRY JAMES asked, Whether the hon. Gentleman would answer more explicitly the fourth Question, with reference to the jurisdiction of other States?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the Ordinance which has just been passed has not yet come into operation, nor am I aware that it has been published. All I can say is that it has been passed by the Legislative Assembly simply. At present Her Majesty's Government have not seen it in the form in which it has been passed. I am sorry that I cannot answer the Question more definitely, and I must refer the hon. and learned Member to the Ordinance itself, which will be in the hands of hon. Members shortly.

INDIAN COINAGE ACT—THE CURRENCY.—QUESTION.

MR. GOSCHEN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will undertake that no changes shall be made in the regulations affecting the Currency of India without Parliament having the opportunity of discussing them prior to their coming into force?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware that under the Indian Coinage Acts the Governor General in Council has the power of regulating the details of the currency without fresh legislation; and, therefore, I cannot give so large an undertaking as the right hon. Gentleman desires. I have communicated with the Secretary of State for India, who has authorized me to state that should any radical change be adopted while Parliament is sitting, he will take care that Parliament shall have the opportunity of expressing its opinion on the matter before it finally comes into force.

GAS COMPANIES—THE ELECTRIC LIGHT — LEGISLATION.— QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (for Sir JOHN LUBBOCK) asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to bring in any general measure with reference to the Gas Companies in case the electric light should be perfected for general use?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have no general measure in contemplation of that character. I understand from the Chairman of Ways and Means that he proposes to refer various Private Bills that have been introduced this Session to one strong Committee, who shall consider the whole question.

ARMY (INDIA)—INCREASED EXPENSES. QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the application for the considerable additions to the garrison of India in the form of extra batteries, regiments, and battalions, in excess of the numbers in the Estimates of the current year, was concurred in by the Council of India; and, whether India is to bear the cost of this increase in the European force, as also for the cost of the Native troops specially raised for the frontier operations?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I understand that telegrams passed in October last between the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India on the subject of retaining in India certain batteries of Royal Artillery which would in the ordinary course have come home in the winter. It was decided that two batteries should be so detained, and that three garrison batteries be sent out instead of two horse batteries which otherwise would have gone. These telegrams, I am informed, were submitted in the usual course for the information of the Council; but the proposals were not formally laid before the Council for approval. I am not aware whether any distinction will be made between one class of expenditure and another.

SPAIN — THE "LARK" AND THE "OCTAVIA."—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any likelihood of a settlement of the claims against the Spanish Government arising out of the seizure of the "Lark" and the "Octavia"; and, whether there is any objection to laying the Correspondence in both cases upon the Table of the House?

MR. BOURKE: The Spanish Government has adhered to its refusal to give compensation in the case of the Lark; and, in view of the conflicting nature of the evidence in the case, Her Majesty's Government do not feel justified in pressing the claim any further. I have no objection to lay the Papers on the Table, except that they are very voluminous. If any hon. Members wish to see them they are quite at their disposal. With regard to the Octavia, Her Majesty's Government have reason to hope that a satisfactory solution will be arrived at between the two Governments; but, as the matter is still under discussion, I do not think it would be desirable to present Papers to Parliament at present upon this subject.

Mr. Bourke

DIVINITY SCHOOL, DUBLIN UNIVERSITY.—QUESTION.

MR. PLUNKET asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, having regard to the Report of the Dublin University Commission (1878), Her Majesty's Government is prepared to make any proposals with a view to the future management and support of the Divinity School, connected with Trinity College, and the University of Dublin?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, that the subject referred to was now engaging the attention of the Government, and if his hon. Friend will kindly repeat his Question in a week's time he hoped to be able to answer it.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE GRAND DUCHESS OF HESSE (PRINCESS ALICE).

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS OF 16TH DECEMBER, 1878.

THE VICE CHAMBERLAIN OF HER MAJESTY'S HOUSEHOLD (Viscount BARRINGTON) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address [16th December 1878], as followeth:—

I thank you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful Address, and especially for the affectionate expression of your condolence with me on the loss of My beloved Daughter.

It is highly gratifying to Me to feel assured of the interest which you take in everything that concerns Me and My Family, and of your loyalty to My Throne, as well as your attachment to My Person.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE PAPERS.
QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether care would be taken that the Papers on the South African Question should be presented to Members of Parliament as soon as possible? In explanation, he might state that he understood the Papers which had been presented to most hon. Members that (Monday) morning were in possession of the Press on Saturday morning, and not only so, but copies of them were seen in some of the clubs. There might be some convenience in the Papers being sent to the Press; but he thought care should be taken that they should be in the hands of Members of Parliament as soon. It was only fair that such information should be communicated to hon. Members at the earliest possible date.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that matter should be attended to. He was not aware that what the noble Marquess described had occurred, and he hardly supposed that his right hon. Friend the Colonial Secretary, who was not then in his place, could have known of it. But the Government would do what they could to put such Papers as soon as possible in the hands of Members. He understood that another batch of Papers were to be laid on the Table in the course of a week or so, and they would, no doubt, be printed and distributed as quickly as possible.

MOTIONS.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Business of the House."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that sufficient Notice had not been given of the Resolutions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to submit to the House with reference to the Business of the House to enable hon. Members to deal satisfactorily with the subject that night. An opportunity had not been given for placing Amendments on the Paper; and, therefore, if they went on with the debate that evening, they would have to discuss proposals of the greatest importance which they had not seen until they were suddenly sprung upon them. It was desirable that more time should be given for their consideration. On Committees of this kind the Government of the day was always very largely represented. There were originally five right hon. Gentlemen on a Committee of 15; and when the Committee was increased to 17, it included only three independent Members of the Opposition sitting below the Gangway.

All of these latter differed from the Report, which, therefore, did not come before the House with the weight which it would possess had it been unanimously adopted. There were other reasons for postponing the consideration of these Resolutions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Many hon. Members were of opinion that they ought to be discussed in a Committee of the Whole House rather than in the House itself, with the Speaker in the Chair. No doubt the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was Chairman of the Select Committee, and whose own Resolutions many of these were, must take the leading part in the discussions; and the right hon. Gentleman would be able to speak as often as he pleased in Committee of the Whole House. Besides, it would be more in accordance with precedent that Notice should be given of Amendments; and for this reason, also, it was desirable that the consideration of the question should be postponed. The original proposals laid before the Select Committee had not been published with the evidence, and were not in the possession of the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, and the Members for Chester, Sandwich, North Warwickshire, Glasgow, and Cambridge University all submitted schemes, which, if the Resolutions were proceeded with to-night, would probably be proposed in the shape of Amendments. Sufficient time ought, therefore, to be given to enable those Gentlemen to place their Amendments on the Paper.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: I must second the appeal made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke). A discussion of this sort is a delicate and difficult one; it is far more wide-reaching than, perhaps, any of us imagine. Therefore, it ought to be entered upon not only with calmness, but without any possible feeling of grievance. This first proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer goes much further than those who have not studied this subject can have any idea of, for it indirectly affects our proceedings on all days. There were various proposals submitted to the Select Committee for altering our Rule of Monday Supply. Some restricted the liberties of hon. Members more than others. For reasons that may be perfectly right, the Chancellor of the Exchequer selected, and induced the Committee to adopt, an extreme proposal — that one which limited the independence of hon. Members the most. This extreme proposal the right hon. Gentleman has embodied in his first Resolution. I think, therefore, we have a claim for ample time. I was one of the few Members present before Christmas, when an interlocutory debate on the question was unexpectedly started by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). On that occasion, the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave the ordinary stereotyped intimation that Resolutions upon the Business of the House would be brought forward during the Session; but certainly it did not occur to me, or to anyone else, that that promise would be redeemed by taking the very earliest possible opportunity of doing so. As my hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke) says, the Notice of these Resolutions is so short that hon. Members have not had a fair chance of placing Amendments on the Paper, for they had only Friday. Three or four hon. Members, myself amongst the number, have put Amendments down; but the House generally has not had an opportunity of studying these Resolutions and considering Amendments. For my own part, I confess that, instead of reading more pious books on Sunday, my attention during much of yesterday was bestowed upon the Blue Book. It is idle to say that that Blue Book appeared before the close of last Session. Practically, Members are not expected to take up a past Session's Blue Book till the consideration of the matters contained in it approaches; while our duty has lately led us rather to study those relating to Afghanistan, to Turkey, and, unhappily, to South Africa. Under these circumstances, would it not be only fair, as a matter of equity, to give us a little more than from Friday morning to Monday evening to study these Resolutions, and not so long as that for the Amendments upon them? I trust that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will assent to the suggestion of my hon. Friend (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and not send us into the discussion with a sense of something like irritation.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he was very anxious to support his hon. Friend

Sir Charles W. Dilke

"Your Excellency may rest assured that every care is taken to secure safety of camp followers, and that no undue severity has been or will be exercised in our dealings with the people. The result of our short sojourn in Kuram is more satisfactory than I could have hoped, and the punishment inflicted here on the 7th inst. was not more than the occasion deserved, and the safety of the force necessitated. Everything is quieting down now, and I hope we shall have no more trouble. Had I been less prompt it might have been different."

And on the 13th he adds—

"The people have had a severe lesson. But as they are being treated with the greatest kindness and consideration, they are rapidly becoming reassured."

As to the details mentioned by the correspondent of The Standard, I must ask the House to suspend its judgment until we receive General Robert's Report; but, although our forces have been much exposed to marauding attacks, I have reason to think that General Roberts is as anxious as anyone could be to inflict as little punishment for such outrages as is consistent with justice and with security.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—THE LAW OF ENGLAND.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY JAMES asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he would state to the House, whether any Ordinance has been published in Cyprus by virtue of which the Law of England will be administered to hybrid subjects in that island; and, if so, the date of such Ordinance; if such Ordinance has been published, what Law was administered in Cyprus prior to its publication and since its occupation by English troops; to what law are the Christian people of other nations residing in Cyprus now subjected; do Her Majesty's Government claim to exclude the jurisdiction of other States over their own subjects in Cyprus; and, whether an English barrister was by the High Commissioner refused permission to appear on behalf of an English subject in a Court of Justice in Cyprus without the permission of the Turkish Minister of Justice; and, if so, whether such refusal meets with the approval of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. BOURKE: Yes, Sir, a temporary Ordinance has been passed by the Legislative Council of Cyprus establishing a High Court. In that High Court justice will be administered in accordance with the law of England, as far as circumstances will admit, and this Court will exercise jurisdiction over British subjects and foreigners. The Ordinance was made on December 21 last, and will be laid upon the Table of the House. With regard to the next Question, the law administered in Cyprus prior to the publication of this Ordinance was that embodied in the Ottoman Codes; but provision has been made for the attendance of the British Commissioners at the trial of all civil and criminal cases to see that justice is done. As to the third and fourth Questions, the answer I have given to the first Question will answer generally both of them; but I must also say that it would be unsatisfactory to give a summary of the exact state of things under the new law in answer to a Question. As to the last Question, an English barrister was refused permission to appear in a Court of Justice on the ground that, according to the Turkish law, it is necessary that the advocates practising in these Courts should submit themselves to the regulations of the Ministry of Justice. That decision was arrived at by Sir Garnet Wolseley, and under the circumstances his conduct has been approved of by Her Majesty's Government. But I may add that before the High Court, now established under a temporary law, barristers will be able to practise provided always they are duly qualified. I may also mention that the measures which have hitherto been taken to secure the proper administration of justice in the Island are of a temporary character, and a comprehensive scheme of judicial reform and re-organization is now receiving the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

SIR HENRY JAMES asked, Whether the hon. Gentleman would answer more explicitly the fourth Question, with reference to the jurisdiction of other States?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the Ordinance which has just been passed has not yet come into operation, nor am I aware that it has been published. All I can say is that it has been passed by the Legislative Assembly simply. At present Her Majesty's Government have not seen it in the form in which it has been passed. I am sorry that I cannot answer the Question more definitely, time had come for the appointment of a Committee, and last year it was appointed. On the 24th of January last year his right hon. Friend moved for the appointment of a Committee, and the House agreed to it without a dissentient voice. A good deal of consideration was given as to the Gentlemen who should be selected, and on the 25th of February his right hon. Friend nominated the Members of the Committee. They sat from the 5th of April to the 5th of July, on the 6th they agreed to their Report, and the Report was presented to the House on the 8th of July. Seven months had since then elapsed, during which hon. Members had had plenty of opportunities for considering the Report; and if they were not now prepared to make up their minds with reference to the subject, he would be glad to know when they would be ready to give an opinion upon it? It appeared to him one of the most unreasonable requests that could be made to ask for further time for consideration. He urged the House, if it intended to do any Business this Session, to consider the Resolutions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer called on them to take in hand. It was not now the first week of February, but the third. On Thursday next the Government would introduce the new Military Code, which must be passed by the 25th of April. He would ask, therefore, whether there was any time to be lost?

MR. BENTINCK said, the hon. Member for Chelsea had attributed to him the remark that when both front Benches above the Gangway agreed upon anything they were sure to be wrong. That was a somewhat sweeping remark, and he did not recollect having made it. But if, on the present occasion, the two front Benches concurred in approving the Resolutions that were about to be submitted to the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was quite prepared to accept the responsibility of the observation which the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea had attributed to him. The objections to proceeding with the discussion of the Resolutions were so strong that he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would yield to the appeal which had been made to him.

MR. ANDERSON said, there was no complaint against the Chancellor of the Exchequer for putting his Resolutions on the Paper at the very beginning of the Session. The complaint was that so extremely brief an interval was allowed between their appearance on the Paper and their proposed discussion, and that so little time was given for the preparation of Amendments. If they were driven to discuss the Chancellor of the Exchequer's propositions now, many Amendments would have to be considered which were not in print, and the scope of which they could not, therefore, fairly appreciate. What the Chancellor of the Exchequer had done had the appearance of taking the House by surprise, although he acquitted him of the intention of doing so. To allow time for Amendments, he urged there should be delay.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, I would humbly represent to hon. Members that there is no real foundation for the allegation that the proposals made by the Government have taken the House by surprise. At the commencement of the Session before Christmas, I immediately put it to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that if the House believed with its Committee that it had not the time for its Business, that it lacked means for facilitating the Business of the House, it was most desirable that the alteration of its Rules should be considered, and, if approved, adopted at the commencement of the Session. This is no new subject. Having heard from the then Leader of the House, in 1875, that he was unwilling to sanction the appointment of a Committee on the Public Business of the House, I proposed a Resolution upon this subject, on the 19th of February, 1875, now four years ago. Hon. Members will admit that this subject has been before them ever since. The circumstances, the history of the Sessions of 1876 and 1877, or of that of the early part of last Session, cannot have passed from their recollection; and though I admit, with the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), that one duty of the House is to represent the feelings of the people, I ask the House to remember that the progress of Public Business has been impeded during the last three Sessions. By proposing these Resolutions, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is only redeeming the pledge he gave when the House met before Christmas; and he has fulfilled his promise at a time when it must be obvious to every hon. Member—who can recollect, as I do, former discussions and the adoption of Amendments in the Rules of the House—that it is essential to discuss and, if approved of, to adopt the Amendments of these Rules, for the proper conduct of Public Business, early in the Session. I am perfectly aware that some of these proposals appear to fetter the action of the non-official Members of the House. There is no hon. Member of the House who has shown greater dislike to coercion of this kind than I have; but I cannot conceal from myself that the course of legislation has been to centralize local administration largely in the hands of Her Majesty's Ministers. The control of almost every branch of that which was formerly considered local administration—such as that of Prisons and Education—has been placed in the hands of the Government. Upon this Her Majesty's Ministers found a claim for more of the time of this House. I think it is politic to give Her Majesty's Ministers more of our time, because otherwise the House could exercise no control over these spheres of administration which have been recently placed in the hands of the Government. No one would regret more than I do that any hon. Member should be taken by surprise; but I do humbly submit that there are strong grounds for proceeding in this matter early in the Session.

MR. WALTER suggested that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might meet many of the difficulties which were felt by several hon. Members on both sides of the House if he would consent to have the Resolutions considered in Committee of the Whole House. It would otherwise, he believed, be impossible to discuss them with that freedom which was necessary in dealing with proposals of such a nature. He made the suggestion, he might add, with less hesitation, because his experience in that House led him to arrive at a conclusion somewhat different from some of his hon. Friends who sat on the Benches opposite with regard to the merits of the Resolutions. He was one of those who was disposed to think that the facilities which at present existed for occasioning delay and obstructing the passing not only of Government measures, but Bills of every description, were greater than was at all expedient. He was, therefore, inclined to look favourably, on the whole, on proposals which would impose some restrictions on those facilities; although when the Resolutions were brought forward he might have occasion to say a few words as to one or two points in which, in his opinion, they stood in need of amendment. But he, at all events, thought that in discussing Resolutions of such importance the utmost latitude and freedom should be allowed to every hon. Member; while the object which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had in view would, he believed, be facilitated by bringing them forward in Committee of the Whole House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that if the object of the hon. Member for Chelsea and those by whom he was supported was to put off altogether the discussion of the Resolutions, the course which they had taken was perfectly intelligible, and one upon which it would be desirable to test the feeling of the House. If, however, they and the great majority of the House were of opinion that some alteration was required in the mode of conducting its Business, then the only question was whether the present was a convenient time for taking the discussion? Now, for his own part, he ventured to think that the House would lose all chance of being able definitely to discuss the Resolutions if it allowed the opportunity which offered itself that evening to pass. The House had hardly begun—had hardly yet got into the full play of its legislative work; and there was, therefore, an opportunity that evening of discussing a question which was of great interest and of importance in relation to the transaction of the whole Business of the House. He ventured to say that Members were quite as competent to proceed with the consideration of the question at the present time as they would be a fortnight hence. The Resolutions were not of a startling character. If they had not been considered before there would have been some reason in saying that time was required for the purpose of studying and mastering them; but when Members observed what the Resolutions really were, they would find that there was only one that could be said to be at all of a novel character. And with regard to that particular Resolution, there would be no wish on the part of the Government to press it forward unduly; but with respect to the first, second, and third Resolutions, if they had not been before them in precisely the same words, they had, at all events, been several times before them in an analogous form. They had, therefore, not only had a knowledge of their character and bearing, but they had had a certain amount of experience of how proposals of the kind before them were worked. The question had been considered time after time; so that it was inconsistent with the recollection of the House for any Member to say that the House was taken by surprise by their introduction now. He altogether disclaimed the sort of idea which seemed to be entertained by several Members to the effect that there was an antagonism between the Government and the House in the matter, and that the Government were the natural enemies of the Opposition and wished to gain an advantage over them. That was not a fair suggestion to make against the Government. They were interested—as the whole House were interested—in getting the Business of the House properly conducted with economy of time, and in a manner most convenient to the Members. It was with the view of getting the Business so conducted that the Resolutions before them had been brought forward, containing, as they did, the best suggestions they could think of with that view; but, of course, it was open to any Member to make suggestions by way of Amendment upon them. They were perfectly able to discuss them as they stood; and he could see no advantage in going into Committee of the Whole House upon them.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was not sure, after the opinion which had been expressed as to the result of the concurrence of those who sat on the two front Benches, that he would do much service in rising to support the course proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He must, however, say that, ingenious though the arguments of the hon. Member for Chelsea and others might be, they seemed to him to be outweighed by one or two practical considerations. The first was that the House had absolutely nothing else to do that evening, and a large number of Members were prepared to enter into the discussion of the subject; and the second that if hon. Members were prepared to take into consideration any alteration in the Rules and Forms of procedure it was desirable that that should be done at the earliest possible moment, so that the Resolutions might be dealt with on their own merits, and should not be introduced in the middle of the Session, when it might be urged that they had been brought forward with reference to some particular circumstances. The first, he might add, and the most important of the Resolutions, related to Committee of Supply, and as Notice had been given that Committee of Supply would be taken on Monday next—and it was impossible to blame the Government for seeking to enter on that important portion of the Business before them as soon as possible—it was, in his opinion, most desirable that any alteration made in that respect should be made before next week. These practical considerations appeared to him to be of greater importance than the arguments which had been urged in favour of delay.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA urged the advantages of having the Resolutions discussed in Committee, since it was determined to proceed at once with the consideration of them. In a discussion such as that which now engaged the House, where verbal Amendments constituted the chief Business, it would be almost impossible to understand the reasons for using particular words, if one were not to have the latitude of inquiry and explanation consistent with the Rules of a Committee, but not so with the Rules of Debate in the House.

MR. GORST urged the same point, as otherwise it would be a case of Hobson's choice. The House must either accept the new Rules or rest content with those already in force.

MR. SYNAN complained that the course taken by the Government would deprive the House of the opportunity of considering Amendments on these Resolutions, and hoped the Government would yet agree to consider them in Committee. In a week's time they would be better able to give their opinion on the points raised by them.

MR. ONSLOW reminded the House that the Report of the Select Committee on Public Business was dated July 8, and that the Resolutions now before the House were a portion of those recommended by the Committee. He was not himself in favour of the Resolutions; but he could not contend that the House had been taken by surprise. He should oppose every one of them except the 5th and 6th. For himself, he thought that they required no further facilities for legislation; and that if the Government passed a Mutiny Bill and a Criminal Code Bill, besides the discussions that would take place on financial subjects, they would have done very well. He thought the Resolutions should be considered in Committee.

MR. RYLANDS said, he must confess he was somewhat disappointed at the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He could quite understand that the Government was determined to pass these Resolutions in their entirety; but if the Government were inclined to give the House a full and sufficient opportunity of considering the Resolutions—not with the alternative of accepting or rejecting them, but with the opportunity, it might be, of making improvements in them—then he must say he was disappointed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not fallen in with the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), that the House should resolve itself into a Committee upon the Resolutions. He rose for the purpose of submitting a formal Notice to the House, as an Amendment to the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—

“That this House will forthwith resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Resolutions of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer on the Business of the House.”

He even yet entertained the hope that the right hon. Gentleman would favourably consider the Amendment. Of course, it was quite true that the hon. Member for Chelsea would be willing to throw the Resolutions over entirely, and he dared say there were other hon. Gentlemen who were of the same opinion. He hoped that those hon. Gentlemen would not hesitate to vote for going into Committee; because it would be quite open to them—or to others who thought that due time had not been given for the consideration of the Resolutions—to move at once to report Progress. But the point which struck him as one of considerable difficulty in reading the Blue Book, which they all seemed to have been doing yesterday, was this—He found himself placed in considerable difficulty from the fact that throughout the Blue Book references were made to important suggestions which were put before the Committee, but with which he was entirely unfamiliar. The hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) was fully alive to the whole question, having sat upon the Committee; and he (Mr. Rylands) was quite sure that no man could sit upon a Committee of that kind with greater advantage. Well, that hon. Gentleman was, of course, fully acquainted with the recommendations which were made by the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) and other influential Members of the Committee, and which were printed for the use of Members, and which were referred to continually in the examination of witnesses, but which were not in the possession of the House. Now, he ventured to submit to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the other Members of the Committee that it would hardly be fair to ask those outside the Committee, who were anxious to come to a deliberate and reasonable conclusion upon these recommendations, to decide without placing them in the position of having the full information which was in the hands of the Committee. He said, further, that he believed it would be most unfortunate if the House were to proceed with this Business to-night, unless they went into Committee, because otherwise they would not have a full opportunity of discussing the points which might be brought before them. He was not very sure whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having moved the postponement of the Orders of the Day, might not be called to Order for subsequently making a speech, on the technical objection that he ought not to speak twice. [Cries of “No!”] He observed that the right hon. Gentleman shook his head, intimating that he was not out of Order; but, nevertheless, there was no Amendment before the House when he made his speech. Of course, they would none of them object to a speech from the right hon. Gentleman. They were only too happy to hear him on the question, and the very arguments in favour of a Committee was that, while first one suggestion and then another might be made, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to guide the House, by speaking as often as might be found necessary. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not further oppose the Amendment. He would certainly carry it to a division; because he thought it only right that the House, by resolving itself into Committee, should deal with the Resolutions in a manner which was likely to secure their full and proper discussion. The hon. Member concluded by formally moving his Amendment.

MR. DILLWYN seconded the Amendment. He observed that the House should be very careful how it voted these proposals of the Government, which tampered with the rights of private Members, and which they had had no time to consider.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will forthwith resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Resolutions of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer on the Business of the House,"—(Mr. Rylands,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. A. MILLS pointed out that they would be merely wasting time by proceeding with the discussion of the preliminary question. The very fact that four Amendments to the Resolutions had been put upon the Notice Paper was a proof that the matter was no surprise, but had been well considered by the Members of the House.

MR. DODSON observed, that Notice had been given of these Resolutions on Thursday. The Notice appeared on the Paper on Friday, and there had been ample time for considering what Amendments should be proposed. The proposals of the Government, moreover, were not absolutely new. The principal one had been discussed several times before. During more than one Session they had had actual experience of the operation of this Rule, or of one closely resembling it. The difficulty of so proposing the first Amendment as not to exclude others was imaginary. As to the question whether the matter should be considered in the House or in Committee, he pointed out that if it were considered in Committee there would be this advantage—that hon. Members could speak more than once to the same question, and that the Mover could speak in defence of his own Resolution as often as he pleased. On the other hand, there would be no great difficulty in conducting the discussion in the House; because it would be open to every hon. Member to speak upon each proposition and upon each Amendment to each proposition. At the same time, if it would be more agreeable to hon. Members to take the discussion in Committee, he thought it would be worth while for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make this concession.

Mr. Rylands

MR. GORST thought that owing to the form of the Resolutions it would be better to postpone the discussion upon them.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN remarked that there was no real difficulty in the form of the Resolution, and it was a mistake to suppose that no Amendments could be introduced if the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) was negatived. The Speaker could put the Question that the word "whenever" in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Resolutions stand part of the Question, and if that was carried, any Amendments could be subsequently moved. If the House would only now consent to discuss the Amendment actually before it, it would at least be decided whether or not the House was willing to make any alteration at all. That would be at least one step gained.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE explained that the Amendment was not so inconsistent as it might seem, because his hon. Friend was obliged by the Forms of the House to insert in it the word "forthwith." That, however, could be remedied by the mode of putting the Question, and on that ground he should support the Amendment; but he gave Notice that he should move to report Progress, not in any factious sense, but with a view to testing the opinion of the House as to whether they should go on with the matter to-night or not.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain what the law of the matter was, because many hon. Members were puzzled by the conflicting explanations they had heard.

MR. ASSHETON thought it would be a great waste of time to discuss the Resolutions in Committee of the Whole House, if they had afterwards to discuss them over again on the Report. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. A. Mills) observed that the fact that Notice of four Amendments had been given was proof that there had been time for putting Amendments on the Paper; but those Amendments related entirely to negative points.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, it appeared to him, from the discussion which had taken place, that nobody was prepared to deal satisfactorily with these Resolutions who had not had the advantage of sitting on the Select Committee. Even two Members of the Committee had pleaded for more time. What, then, was to be said for those who had not sat on the Committee at all? The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had pleaded for more time, and so had the hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), who was a gentleman of undoubted piety, and he had told them that he had been obliged to put aside his piety yesterday, in order to have a little time to read the Blue Book on this subject. These were features of the discussion which had impressed themselves very much upon him. If he looked down the list of those who wanted immediate discussion, he found that it contained such Members as the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Leader of the Opposition—no doubt two most distinguished Members of the House; but it should be remembered that they were Members of the Select Committee, and knew all that had taken place there, while other Members had not yet had an opportunity to master what took place before that Committee. The Resolutions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer intended to move were said to be for the purpose of facilitating Public Business; but, in his opinion, they ought to be called Resolutions for the purpose of fettering public discussion. If their object was to get rid of Public Business and simply shelve and evade it, then he, for one, must say these Resolutions would accomplish the object. If an adjournment took place, there would be an opportunity for hon. Members to put other Amendments on the Paper; and when the discussion took place on some future day, they would have an opportunity of ascertaining what was the collective wisdom of the House in reference to the subject.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he should have been in favour, under ordinary circumstances, of taking the discussion on these Resolutions in Committee of the Whole House, but there would be no use in doing that to-night; because, as already had been pointed out, many hon. Gentlemen had not yet had an opportunity of considering the details of the subject, and therefore would not be prepared to go into those minute particulars which would be raised in Committee. If they went into Committee now, there would, in his humble opinion, be a waste of time of the most stupendous character. He by no means wished to impute to the Government any deliberate intention to surprise the House. No doubt it was perfectly true that they had been generally acquainted with this neglect for a long time past; but they were not acquainted with these particular Rules which the Government were to propose, and it was a surprise that they should be taken on this particular day. It was said the House had had sufficient time to consider the proposals of the Government because they were put on the Paper on Friday. But, as far as Friday was concerned, the Irish Members had to consider a matter of the weightiest importance to their own country, and they had not time on that day to consider these Resolutions; and, therefore, he thought these were the strongest reasons for not going on with the discussion to-night.

SIR ANDREW LUSK thought that the subject-matter of the Resolutions was so old that they might proceed to the discussion of them at once, and he should invite the House to endeavour to do something to amend its procedure.

MR. COURTNEY said, that the Resolutions could not be considered in Committee without a great waste of time. He concurred, also, in urging on the House the fact that there had really been no time for giving Notice of Amendments.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the course proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was an attempt to curtail the opportunities of discussing grievances before going into Committee of Supply. The right hon. Gentleman had taken care not to suggest anything in lieu of lost opportunities.

MR. O'CLERY said, he did not fear to state that the hurried discussion of the proposed Resolutions would excite feelings of indignation in the public mind throughout Ireland. It could not be disguised that those Resolutions were aimed directly at the curtailment of the privileges of the Irish Representatives. In taking this course, the Government was following out the policy of hostility to Ireland with which it initiated the present Session. On the first night the Government contemptuously abandoned the measure of University Education, with which it had excited the hopes of the Irish people for months previously. The Borough Franchise Bill—a measure of vast importance to Ireland—was overwhelmed by the sheer force of numbers summoned from all parts of the country by the Conservative Whips. But not content with this, that very occasion, while the Irish Members were engaged in supporting the Franchise Bill, and were, in consequence, practically precluded from giving Notice of Amendments, the Chancellor of the Exchequer seized to fix to-night for his first attempt to stifle free speech in that House. And, accordingly, in pursuance of this policy of hostility, these Resolutions were to be forced upon them. He was sure every Irish Representative present would deem it his duty to give the proposals of the Government the most determined and sustained resistance.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would advert to one or two points which had been raised by hon. Members. He would not say anything about the point as to whether he was out of Order in speaking a second time, for he had not spoken a first time. He would assume that it was the usual practice on making a Motion for the Mover to refrain from making a speech at the beginning, and to reserve any observations he wished to make until afterwards. But, setting aside that, he wished to point out that two or three of his hon. Friends had been under a false impression as to the mode in which it would be necessary that the decision of the House should be taken upon the Resolutions as they were presented. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) thought it would be necessary for the Speaker to put the Amendment of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) in such a form that if that Amendment should be rejected the first Resolution that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had put upon the Paper must be accepted without any alteration; and he suggested that that difficulty could be got over if that question were raised in Committee instead of the Whole House. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) apprehended it could be raised either in Committee or in the Whole House. He apprehended it would be in the power of the Speaker or of the Chairman of Committees to put a Question in such a way as to leave it open to any Member to move an Amendment upon it. If he was wrong in that opinion, the Speaker could correct him. It must be borne in mind, as pointed out by the hon. Member for Clitheroe (Mr. Assheton), that Resolutions of this kind had to be reported; that there must be a second discussion on the Report; and that any number of Amendments could be moved over again on the Report. There was only one observation more which he wished to make, and that was that on the present occasion they were proceeding in the ordinary way, or at least in the spirit of the ordinary way of conducting the Business of the House. Monday was a day on which the Government had precedence for their Business. The particular Business which the Government proposed to-day was the discussion of these Orders; and he thought it was rather hard that a question should be raised as to the propriety of their putting down Business in the order which seemed to them most convenient to the House. If these Resolutions were not taken into consideration, of course he had done his duty in bringing them forward, and he must leave the responsibility of such a proceeding on the House itself. He must ask the House to pass judgment on the Resolutions in the form which he had submitted them.

MR. SPEAKER: As there seems to be some doubt as to the course to be taken in putting this Question, perhaps the House will allow me to explain. As the matter stands at present, there is one Amendment only on the Paper to the first Resolution of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be moved by the hon. Member for Burnley. If that was the only Amendment before the House, it would be my duty, according to the ordinary practice, to put the Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question." But should it come to my knowledge that other Amendments are about to be proposed, and that the House desires that these other Amendments should be entertained, it would become my duty so to put the Question that those Amendments should be open to discussion.

MR. BIGGAR urged that there had not been sufficient opportunity for considering these Resolutions, and that the discussion should be adjourned till Thursday.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 192 ; Noes 75 : Majority 117.—(Div. List, No. 8.)

Main Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 185 ; Noes 53 : Majority 132.—(Div. List, No. 9.)

Resolved, That the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Business of the House.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—RESOLUTIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, on rising to move the first of the Resolutions which stood in his name, said, he thought he should consult the convenience of the House by making his remarks as short as possible. Hon. Members were aware that for some years past the subject of carrying on the Business of the House had been repeatedly under consideration. One question which had been discussed was whether any arrangement could be made to secure certainty in bringing forward the Estimates. No one, he supposed, doubted that the careful consideration of the Estimates presented by the Government of the day for the acceptance of Parliament was one of the most important functions of the House. Hon. Members doubtless cherished, and would on no account infringe upon, the good old Rule that the consideration of grievances must precede the granting of Supplies, and that ample opportunities ought to be given for bringing forward matters of importance before grants were made of the Supplies asked for by the Crown. But, according to the mode in which the Business of the House was now conducted, there really was not the smallest difficulty in bringing forward any subject that was of importance enough to deserve consideration. It was frequently found, however, that in order to obtain discussions on matters of a very minor character they made for themselves the greatest grievances by putting off the discussion of large Estimates of expenditure until it was impossible to discuss them properly, and there was so much uncertainty as to the time at which such discussions would be taken that the House was not able to perform its proper duty of watching and checking the Estimates. The Government might put down the Estimates for Monday, and the whole evening might be spent in discussing matters wholly foreign to the subject before them, and the same might happen on Thursday and the following Monday, and Members who had studied the Estimates and wished to speak upon them, attending at some inconvenience, perhaps, had not the opportunity which they ought to have. At last the Estimates were brought forward at an hour when those who had charge of them could not get a proper hearing. He would put it to the economists of the House, and especially to those Gentlemen who sat below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House, who exercised very useful functions in criticizing the Estimates, whether it was not more in their interest than even in the interest of the Government that a plan should be devised of bringing forward the Estimates with something like certainty as to the time? That was the ground on which he moved the first of these Resolutions, which was in the following terms :—

"That, whenever the Committee of Supply or the Committee of Ways and Means stands as the first Order of the Day on a Monday, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any Question."

That was to say, that there would be no facilities on those days for moving Amendments before going into Committee of Supply. He would point out that this was not altogether a novel proposition. In the course of the discussion they had already had the House had been reminded that something of the kind had not only been several times proposed, but it had actually been adopted for two or three Sessions. He would call the attention of some of the Irish Members who seemed to think that this Resolution was aimed in some way at them to the fact that the following Resolution was passed in 1872:—

“Whenever Notice has been given that Estimates will be moved in Committee of Supply, and the Committee stands as the first Order of the Day upon any day, except Thursday and Friday, on which Government Orders have precedence, the Speaker shall, when the Order for the Committee has been read, forthwith leave the Chair without putting any Question, and the House shall thereupon resolve itself into such Committee.”

That was what was now proposed, with this exception—

“Unless on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, or Civil Service Estimates respectively, an Amendment be moved relating to the division of Estimates proposed to be considered on that day.”

That, of course, was a considerable modification of the proposal, and it was one which, in the course of the discussion this evening, might be carefully considered. The Resolution in that qualified form was passed in 1872, and again in 1873. It was not renewed in the first two Sessions of the present Parliament; but, in 1876, it was revived with a modification—the word “first” was left out, and then the words ran “unless on going into Committee,” &c., “Amendments be moved relating to the division of the Estimates proposed to be considered that day.” There was, of course, a good deal to be said in favour of retaining the power of raising questions relating to the Estimates to be proposed; on the other hand, there was something to be said against it. It led to a great waste of time, and perhaps there was less excuse for it than for introducing wholly extraneous topics. Let them take, for example, the Army Estimates. He had noticed several times that the Minister who had to introduce them was kept for hours waiting in consequence of a great many questions of a miscellaneous character relating to the Estimates being raised; and the Minister was precluded from giving, in a concise and convenient form, explanations of his Estimates, which, to a great extent, might have answered by anticipation many of those questions. He had often seen the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty kept waiting hour after hour; and, in some cases, he was obliged to defer his statement to another day. That was not for the convenience of the House, and it would be far better that the statement of the Minister should be first made, not for his convenience or the convenience of the Government, but that the House might have before it a fair explanation of what was about to be proposed. One of the objections to the House giving up this power was that if it did no convenient opportunity would be given for raising great questions of principle which could not easily be raised on details of the Estimates. He did not think an experience of Parliamentary Business confirmed the idea that the power of raising such questions depended on the exercise of this privilege of speaking before the House went into Committee. If any such question were to be raised—if, for example, any hon. Gentleman wished to challenge, as a whole, the system of our Army administration or the expenditure in any great branch of the Civil Service—there was no doubt whatever, if it was a matter of real and great importance, he would be perfectly able, by giving Notice of Motion, to obtain a day for the discussion of such Notice. But if it was a small matter which affected only some detail of expenditure, he would be perfectly able, when they came to that detail, to raise the question upon it. Of course, it could not be denied that in any great change there would be a sacrifice of something; but the question was, would not the House gain a great deal more, and would not the slight sacrifice that would be made be compensated by the advantages that would be obtained by having a fair and more certain discussion of the Estimates? He really thought it was unnecessary for him to say anything more in favour of the proposal he had made, and he would therefore venture to move the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, whenever the Committee of Supply or the Committee of Ways and Means stands as the first Order of the Day on a Monday, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question.”—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. RYLANDS: Sir, the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer has

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

certainly been in every respect a fair statement; but he has admitted that the Resolution which we are about to discuss is not even an old friend with a new face, but is a new Resolution of a more stringent character than any under which the House has been previously placed. It is more stringent than the Resolution of 1872; it is much more stringent than that of 1876; and if this Resolution is adopted by the House, the effect will be that every Monday when Supply is put down as the first Order of the Day, Mr. Speaker will forthwith leave the Chair, and there will be no opportunity of taking a discussion on going into Committee of Supply on the Estimates. The right hon. Gentleman did indeed bring forward one argument of considerable force. He said that when a Minister in charge of a Department has to make a statement on the Army or Navy Estimates, he is often placed in an inconvenient position owing to the number of Motions that have to be previously disposed of. But admitting the public inconvenience of that state of things, it might be met by a much less sweeping measure than that now proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In fact, it might be met without a Resolution at all; if it were understood to be the wish of the House on making the Motion to go into Committee of Supply on the Army and Navy Estimates, the Minister might make a statement. But I believe you, Sir, would consider that, unless it were the wish of the House that that change should be made, the practice is one that you would not encourage or perhaps permit. But, certainly, if it were thought desirable, the difficulty put in the front by the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be removed without any Resolution. This Resolution as it stands applies not only to Committees of Supply, but of Ways and Means. It would prevent any discussion on a Monday on going into either Committee. I recollect, on one occasion, that I and other hon. Members raised some question on a Budget on going into Committee of Ways and Means, and we did so with so much effect that the Budget was altered, although the Government had a great majority at the time. I admit that there are plausible reasons in favour of there being a greater attention paid to the Estimates, and, indeed, those were the reasons which, in 1872, led me to support the Resolution brought forward by the then Government. When I did so, however, I was young in the House of Commons, and my confidence in the occupants of the Treasury Bench had not been tempered by experience in the ways of the House. But from what I have seen of the operation of that Resolution, I have some reason to doubt whether the reasons brought forward in favour of it are sanctioned by experience. I am sorry to see few Conservative Members present. I should like them to oppose this Resolution, because it was the practice of Conservative Members in former Sessions to oppose such Resolutions. Mr. Disraeli, in opposition to a similar Motion in 1862, said—

“If you tamper with, and trench upon, the privileges which the House of Commons has hitherto enjoyed with so much advantage to the nation, you may ultimately find that you have raised throughout the country a spirit of discontent and dissatisfaction which you will have much cause to regret and much difficulty in allaying. What practical advantage, I ask, do you think can flow from priggish, pedantic, and petty attempts to deal with the Rules of this House?”—[3 Hansard, clxv. 157.]

In subsequent years the Conservative Party had no difficulty in opposing Resolutions of this kind. In 1872, in opposition to a less stringent Resolution than the present proposal, no fewer than 20 Conservative Members—afterwards Members of the Administration—voted against it. The present Judge Advocate General took a very distinguished part in opposition to the Resolution. He positively boiled over with eloquent indignation in denouncing that attempt on the part of the Government to rob Parliament of its rights. If he takes part in this debate, I hope he will defer his speech until after dinner, when there is a greater number of hon. Members present, so that the Members of the present Parliament may have an opportunity of hearing an eloquence familiar to the Members of the last Parliament. Then there was another hon. Gentleman, the present Secretary for the Treasury, who took a most important part in opposition to the Resolution of 1872. In fact, he and the Judge Advocate General, par nobile fratrum, were the Tellers against the Resolution of 1872. They had in support of their views the voice and arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Hunt), whose loss we all deplore. They had the support of the right hon. Gentleman the late Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), then the Nestor of the House of Commons, who implored the House not to support the Government in proposing a muzzling measure. Then there was the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), who made a valuable speech on the same side. Of course, the other Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) was there then, and I am glad to see that he is here now. Then there was the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), whom ever since I have been in the House I have been accustomed to rely upon to defend the rights of independent Members; but whom, I am afraid, is somewhat falling away, and is becoming somewhat weak-kneed. Then there was the Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), who was then opposed to the Resolution, and will oppose it now. In opposing this Resolution of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we are, then, only taking the course taken by so many eminent Conservatives in 1872, in opposing a Resolution which was not so stringent or so violent an attack on the Privileges of the House as that which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is now proposing. I will now deal with the reasons which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given in favour of the Resolution. In 1872 there was no practical experience of a Resolution of this kind. Since then we have had experience, and we have seen that every reason which was brought forward in 1872 as justifying this restriction on the privileges of private Members has proved delusive. In 1872 I was influenced by the expectation that if we could pass some Resolution of this kind the greater certainty of Supply coming on would secure a larger attendance and better discussions in Committee of Supply. But experience has shown that the attendance in Committee of Supply has not been increased by the operation of the Resolution of 1872. No doubt it has tended to the convenience of myself and other hon. Members who desired to discuss the Estimates; but we have found that we have had to conduct our discussions in the presence of empty benches. Indeed, the very fact that hon. Members knew that Supply was coming on has led them to stay away. I and others have discussed the Votes, have challenged divisions, and then, when the division bell rung, a number of hon. Members who had not heard the discussion have rushed in, and we have been overruled. Besides this, if we are to choose between having the opportunity of checking some small items in Committee of Supply, or of having the opportunity on going into Committee of Supply of challenging the policy of the Government, which may entail the expenditure of millions, I must say I would myself rather give up the opportunity of challenging the Votes in Committee of Supply than of challenging the policy of a Ministry. But it is said that if we agree to this Resolution Votes will be taken early in the Session, and that we should be saved the scandalous exhibition which often takes place when in the Dog-days we are hurrying through Supply, and the Votes are taken one after the other, often after midnight. But there is no proof that the restriction introduced by the Resolution of 1872 prevented Votes being taken late in the Session. On June 24, 1872, I find that there were 93 Votes remaining to be voted, and they were scrambled through afterwards. In 1877, when a less stringent Resolution was passed, there were, on June 28, 128 Votes still remaining to be voted. But in 1878, when there was no Resolution at all, on June 29, there were only 72 Votes remaining to be voted. Therefore, the advantage contemplated is not shown to have been gained by the operation of the Rule. There is another abuse to which I must refer. There has grown up a most objectionable practice by the Government for the time being to take Votes on Account. I know the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer agrees with me in my objection to this course, and I am not bringing the charge against the present Government in any way more than former Governments; but I think there has been a growing tendency on the part of Governments to take Votes on Account, and then, the Departments being quieted, Supply is put off. In 1872, when this Resolution was in operation, and which was intended to prevent the necessity of taking Votes on Account, up to May 27,

Mr. Rylands

the Government had come down to the House for £2,734,000 on account. Up to May 10, 1874, when there was no such Resolution in force, the Government came down for rather more on account—£3,142,000—and on June 26, 1876, under a much less stringent Resolution than that now proposed, the Government had obtained £3,061,000. But in 1877, when the less stringent Rule was still in existence, the Government came down for no less than £5,337,000 up to June 22. So that, so far as Votes on Account are concerned, it does not appear that, on a comparison of the years 1872, 1876, and 1877 with 1874, when there was no Rule, the operation of the Resolution interferes with the tendency of the Government to come for Votes on Account. There was another reason urged in 1876 by Mr. Disraeli to induce the House to agree to this further infringement on their privileges. He said—“The effect will be, to a considerable extent, to prevent the necessity of holding Morning Sittings.” Now, has that been so? Has there been any such reduction in the number of Morning Sittings? Under the Resolution in 1876 and 1877, we had an increasing number of Morning Sittings; and, in fact, we have no right to suppose from the experience we have had that the reasons given are sufficient to pass these Resolutions. But, let it not be supposed for a moment that I charge upon the Government that they are not sincere, or that I charge the Chancellor of the Exchequer with putting forward reasons which do not operate to a conviction upon his own mind; but I wish to show that experience indicates these reasons to be delusive. The Government really want more time for legislation. I know, when this Resolution was in operation before, that for the first two or three Mondays Government took Supply, and got the first Votes in the Army and Navy Estimates and some considerable sums for the Civil Service. Then they let the Mondays slip away as far as Estimates were concerned, and for weeks not more than one or two Mondays were taken for Supply. The Votes being left over, what did Government do with these Mondays? They devoted them to legislation. They got rid of the opportunity private Members had of making Motions on the question for going into Committee of Supply, and, instead of getting Supply, they used the time for legislation. Now, I consider we have too much legislation; and if we are to sacrifice our privilege to enable the Government for the time being to bring in Bills, which they continually do, having the effect, when passed, of interfering with everybody and everything, and which do no good, then I say we do not want a plethora of legislation, and I am not prepared to give up an important privilege of Parliament. I venture to say, admitting that you must have a certain amount of legislation, which nobody denies, the amount of time wasted by the Government is far beyond the time they want to gain by taking it from private Members. Wasted, I mean, by their introduction of crude undigested measures leading to loss of time in controversy and Amendment in Committee. I need only refer to the Cattle Plague Bill of last Session, and the crude form in which it was brought in, and the form in which it left the hands of the Committee, transferred, I may say, into another measure, and changed in its most important particulars. I say, also, Government waste time by bringing in measures which seem only to be brought in to be withdrawn—measures debated and read a second time, and, perhaps, they pass into Committee; then, more time is lost until they are thrown over until next Session, at the annual “Massacre of the Innocents.” Then, I object, also, to legislation being brought forward to make changes, to unsettle everything, and which, in fact, does not settle anything, and only leads to a crop of future Bills. In addition to this, Government too often bring in Bills which are not improperly described as Bills without bottom, which destroy a good deal of time—the “Agricultural Holdings Bill,” for instance—and become dead letters. Government go in for legislation of this character, and ask us to give up what is of far greater consequence. There are, as I understand, two functions of the House. The one is to sift the Estimates and vote Supplies, and the other, no doubt, is to attend to the necessary legislation of the country, by passing laws. But I must now quote a very important authority on this subject. Lord Palmerston, in 1861, when, in reference to a Resolution of this description, after referring to the function of passing laws, examining Estimates, and voting Supplies, said—

“This House has another function to discharge, and one highly conducive to the public interests—namely, that of being the mouth-piece of the nation—the organ by which all opinions, all complaints, all notions of grievances, all hopes and expectations, all wishes and suggestions, which may arise among the people at large may be brought to an expression here, may be discussed, examined, answered, rejected, or redressed. That I hold to be as important a function as either of the other two.”—[3 Hansard, clxii. 1491.]

Well, the Chancellor of the Exchequer now asks us to materially abridge that function. We have often heard the ancient Constitutional doctrine that redress of grievance should come before the granting of Supplies, and I am quite aware that some there are who make light of this old doctrine, and say it is but a poor representation of the grievances of old times when we come down here and raise a petty question affecting some small community, or narrow circle of interests, and that the grievances our forefathers brought before the House, by virtue of the right, were matters of far more importance, and of far more essential interest, than our grievances now are. I recollect quite well, in the discussions of 1872, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Lowe), who took the same view the Chancellor of the Exchequer is taking now, indicated what he called the sentimental talk about the redress of grievances. He said—

“Gentlemen talked about its being the main business and duty of the House to check and control the Government, to cross-examine them, and have an opportunity of bringing grievances forward; but they must know as well as he did that they were using the language of a past age, and applying it to a state of things that no longer existed. There was a time, no doubt, when it was the business of the House to curb the encroachments of the Crown. . . . But nobody, he apprehended, surmised that those were now the leading functions of the House of Commons.”—[3 Hansard, ccix. 1093.]

I am sorry to see the empty state of the front Opposition Benches, for I think the matter demands the serious consideration of the House, and especially the Leaders on this side. I regret that the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) is not in his place, and that the right hon. Member for Greenwich is not in town, because I wish to say that if there is any truth—and I believe there is great truth—in the charges made against the Government of pushing the Prerogative to an extreme unknown in these latter days, if there is any truth in the charge that Government have effected changes in policy without consulting the House, committing the House blindfold to measures entailing large expenditure and great responsibility—if these charges are true, then I appeal to them not to give way one jot at a time like this, in relinquishing the privileges of the House of Commons. If there are these encroachments, then the more important it is that the checks the Representatives of the people have should not be thrown aside. I venture to say that, not only the action of the Government, but the tendency in influential quarters and in certain organs of public opinion points in the direction of restraining the functions of Parliament, and extending the power of the Executive Government. Looking back at the past Session of Parliament and the last few months, on several occasions most important changes of policy by the Government were sprung upon us without the slightest notice. I refer to the bringing of the Indian troops to Malta, the Anglo-Turkish Convention, and again to the Afghan War—three measures the most important conceivable, taken by the Executive Government; taken not only without consulting Parliament, but intentionally so; and where is our remedy? It may be we may have another great stroke of policy—and what power have we to check it, if we give up the power of controlling the Executive? For my part, I decline to give up our weapons in the present state of affairs. I remember those on that side of the House speaking strongly in 1872 against giving up control by means of Motions on going into Committee of Supply in the then state of alarm of threatened war and disturbance in Europe. It would never do, it was said, for the House of Commons to give up its control over the Government by relinquishing their privileges. If that was so in 1872-3, how much more so is it the case now? We have a new departure entirely on the part of the Government. They have again and again taken a course the effect of which was, in a great degree, to diminish the control of Parliament over the Administration. They have put forward, as far as possible, the personal rule of the Monarch under the advice of the Minister of the Crown. It may be said I talk Radical doctrines; but I believe they are truly Conservative. I believe it conservation of our interests to keep the privileges we enjoy, and I believe they take a dangerous course, and one likely to unsettle the Constitution of the country who seek to diminish the importance and deny to Parliament the exercise of its privilege—a course far from Conservative, and dangerous to all interests. I oppose this Resolution, because experience of such Resolutions has not confirmed the expectations of the advantages to be gained. I object also, because I think the effect will be that it will prevent the House having legitimate influence on questions of great importance and interest. While I am prepared to meet the Resolution with every opposition in my power, I think it will not be desirable for me to put the Amendment in the terms in which it appears on the Paper. I think it will be rather better not to propose an Amendment and leave the Paper free. I content myself with opposing the Resolution, and shall vote “No” when the division is called.

Mr. Rylands

MR. BENTINCK said, that without endorsing all the opinions expressed by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Rylands), he would support the Amendment which appeared on the Paper in the hon. Gentleman's name. The professed object of the first Resolution was to facilitate the progress of Business in the House. He questioned, in the first place, whether it was always desirable to facilitate the progress of Business. For many years past the legislation in that House had often been clumsy in its construction or mischievous in its results, and in not a few instances it had been open to both charges. They wanted well-considered legislation; therefore, the less they hurried, and the more they dealt with details, the better for the progress of Public Business. Without mincing the matter, the real object of these Resolutions was to deal summarily with factious opposition; but it was extremely difficult to draw a clear distinction between factious and legitimate opposition. They ought, therefore, to be extremely careful in dealing with a proposition that might infringe on the rights and liberties of the House. The only result of any attempt to frame Rules for restraining discussion would be that those Rules would be found to act as a stimulus to opposition, and thereby to defeat their own object. Hon. Members would lay their heads together to see in what manner they could best evade the Rules of the House. Nor was this all. Another and much more important question was involved. The Resolution appeared to be a direct attack on the most cherished rights and privileges of the House, and he, for one, deprecated any interference with the oldest axiom, or corner-stone of the Temple of the liberties of the House—namely, “grievances before Supply,” the claim of which had always been respected. Attempts had frequently been made on former occasions by successive Governments to curtail the privileges of independent Members; but hitherto, with the exception of the abolition of the right of speaking at the presentation of Petitions, they had met with small success. These attempts had been made persistently for many years, and the time was now come to offer them a firm resistance. Whatever Government was in Office, the House of Commons ought to have the fullest power of discussing any question. On general grounds he was opposed to these Resolutions, and especially to the first. The House was bound, not only for the sake of its own credit and character, but also in duty to those whom it represented, to maintain its own privileges as a part of the privileges of the country. He trusted there was still independence enough left in the House to reject this and all other Resolutions which might trench upon the rights of private Members.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON rose to move an Amendment of which he had given Notice—namely, at the end of the proposed Resolution, to add—

“Unless on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, or Civil Service Estimates respectively, an Amendment be moved relating to the division of Estimates proposed to be considered on that day.”

Those were the terms of the Rule of 1872, which had been found to work well, and he thought they would meet the exigencies of the case.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE rose to Order, saying that there were hon. Members who desired to move Amendments which would come earlier.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE suggested that the Resolutions should be considered, like the clauses of a Bill, in Committee.

MR. DILLWYN (for Mr. DODSON) moved, as an Amendment, the omission of the words "or the Committee of Ways and Means."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE seconded the Amendment as one which would be a slight improvement, although it would not make the Resolution acceptable. While there was a weight of authority from the elder Members of the House in favour of some change, there was none in favour of that proposed by this Resolution, which almost in the same terms was rejected in 1854 and 1861. The evidence of the Speaker was that, in order to avoid the inconvenient postponement of Ministerial statements, it would be better that a Minister should make his statement, instead of merely touching his hat, when he moved that the Speaker do leave the Chair; and he pointed out that while the Resolution would introduce certainty, it was open to the objection that Supply might be fixed for every Monday night and taken without the opportunity of opposing it by an Amendment. It should be remembered that the Speaker, in his evidence, suggested that the proposal might be accompanied by some compensatory arrangement giving greater facilities on other nights for bringing forward Motions. But no such compensatory arrangement was now offered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The evidence of the Speaker before that Committee was distinctly against the proposal, as interfering with the old Parliamentary maxim of discussing grievances before granting Supplies, and strongly in favour of Amendments which were relevant being discussed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would exclude all Amendments whatever. In the case of Supplemental Estimates, and even on the £6,000,000 Vote of last year, the discussion of Amendments would, under this Order, have been altogether excluded. It would merely be open to the House to say "Aye" or "No," without giving any reasons. Such was the opinion of the highest authority in the House. The evidence against the Chancellor of the Exche-quer's proposal was overwhelming. The Chairman of Committees had also given evidence wholly opposed to it, and had stated that he would allow Motions affecting the administration of the Departments of the State to be brought forward on the Motion to go into Committee of Supply. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) thought it essential to the privileges of the House that the ancient theory of discussing grievances before granting Supply should be preserved. It was one of the most valuable parts of our Parliamentary Constitution. He contended that a majority of the Members of the Committee were opposed to the Resolution now proposed.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "or the Committee of Ways and Means."—(Mr. Dillicyn.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER admitted that the reasons for proposing that there should be no Amendments on going into Committee of Supply did not apply with equal force to Committees of Ways and Means. He had taken the Resolution in the form in which it was ultimately adopted by the Committee; but he would admit the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was correct in saying that if the matter had been proposed to the Committee on the subject as it was now proposed to the House, the majority of the Committee would have been in favour of omitting Ways and Means. He, therefore, was prepared to accept the Amendment. He observed that the hon. Baronet, in quoting from the evidence which the Speaker was good enough to give to the Committee, had omitted to notice that much of the evidence turned upon the suggestion which the Speaker had been prepared to make to the Committee, which would have given to the Government Thursdays and Fridays, with an absence of Amendment on going into Committee, as well as Mondays.

MR. NEWDEGATE thanked the right hon. Gentleman for his concession. The power of moving the Amendment in Supply might be used so as to lame the Services; but it was clear that a Motion to go into Committee of Ways and Means, which dealt with taxation, could not have equal urgency.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

MR. E. JENKINS suggested that it would be an improvement if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would go further in the direction of Amendment, and secure to hon. Members opportunities for discussion in case of Supplemental Estimates, Votes of Credit, and Votes on Account being brought before the House.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: I must thank my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the way in which he has given in upon this point, and I trust his concession may be the prelude to many other improvements in the Resolution. It may be so changed as to be made acceptable; but it will certainly require very considerable alterations. I must thank the hon. Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) for having saved me the trouble of referring at length to the evidence of Mr. Speaker and of the Chairman of Committees. I was prepared to have brought before the House this most valuable and weighty evidence, from the first and the second authority in the House; but it has been so well and amply done by my hon. Friend as to make repetition unnecessary. I must ask the House to weigh and digest it. No one would wish or expect us to give up our independent opinion; all must own that the highest respect is due to these authorities. I wish to discuss the Resolution from a point of view which has not hitherto been brought before the House. It has hitherto been dealt with on the supposition that it would be successful in its operation. I wish to consider it in the aspect of its being a failure—not, of course, a formal failure, but only an innovation which will not work as its proposers meant it to do. Let us suppose that the Resolution were agreed to on the hard and absolute words of my right hon. Friend, words more absolute than were ever moved before. My right hon. Friend, with great ingenuity and ability, tried to persuade us that his proposal of this evening is our old familiar friend of 1872, only in a rather different attire. But he did not point out how far it differed from that venerable suggestion. In that case it was provided that one Amendment might be moved on each of the three great branches of the Estimates, provided that branch were first brought forward on a Monday, while he put an absolute gag on all Mondays. But my right hon. Friend, in his concern to represent the creation of 1872 in such roseate language, passed over the very animated opposition with which the proposal was met. So much for the Rule of 1872, due to the Government of the right hon. Member for Greenwich. I do not remember whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer said anything about his own arrangement of 1876; but if he did, it was uttered in such dulcet tones as to fail in arresting the attention of the House. The proposal of 1876 was that there might be one Amendment on a cognate subject to the night's Estimates upon every Monday. That was taken as an all round compromise, and, after what I remember as a full discussion, acquiesced in with much unanimity. Now, when I remind the House that that compromise was moved by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I think I have said enough to show that it deserves very great respect. But suppose this Resolution is carried as it is proposed, what will be the result?

“Naturam expellas fureâ, tamen usque recurret.”

Hon. Members who are cut off from bringing forward their grievances in the legitimate manner before going into Supply will still have one and every item of Supply to talk upon. At present, if there is any steam to blow off, there can be one discussion, and then an end of it. But when a body is in a state of fever the unhealthy stuff is repressed; then, by all medical rules, it works internally in a much more virulent manner. The question which presses will probably be traversed by some three or four separate Votes, and as sure as possible you will have three or four separate debates upon it, raised by hon. Members who find themselves aggrieved by being cut off from bringing on their Motions on going into Supply. But even then you will not have stopped all the earths; there is the Report on Supply, and you may depend upon it hon. Members will take their revenge. And then, again, this Rule applies only to Mondays. On all other days this Draconian law does not exist. But what Government which is ever likely to get upon the Treasury Bench will not use this Rule to its own advantage. Of course, every Government makes use of the weapons at its command, and with the more zest if forged by its opponents. It is not the present Government that I fear, but a possible Government which might come, in some far-off Session, from those Benches below the opposite Gangway, when my right hon. Friend would sit disconsolate upon the front Opposition Bench, and I should be mournful below the Gangway. I never would pay such a Government the bad compliment of supposing that they would be such bad managers that if, when they had Monday to themselves and could get their Supply through, they would put it down on Thursday when the Opposition could still do their little something to stop them? Of course, they would not; no people fit to sit on the Treasury Bench could possibly so mismanage their business. And thus their Supply would be carried through on Mondays. I dare say it would be bad Supply, and that it would do a great deal of mischief; perhaps by its savings and its caprices we should lose half our Colonies and Cyprus into the bargain; but we should take our revenge by being nasty, thoroughly nasty, on the Report the day after. We have read to-day in the newspapers about Captain Cook; and I would appeal to my right hon. Friend whether it is worth while risking all these disasters for the barren honour of becoming a Captain Cook of Parliamentary Forms. I do not know, Sir, if I should be in Order, and I tremble before the learned Serjeant on the other side; but if I could only suggest in a hypothetical manner a certain Amendment which I shall be prepared to move later on, I think we might arrive at a satisfactory compromise. In regard to the suggestion of the Minister making his statement with the Speaker in the Chair, you, Sir, have expressed your opinion that the scheme was one which might work well, and the Chairman of Committees, did the same, although it is fair to the House to say that an authority whom we all greatly respect, Sir Thomas May, saw a difficulty in the way. I think, however, his difficulty was rather on a matter of form than of an absolutely practical nature. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, at the beginning of Mr. Speaker's examination, asked whether the Minister might not make his statement before the Speaker left the Chair; in short, whether he might not move the Speaker out of the Chair?—upon which a general debate would follow; then after that stage one Amendment might be considered according to the terms of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Resolution of 1876. Of course, the first debate on Mr. Speaker leaving the Chair would travel over the ground of all the Amendments, and half of them would virtually be swept away by a dexterous Minister, though probably one or two would remain behind to be dealt with on the days when the particular Supply to which they referred came on. I also ventured to urge this before the Committee. It seems to me that the Estimates might be divided into more chapters than at present. At present we have the three great divisions of Army, Navy, and Civil Service Estimates; but the latter comprise, not to name other topics, charges for Public Works, the judicial arrangement of the country, Education and Fine Arts, and the Diplomatic Service, each of which, speaking roughly, has its own mouthpiece in the Government. Would it not be a common-sense arrangement that there should be as many chapters in the Estimates as there are definite Members to move them? The Home Secretary, for instance, could move his batch, the First Commissioner of Works his, and the Vice President of the Council would move the Education and South Kensington Votes and so on; and thus you would get the Estimates divided into seven or eight distinct chapters, which would bring forth the same number of Ministerial statements before you, Sir, left the Chair. We should in that way regulate grievances, and only take those directly referring to the Estimates, or those particular Estimates, while Tuesday and Friday would remain for the many miscellaneous subjects which we are apt to discuss on going into Committee of Supply, and which sometimes puzzle people out-of-doors. I should like to know, Sir, whether I should be in Order in reading an Amendment?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member certainly would not be in Order in moving an Amendment, for at the present time there is an Amendment before the House which has not been disposed of.

Mr. Beresford Hope

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: Then, Sir, I will read a supposed Resolution. I will suppose, Sir, that in some future Parliament, some ideal Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed a Resolution which embodied the principles of the Resolution of 1876, and of the provision that the Minister should make his statements on moving the Speaker out of the Chair. Whoever does this will, I believe, offer the best solution of the difficulty.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) had compared the Chancellor of the Exchequer to Captain Cook, and he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) supposed that the House was to imply that the hon. Gentleman compared himself to the estimable savage who, according to that morning's newspapers, claimed to have destroyed that unfortunate discoverer. The hon. Member's speech tended to destroy all the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Resolutions. Now, nothing was more popular with a large section of the House of Commons than to tell them that an attempt was being made to tamper with its privileges. A number of Gentlemen were always ready to believe such a statement, just as a certain number were always ready to believe paragraphs which appeared in the newspapers and to found upon them serious questions in that House, although they had, in reality, no foundation at all. But let the House take a practical view of the question and ask what was the true reason for these Resolutions. Now, what was the complaint of the country? Was it that grievances were not sufficiently considered, or that hon. Members were debarred from making speeches? Certainly not; the complaint was that the Business of the House was constantly brought to a standstill by the vast number of speeches delivered, and that the House failed as a legislative body, if not as a debating society. That being the case, the Government had taken the right course in making proposals that had been endorsed by a large majority of an impartial Select Committee, and in moving that on one day of the week the House should at once go into Committee of Supply without debate. What they wanted was the certainty that the House would attend to the Estimates, and that the expenditure of the country's money should be fully criticized, which was one of the special duties of the House of Commons. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), though he had touched the real point at issue, had not put it quite fairly before the House. He had enlarged upon the importance of being able to discuss before going into Committee the whole policy of the Government, as it involved more serious sums of money than almost any Estimates, and had put the matter as if it were a question between the discussion of such policy and the discussion of the details of Estimates. If that was really the case, the argument of the hon. Member would be irrefutable; but he put it to everyone whether there had been any question connected with the policy of the Government upon which, if really objected to, even by a small minority, there had not been ample opportunities of raising debate? The hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had quoted the evidence of the Speaker and other eminent personages given before the Select Committee, but had strangely omitted another material part of the evidence of the Speaker of the House, who, on being categorically asked three questions, had replied—first, that he had never known a real grievance which had been prevented from being brought before the House, inasmuch as it was to the interests of Ministers that it should be so brought and openly dealt with, rather than be made the subject of comment in the Press; next, that the chief object of the Minister must be to obtain facilities for the transaction of the business of the country, and that this was of more importance than that every Member should have the opportunity of airing his particular crochet; and, lastly, that in his opinion a small restriction of the rights of individual Members was necessary for the conduct of Public Business. The real question was whether the House wanted to expedite its Business or to retain Rules which had no other considerable merit than antiquity, which he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) should have thought would rather have recommended them to the other, and not to the Liberal, side of the House. They had been well suited to the old times in which they were drawn ; but now, if not absolutely obsolete, were inapplicable to an Assembly in which so many more Members took part in the debates than was formerly the case. The time of the House had been year after year occupied, not by grievances, but by questions which the vast majority would have put on one side, if the forms of procedure had not stood in the way. The cry of privilege had been raised upon mistaken grounds. He regretted that an attempt should be made to represent those who were or had been officials of the House as acting in opposition to the independent Members when they really desired and ought to be rowing in the same boat, and uniting in an honest endeavour to promote the due transaction of the business of the country.

MR. GREGORY trusted there would be no further opposition to the adoption of the Resolution after the statements that had been made on both sides. He had over and over again come down to the House with the view of getting on with Supply ; but instead of that had sat listening to Motions which had very little to do with Supply till nearly 1 o'clock in the morning, when very little attention could be paid to the real questions before them. He believed that to the constituencies this was a serious grievance, and his constituents felt that matters of Supply ought not to be discussed in the desultory manner in which they must be discussed at that time in the morning. He, therefore, approved of the Resolution, and pointed out that it would facilitate the progress of Business without interfering with the Privileges of the House. It appeared to him that hon. Members had ample opportunities of bringing forward their grievances ; they had at all events two days in the week, and they were also to have the opportunity when Committee of Ways and Means stood upon the Paper. He would ask whether the grievances spoken of were very crying ones, and whether they were such as should interpose between the House and its going thoroughly into the discharge of one of its most important functions. He spoke with some feeling, because it was to him and others actively engaged in business a great sacrifice to attend the Sittings of the House. He trusted the House would in every way facilitate Committee of Supply.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, there was not a single instance of a real grievance which hon. Members had not had an opportunity of bringing forward ; but there were some so-called grievances, such as the question of a road across the Park, which were more fit for a local vestry, over which the time of the House had been frequently wasted. He had come down night after night, as stated by the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), and found the House still talking about these matters instead of proceeding with the proper Business of the evening. Session after Session had been wasted in mere empty speeches, and nothing had been done ; and the end of this had been to defeat the very object of the Rules for which hon. Members below the Gangway were contending. The consideration of the Estimates had been deferred till a late period of the Session when the House was weary and many of the Members had gone out of town, and the Government had been able to carry whatever Estimates it pleased. Many important measures also had been withdrawn in consequence of this waste of time. He thought that some compromise might be arrived at which, while it gave effective force to the old and important principle of "grievances before Supply," would yet prevent their spending so much time, not in passing great measures, but in listening to speeches which led to nothing. When the right time came, he intended to move that words be added to the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer which would enable a Question to be put before the Speaker left the Chair.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT remarked, that the great complaint which had been made by both sides of the House was that fair opportunities were not afforded for the discussion of the Estimates ; and he could not see that, under the Resolution which was now being considered, there was any guarantee that Ministers would bring forward their financial proposals in proper or reasonable time, or that they would not throw them over until the end of the Session, thus necessitating large and repeated Votes on Account. Ministers were always more inclined to give to Bills on which they relied for popularity the preference over Supply, which only interested a comparatively small section of the House, and hon. Members around him would remember the difficulties they had had to encounter in this respect when in Opposition. As a via media, and with the view of inducing Ministers to bring on Supply at a period when it could be freely and advantageously discussed, he would suggest to his right hon. Friend that the Resolution should be made to extend only to the 1st of June in each year. Should the Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, not see his way to do that, the Rule which had worked so well in 1872-3 might be again adopted.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, while it was impossible to overrate the importance of the Question before the House, it was equally important that it should have some Question before it; but at the present moment the Main Question was overlaid by three several Amendments; and as he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer was ready to accept that one proposed by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) for the omission of the words "or Ways and Means," he would therefore suggest that it should be disposed of before any new suggestions were considered.

MR. DODSON took a similar view.

MR. GORST said, he was utterly bewildered at the course which the proceedings had taken, and at the various Amendments and suggestions—some of the former not yet reduced to writing—which had been thrown out.

Question put, and negatived.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in moving, as an Amendment, to insert after the word "Supply," the words "appointed for the consideration of the ordinary Army, Navy, and Civil Service Estimates," said, that before doing so, he might be allowed to say a few words upon the Resolution itself. It had appeared to him for some time that the real difficulty which the House had to meet was one which would never be met, or very imperfectly met, by any Resolution such as that which hon. Members were now debating. The difficulty was that the House had a great deal more Business to deal with—some of it of a very important and some of it of an extremely unimportant character—than it was able thoroughly to discuss; and, under these circumstances, it was left almost entirely to chance, or to the pertinacity of certain hon. Members, what Business should be considered and what neglected. That was the case both with regard to projects of legislation and with regard to various other subjects which were brought before the House; and he did not believe that any effectual remedy could ever be applied to this state of things until the House was prepared to classify its Business in a far more scientific way than it did at present. Some day or other the House might see that it was necessary to attempt such a classification, and to commit to some authority—he did not say what that authority might be, whether certain officers of the House, or a Committee of its Members—the duty of examining into its Business and of proposing for consideration, and, if thought fit, adoption, some scheme for the proper conduct and management of its work. He was quite aware that at the present time the House was not disposed to proceed with any such considerable change in its procedure as that which he had just indicated; but he was strongly of opinion that, until it took up the question in that sense, it would never be able to cope with the real evil with which it had to contend. With regard to the Resolution before them, there was no doubt that the practice of moving Amendments on the Question that the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the purpose of going into Supply, had increased to a very inconvenient extent. It was quite of modern growth, as appeared from the evidence taken before a recent Committee. For many years in the early part of this century it was unknown; but about 1811 it was permitted on very urgent occasions. In recent years, however, the practice had extended to very insignificant questions, and had developed into considerable abuse, for which the House suffered. On the other hand, it was of extreme importance that opportunities should be given of raising at short notice discussions on really important matters, whether foreign, colonial, or domestic. In his evidence before the Committee last year, the Speaker admitted that such facilities for the discussion of urgent matters would be considerably curtailed by the Resolution before them as it now stood. The Speaker's evidence also showed that, in his opinion, the operation of the Rule of 1872 was intended to be confined, and had been confined by him in practice, to those cases in which the House was going into Committee of Supply on the ordinary Army, Navy, or Civil Service Estimates. The Resolution of 1872 would not, in the Speaker's opinion, have applied to Votes of the nature of the Credit of £6,000,000 proposed last year, or to any Estimates of an extraordinary character. He had no doubt that the Speaker exercised a very wise discretion in interpreting the Resolution of 1872; but its terms admitted of that interpretation, whereas the Resolution as now moved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not. Under its plain and precise terms, he (the Marquess of Hartington) presumed that the House would be obliged to go into Supply without any Question being put, on any Estimate whatever, including the Vote of Credit of last year. He did not think the House would on consideration be willing to give the Resolution so great a latitude; and therefore he would propose, as an Amendment, to insert after the words "Committee of Supply" the words "for the consideration of the ordinary Army, Navy, or Civil Service Estimates." That would give the Government the certainty they desired in regard to the ordinary Estimates, while it would exclude extraordinary Estimates from the Rule. He hoped that Amendment would be favourably considered by the Government. He had a further suggestion to make, although it might not be regular for him to put it in the form of an Amendment. Supply was not confined to discussions in Committee. It involved two stages—first, the consideration of the Estimates in Committee, and next, the adoption by the House of the Resolution which had been agreed to in Committee. It was in Committee that the details of the Estimates were discussed, and that the evil of uncertainty was felt; and it appeared to him that the principle of considering grievances before Supply might be conveniently maintained by taking Amendments on the Report of Supply, instead of on going into Committee. It was seldom that the question of the details of an Estimate was reserved for the Report. It was perfectly competent now for a Member to move Amendments on the consideration of the Resolutions agreed to in Supply. There was no Rule of the House to that effect; but it had been frequently ruled by the Chair that an Amendment moved on the Report of Supply must appertain to the subject of the Resolution passed in Committee. He thought that some relaxation of that ruling might be provided for. It was of the utmost importance that facilities should be given for the discussion of urgent foreign, colonial, and other questions which might from time to time arise; and he did not see how, under the Resolution as it stood, such facilities would be afforded. He did not think it would be practicable to shut out the discussion of questions at short notice which it was desirable to discuss; and if they adopted too stringent a rule of that kind, he had no doubt the Government would lose a considerable part of the advantage which they hoped to gain by the Resolution, and probably more recourse would be had to what the House felt to be the most inconvenient practice of moving the adjournment for the purpose of raising a discussion. It was to be regretted that such discursive discussions should be raised on the Motion that the Speaker do now leave the Chair. As things now stood, it was often perfectly useless for the Government to put down Supply for a Monday night, because they knew they would not get it, owing to the whole evening being occupied by other questions of greater or less importance. He thought it might be possible to give the Speaker some authority by which urgent questions might be raised on that occasion, and that would afford the House all the practical security it required that matters of urgent necessity should be fully discussed. He did not share the apprehension of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) that the Government would not bring forward Supply early enough. As far as his experience went, one of the main objects of all Governments was to bring forward Supply as early as possible; because as soon as they had made considerable progress in Supply, they had the Session under their control. If the House granted them the opportunity of going into Supply, he had not the smallest doubt that of whatever Party the Government might be composed, they would not lose time in pushing forward the Estimates and making progress with Public Business. If the Government would accept his Amendment and consider his suggestion, he thought the House might then safely agree to the Resolution. The noble Lord concluded by moving the Amendment.

The Marquess of Hartington

Amendment proposed,

After the word "Supply," to insert the words "appointed for the consideration of the ordinary Army, Navy, and Civil Service Estimates."
—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no objection to the proposal of the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington); on the contrary, he thought it a decided improvement on the recommendations of the Committee embodied in the Resolution. He agreed with the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) that it was of the highest importance they should consider questions of policy which might involve large expenditure, and should not allow themselves to be diverted from these by discussions of mere matters of detail. At the same time, the hon. Member would admit there were some of these small matters of detail which deserved consideration, and which ought to be considered in a business-like manner. It was not surprising that only a few Members attended to discuss them; but their doing so was, at all events, indirectly useful, for it caused the Government to be doubly and trebly careful how they drew up the Estimates, knowing that they would be criticized and severely examined. What had been found to be inconvenient and difficult to overcome was the multiplication of Notices of Motion on going into Committee of Supply; which not only made it uncertain whether they should get into Committee of Supply at all, but also what Notices would be proceeded with. The number of Notices might vary from, say, 5 to 20; they would embrace all kinds of subjects; they might come down to find it on one day a question of foreign policy, on another the state of Rotten Row, on another a question of fine arts, and on another a personal grievance; and there was no certainty as to which would come on and which would not. The noble Lord said occasions might arise suddenly when there might be reason to challenge the policy of the Government without having to give Notice and wait three or four weeks to bring on the subject. But that applied to the Committee of Supply at present, when the books were choked with a number of Amendments to the Motion to go into Committee. If the matter was of sufficient importance, no doubt private Members having Notices gave way, and they would be as likely to do so in future on a Tuesday or Friday which they had obtained. Therefore, the House would do well to clear the Paper of Notices of Motion on going into Committee of Supply on a particular day. But when any exceptional proposal was made—such, for instance, as the credit of £6,000,000—it would be wrong of the House to part with its privilege of calling in question the conduct and policy of the Government. The Government, as well as the House at large, would feel that it would be improper that there should be any difficulty in the way of raising a discussion upon general policy at such a time. The proposal of the noble Lord met that case, and he did not see the slightest objection to it. Even in such a case he did not quite see how the Amendment would meet any disinclination to yield on the part of hon. Members having precedence with Notices on other subjects; but in practice, perhaps, the difficulty would not arise. As to the other suggestion of the noble Lord, he saw no reason for departing from the Rule that an Amendment to the Report of Supply must relate to a Vote included in the Report. If, however, it was to be adopted at all, it must be the subject of a separate Resolution, as it would involve a change in the Rules of Procedure bearing on the Report of Supply.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR suggested that time would be saved if Ministers, instead of introducing Estimates in long speeches full of details, would have the technical and professional information printed and distributed beforehand. Nearly nine-tenths of the speeches of the First Lord of the Admiralty and Secretary of State for War related to details, and a small portion only to important points relating to policy or to matters which might with some propriety be announced to the House in a set speech. On his own knowledge, he could state that every branch of the War Office was called on to supply the Minister with full information relating to the details of the past as well as the current Estimates. A compilation of the Departmental statements made during the past few years would be most valuable to Members in aid of their deliberations as well as beneficial to the Public Service. Indeed, he believed that a compilation of information was already made for the special use of the Secretary of State. Then, again, the Business of the House in discussing the several Votes of Supply would be greatly aided by having uniformity in drawing out the Estimates strictly adhered to, so that the transactions of one year might be contrasted with those of former years. So far from that being the case, not a year passed without some changes being made in the arrangement of the Estimates, so that the connecting links between the demands of the current year with those of former years were entirely destroyed. The orders of the Treasury to aid hon. Members by an adherence to this uniformity were entirely disregarded. Then they found the information at present supplied excessively meagre, indeed obscure, so that Members were constrained to put questions and to obtain explanations, instead of at once voting the sums which the House should grant, if they were made in a clear and intelligible form. The fact could not be too frequently urged that a large portion of the money annually required in all branches of the Civil, Naval, and Army Estimates was year by year alike, and the exceptional demands so few, that they alone needed consideration. If these ordinary and uniform demands were so clearly shown as to lay open the new requirements, then the discussions could be restricted to the latter. He could not avoid stating that the short experience he had had in that House fully confirmed the words which his relative, the late Mr. Hume, used often in that House, as well as to him (General Sir George Balfour), that the House of Commons was a generous body, readily yielding to the requests of Ministers, when their requests were put forward in a clear and honest form. The greatest obstruction that could be offered was in having obscurity, and consequently mystery, for where there was mystery the House always assumed there was something to conceal. The other and serious defects were to be found in the wrong practice of permitting monies voted for one purpose to be used for other and often very different purposes; in also not requiring the Appropriation Accounts to set forth the expenditure to the exact form in which it was shown in the Estimates. In his (General Sir George Balfour's) opinion, these were the hindrances to Business. Then, again, the Civil Estimates, now amounting to more than the amounts formerly voted for the Army and Navy, were the cause of much delay in the transaction of Business, merely because of the obscurity in which large amounts were put forward. An attempt was made by the First Lord of the Admiralty, when Secretary to the Treasury, to explain the details of the Estimates; but though this was a praiseworthy attempt, yet it failed, because it was impossible for one officer to make a speech on £23,000,000 of Expenditure of every form and kind of outlay, relating to the civil administration of the whole Kingdom at home and abroad. Here, again, the printing of information prior to the Estimates being brought on would be most useful. It would supply that want, which Members so often delayed the Business by asking for in the course of the Sittings. Even then, it often happened that the replies were very vague, sometimes not even noticed, and at other times incorrect. The obvious course was to throw on the responsible officers of the several branches of the Civil Service the duty of furnishing the details relating to their respective Estimates, and also require a few of the political heads in the House, such as the Chief Commissioner of Works, Board of Trade, Local Government Board, and others, to speak on the policy or principle of those Estimates. In that way, the Secretary to the Treasury, already overburdened with his proper duties, would be released from the charge of nearly all the Civil Estimates, and able to aid the House with that important kind of information which the great controlling body—the Treasury—ought to be able to furnish on those few but great questions connected with their vast Expenditure in the Civil, Military, and Naval Departments.

MR. RAIKES said, it would be well not to expect too much from the opera-

General Sir George Balfour

tion of the proposed new Rule, for the evil at which it was aimed was rather too deep-seated in the present constitution of Parliament to be completely dealt with in that way. He was glad that the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington) had pointed out to the House, while dealing with this Motion, the great propriety of classifying the Amendments upon Supply before they were brought forward. If they were classified, and more especially if abstract Resolutions were excluded, undoubtedly they would consume much less time than at present. He considered the Amendment of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) was worthy of much consideration, taken in conjunction with the present proposal. It was, however, much more important to ascertain, in the first place, whether more latitude should not be given to the discussion on the Report of Supply, in lieu of the existing practice of raising questions before the Speaker was allowed to leave the Chair, as the noble Lord had suggested. But if that course were adopted, the House might justly insist on a day being named on which precedence would be given to Report of Supply over all other Orders of the Day. Moreover, it was to be considered whether questions might not be raised on such an occasion which would be shut out by the new Rule relating to Monday, that the Speaker leave the Chair. Upon one point he supposed they were nearly agreed—namely, that there should be some method adopted to reduce the uncertainty now prevailing as to the discussions about going into Committee of Supply. Inasmuch as the Amendment proposed to limit the Rule to ordinary Estimates, and to exclude all supplementary ones, the House would have an opportunity, if they thought proper to do so, to enter into discussion on questions relating to the latter. In that case, although a certain classification might be arrived at, still the great mass of Amendments, if the Speaker left the Chair, would remain, untouched, to encumber the Notice Paper with matter unimportant compared with that of Supply. He felt bound to say that the discussion on these matters would appear to persons out-of-doors altogether technical, and that those questions were so complicated that it would be difficult to render them intelligible to the ordinary public. He was glad that he had not remained in his seat during that debate without endeavouring, so far as he was able, to give his support to the suggestion thrown out by the noble Marquess, as though he did not think that the Motion itself would have any marked effect on the solution of the question, the policy of which it was a precursor might bear fruit hereafter, when the House would find itself forced to discuss it thoroughly. He thought, further, that such questions could not be examined into too much, or ventilated too thoroughly, so as to bring about, if possible, a change of practice suited not only to a particular emergency, but resulting in such a classification of subjects as might give some real system to the conduct of Public Business. For this reason, he considered that the suggestions which had fallen from the noble Lord opposite were more likely to render permanent service to the Business of the House than those that now appeared on the Notice Paper.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he did not think the proposals of the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) could be separated, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer desired. They formed parts of one plan. Two rival schemes were before the House to make certain the discussion of Supply when it was set down. The Government scheme would, if carried alone, have the effect of shutting out Members from an ancient privilege which they valued very highly—the privilege of stating grievances before money was voted. They ought, therefore, to have the opportunity of doing so on the Report, and the noble Lord's scheme gave greater certainty for getting into Supply and discussing the Estimates on the days they were set down; but it would also give advantage to hon. Members to state any grievance to the House before the money was voted. That was a privilege he was sure that the House would not willingly surrender. Those who had been long in the House often had occasion to feel surprise at the very loose way in which money had been voted. Some years ago every item of Supply was questioned; but now supplies of money were obtained so easily that he could not help thinking that part of the growth of the expenditure arose from the very great chance there was of any item whatever passing without remark.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he could not agree with the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), that the two proposals of the noble Marquess were inseparable. When the hon. Member for Bedford stated that the House would not part with its ancient right of stating grievances on Supply, he forgot that the practice was not of such very ancient date, and that within the last few years, on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), this very practice had been given up by the House. In 1872 and 1873 the House agreed to give it up, and neither the House nor the Government of the day had any cause to regret it. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had said that he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) ought to be the last person to speak in favour of the Resolution, because he moved an Amendment on previous occasions when a similar Resolution was proposed. It was true that he had moved an Amendment on that occasion; but then he had done so solely upon the ground that the question ought to be re-considered, owing to the way in which previous Committees had been conducted. He was, however, very much surprised to find the hon. Member for Bedford opposing now that which he on a former occasion supported; and he was still more astonished at the course taken by the hon. Member for Burnley, because that hon. Member had complained of the inconvenience to which he was frequently put on Friday nights, when a great number of small Questions were set down on the Notice Paper on the Motion for going into Supply, and had protested against Members being, as he called it, driven into a corner and compelled to vote large sums of money at a late hour in a scrambling and unsatisfactory manner. Those views were, he could not help thinking, better worthy of consideration than the diametrically opposite opinions which the hon. Gentleman at present appeared to hold. He would merely add the expression of a hope that, seeing the enormous amount of Business the House had to get through in the course of a Session, the Resolution as amended would be accepted, not only in the interest of the Government, but of hon. Members generally.

Mr. Whitbread

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY observed, that having had the advantage of a Report of a Committee which had investigated the subject, the Government had come down that Session prepared with certain proposals for the remedying of certain abuses. He should have something to say presently about the nature of these proposals, and how inapplicable they were to remedy the abuses that were complained of. But taking them as they were, they had an Amendment of great importance from the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). They had also an Amendment from the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington), which had been accepted, and a suggestion from the same noble Lord as to which there were considerable differences of opinion. The hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means was of opinion that the proposal should be considered at the present juncture, and he added that he did not quite understand the full bearing of the Amendment of the noble Lord. Now, how should he? It was not on the Paper, and therefore the House had no opportunity of considering it. The first thing which they had to complain of was that the Government had given them no opportunity of putting down Amendments on the Paper. The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) considered that the suggestion of the noble Lord was worthy of acceptance, and the Chairman of Ways and Means thought it ought to be considered at the present juncture. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said he would not accept it. What ought the great body of the House to do under these circumstances? Had they not, when they were now asked to abandon a great privilege, a right to demand a fair opportunity of considering, not merely the half-abandoned proposals of the Government, but the proposals to be substituted for them. All that had happened in the course of the evening pointed to the necessity of some further opportunity to consider the subject. There was one thing that must strike the House very strongly. The practical emergency referred to by the Chairman of Ways and Means was the alleged misconduct of three or four hon. Members. Surely, the hon. Gentleman would not say that what the House was now asked to do, whether in the form of amendment or otherwise, was in any way directed against this practical emergency? Perhaps the only important one of these Resolutions was directed against the Privileges of the House, which these hon. Members never attempted to impugn. If there were abuses in this matter, they were such as the Speaker and the Chairman of Ways and Means did not consider strong or violent enough to warrant the proposed changes. They had heard of men cutting their noses off to spite their faces. Here was a case of the Government cutting their head off to spite their noses. He thought it was too much to ask Irish Members to give up a right which they had never abused, and which they valued as enabling them to demand the redress of abuses before going into Committee of Supply.

MR. DILLWYN considered the Amendment of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) an improvement on the Resolution as it stood on the Paper; but desired to have some information as to how far the change would extend, not only to Supplementary Estimates, but to Votes on Account.

MR. GOURLEY said, he objected both to the Resolution and the Amendment of the noble Marquess, being unable to see how the rights of private Members would be secure under either.

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply to the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), said, that "Votes on Account," being Votes on Account of Estimates already before the House, the Rule precluding discussion before entering upon their consideration in Committee would apply to them on Mondayittings. Supplementary Estimates, which came under a different category, would be open to discussion before the House resolved itself into Committee. In reply to the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley), he would add that the proposals before the House were intended only to enable the House to discuss the Estimates. If Ministers wished to pass the Estimates without discussion, they would accept the present condition of affairs, and leave the Estimates day by day to the end of the Session, when it was notorious they would be passed. It was really with the hope and desire of getting a full and free discussion of the Estimates at the proper time that these proposals were now made to the House.

MR. E. JENKINS said, the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty was very unsatisfactory. He (Mr. Jenkins) certainly understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer at an earlier period of the evening to assent, if not by word of mouth at least by gesture, to the proposal that Votes on Account should be excepted from the operation of the proposed Rule. If the House accepted the Amendment of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), he would move the insertion of words to give effect to that understanding.

MR. PARNELL said, that perhaps he might be permitted to say a few words as a Member of the late Committee. He did not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer had treated the House as handsomely as he had promised; for certainly when the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Jenkins) drew his attention to Votes on Account, his (Mr. Parnell's) impression was that the right hon. Gentleman virtually agreed to their exclusion from the Resolution. He would next ask the House if they were going to gain by the proposed Resolution the object which they wished? They had heard a good deal of the desirability of bringing forward the Estimates early in the Session, and the Members of the Government had professed the greatest possible anxiety to assist in this exceedingly good end; but he himself was much inclined to doubt that their good intentions would last as long as would be supposed. They should recollect that this Rule was an entire innovation on the practice of Parliament. In 1872 a Resolution was agreed to which introduced for the first time the principle of progress, which was explained as being the same procedure with regard to the Supply as with regard to the stages of the Bill; but the principle of 1872 was entirely different from the present proposal. In the last few Sessions hon. Members were allowed to put as many Amendments as they wished on the Paper against going into Supply. The consequence was that there was not any very great obstruction to Progress, and it would astonish hon. Members if they knew how few hours were taken up with Motions against Supply in 1877; for, owing to the number of Notices down that were not germane to the subject, hon. Members would not remain in the House to support their Motions. He (Mr. Parnell) had watched the course of events last year more closely than had the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he could say that in no Session of Parliament in recent years had Notices of Motion proved of less inconvenience or obstruction to Supply early in the evening. He thought the privilege sought to be removed was of much more value to English than to Irish Members. For himself, he had never used it in the past, and did not intend to use it in the future; but he considered the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not acting rightly or fairly in bringing forward such an important Motion after the small Notice he had given the House. If they had considered this question in Committee instead of in the Whole House, they would have been much more likely to dispose of it quickly. His firm belief was that the Public Business would not be materially facilitated by the adoption of one or of all these Resolutions, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer must not complain if, during the present Session, he found his new Rules entirely useless.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. E. JENKINS moved, as an Amendment, the insertion of the words "excepting Votes on Account." It was very clear what would take place if they were to permit the Government immediately to enter Votes on Account without any previous explanation of grievances by Members in a Constitutional manner. He thought, as they were really proposing to vote away a very important Constitutional check, they ought to endeavour, as far as possible, to minimize what they were about to do.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA seconded the Amendment. He scarcely considered it to be necessary to raise the question, as he considered that Votes on Account should never be treated as ordinary Estimates; but he now feared that if the present proposal were not adopted, the Government would get rid of the objection, and treat them as ordinary Estimates. He thought it was one of the most important privileges they possessed, that money should not be voted without previous consideration of grievances; and, with regard to these Votes on Account, how could a Vote on Account be dealt with as an ordinary Estimate, or as anything but an extraordinary event?

Mr. Parnell

Amendment proposed, to insert, at the end of the last Amendment, the words "excepting Votes on Account."
—(Mr. Edward Jenkins.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER regretted that any hon. Member should have imagined that he had given his assent to the innovation here proposed. He had never intended doing so. What he had assented to was the exclusion of special or peculiar Votes like that of the £6,000,000, involving questions on which the House might wish to challenge the Government. Votes on Account were of a very different character, and the position of the question as regarded them was this. They did not involve any new principle; nobody was satisfied with them, and no Government ever proposed them if they could go on without them. Hon. Gentlemen should recollect that by modern Rules the Estimates were usually voted to a certain date—say, for instance, the 31st of March—but how was the service of the country to be carried beyond that date, if the Estimates for the year were not voted, and when Votes on Account were proposed they were met by Motions on extraneous subjects. If the Resolutions proposed by the Government were carried, Votes on Account would, he trusted, disappear; but they could not be done without altogether. They were wholly different to Supplementary or Special Votes, which seemed to imply something for which Parliament was not prepared. Votes on Account were for the ordinary Services, and involved nothing new. He must therefore oppose the Motion.

MR. DILLWYN thought they ought to limit the facility of granting Votes on Account in every way in their power; and in considering this question they should remember that year by year there seemed to be an increasing desire to take Votes on Account without any real criticism. He denied that there was not ample time to fully discuss these questions, except in the case of a year where the time up to the middle of the Session had been wasted in the discussion of Bills which had never been intended to pass.

MR. WHITWELL said, he thought it his duty to support the Motion of his

hon. Friend the Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins). He did not see for a moment the reason for the proposed change, and the Resolution of the Government seemed to deal with Parliament as if its discussions were of no importance. The other day they had charged Indian finances with a heavy charge on account. That was a question which, if it had been brought forward without discussion, would have been a serious invasion of the rights of Parliament. He should therefore vote with the hon. Member for Dundee on this question, as Votes on Account, he believed, were used most mischievously.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN really thought the Amendment an extremely important one, and that the Government would see how critical a point was raised in the discussion. The position of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was totally inconsistent with what the right hon. Gentleman said in his opening, for he then said that they would have in their turn a reasonable compensation in the fact that they would have every opportunity for discussing the details of the Estimates; but they had no such opportunity for discussing a Vote on Account. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out that it might be possible to raise all sorts of discussions on extraneous questions; but if he really thought the opportunity would be made use of, the better way would be to lay down that the discussion should be only on matters germane to the class for which a Vote on Account was asked. Instead of this, they were asked to sacrifice all their privileges; for it was pretty clear that Government could bring on Votes on Account so as to practically provide themselves with any amount of Supply sufficient to last them to the end of the Session.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he did not look at this question from a point of high importance; but he looked at it from the position of an independent private Member, who might have some grievance or opinion to bring forward. He, for instance, might have a proposition to make on the bringing forward of the Estimates. The first two nights were generally taken up with a grand debate. Then the Minister for War made his Statement, and most Ministers for War occupied some five hours. The debate would be continued by the Leaders of the House, and, in the meantime, a Vote on Account would be taken. The adjourned discussion would not be taken probably till after July, when an opportunity might, perhaps, offer for his Motion, at a time when it would be practically of no avail. It seemed to him that the older the House grew the greater difficulty there was in keeping it. He thought hon. Members would have still greater difficulty in retaining a House under the new proposition than they had ever had before, for, under the old Rule, Government had some interest in getting a House on Friday; but with this taking of Votes on Account, they would get their money on Monday, and would, therefore, have no interest to keep a House on Friday. They would get the votes of the Members who did not want to do work. The House of Commons would be a very much easier place under the new Rules; but the interests of constituents would be neglected, because hon. Members would no longer be able to compel attention to local grievances. The Government would get their money more easily, but money questions would not be so easily ventilated. If this new Rule were to be made at all, it ought to be made in a fresh Parliament, which would be very keen about work, and not in a Parliament like the present, jaded and wearied out after a prolonged existence.

MR. H. SAMUELSON said, it seemed to him that no objection to the introduction of this Resolution would stamp these Votes on Account as ordinary Estimates, which would be strong affirmation in the future that they were of that character. It appeared to him that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dundee went to the root of the matter. He thought that the matter should therefore be pressed; but as the Government had not evidently entirely considered the full weight of the Resolution, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

MR. PARNELL seconded the Motion. He really did think there was a want of sincerity on the part of the Government in making this proposition. Either they had the Estimates brought forward in the regular way, and facility given in discussing the items of Supply, or they had not. If they had not, then he could understand the opposition of the Government to this Amendment; but if they were to have the Estimates brought forward in the ordinary way, he could understand it. He believed that if the Irish Estimates were fully discussed the subject of many annual Motions would be abolished, and many of them would be dealt with by the Government. The conduct of the Government, however, was directed to prevent them from having this Constitutional privilege; and the only remedy for Members who desired to discuss particular items in the Estimates would be to insist upon having a discussion of those items when the Government brought forward their Votes on Account. If the Government did really desire discussion, he ventured to think that instead of facilitating the progress of Business, or of getting Supplies, it would be entirely different. He hoped the Government would show their sincerity in this matter; and he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept the Amendment as an illustration of their bona fides.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Henry Samuelson.)

MR. GORST asked if the Government had weighed the words proposed, and he suggested that an adjournment would give the Government the opportunity of considering the precise legal meaning of the words of the Amendment; for it seemed to him very doubtful if the words suggested would include the Votes intended by the hon. Member for Dundee. The questions for the Government was the real import of the words suggested, and whether those words should be adopted by them, or that words of their own should be substituted.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON hoped they might bring the question to a conclusion that night. The question raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) did not seem to him to be a very large one. It hardly appeared to him that there could be much doubt as to the policy of the Government as referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). A Vote on Account was merely a Vote on a portion of the Estimates; and therefore, as it appeared to him, was excluded from the objection raised by the hon. Member. He entirely understood the Amendment in the sense it was understood by the Government.

MR. E. JENKINS said, the difficulty under which he laboured was that no answer had been made to the arguments brought forward from that side. The Chancellor of the Exchequer certainly said there was no objection to accept his (Mr. E. Jenkins's) Amendment; but he had failed to answer those really strong arguments against giving the Government almost unlimited power for asking for Votes of Supply without giving the House a compensating right of opposition. He could conceive that the day might come when it would be of infinite importance, on a Vote on Account being taken, for the Opposition to be able to put down some Resolution. He agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) that the Government were taking from the House a great advantage. Seeing, also, how seldom they would be called upon to limit this Resolution by his proposition, he thought the Government might very well give way upon it.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in consequence of remarks which had been made in the course of the debate, he should like to hear the construction which the Speaker put upon the words which had been inserted on the Motion of the noble Lord. He should like to know whether the Speaker considered they did or did not apply to Votes on Account for the ordinary Services?

MR. SPEAKER: I should say that the words inserted on the Motion of the noble Lord would cover Votes on Account applying to the Army, Navy, and Civil Services.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that was his opinion, and he further thought that they were in a position to come to a decision on this subject, and that it would be a waste of time to adjourn now, after having carried the discussion so far. The hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) said he had had no answer or reason given why Votes on Account should be included amongst the ordinary Services which we proposed should be taken on Monday without previous Notice. The object of this Resolution was to enable the House and the Government to proceed as rapidly as was consistent with the business of Supply. The object of the Government in making the proposition was that one day in the week they might be allowed to go into the Estimates without being obliged to take up the whole or the best part of the night in discussing matters entirely of a foreign nature. But with regard to Votes on Account, that argument did not apply, as it was admitted, under the present system, Votes on Account must necessarily be given after due Notice. He believed that they ought to be asked for seldom; but they were always liable to a Vote being necessary. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had spoken strongly against them; but the hon. Member, in visiting Dublin, perhaps, would not wish to find the soldiers there starving for want of their pay, in consequence of delay in voting Supply in that House. It might be said that Votes on Account would be asked for for objectionable purposes; but he would remind hon. Members that they always had the power to reduce it, and to raise those questions in Committee in a form which would render it more than ever difficult to pass.

Mr. Parnell

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 69; Noes 143: Majority 74.—(Div. List, No. 10.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: I rise now to move an Amendment the drift of which is, I may say, to carry out, as far as may be, in the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the proposal he made in 1876, and which was then accepted as a satisfactory compromise—namely, that one division, and that relative to the Estimates of the day, shall be brought forward. On the Monday question, too, I pressed in the Committee the suggestion to which several hon. Members, as well as Mr. Speaker and the Chairman of Committees, were favourable, though it was not embodied in any Resolution—namely, that each Minister should make his statement in the House in moving the Speaker out of the Chair. This suggestion, also, I embody in my Amendment, and thereby I import a slight change into the method of procedure as proposed by the Resolution of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. By the latter, Mr. Speaker leaves the Chair without being moved out of it. By my Amendment it is necessary that he should be so. That will make no real difference as to facilitating Business, except so far as debate is interposed. But this debate will be limited and governed by the conditions which we shall prescribe. With this explanation, I move to add at the end of the second line, after the word "Monday," "and a Motion be made that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair." If I am successful, I shall move to add at the end of the second Resolution—

"Unless an Amendment be moved on the division for the Estimates to be moved on that day; and the Member of Her Majesty's Government who proposes to move such Estimate may make his statement in moving 'That the Speaker do leave the Chair.'"

At this late hour of the night I will not detain the House further, but will simply move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

After the word "Monday," to insert the words "and the Motion being made, That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. JACOB BRIGHT moved the adjournment of the debate. He said it was apparent that a number of hon. Members on that side of the House were anxious to put Amendments on the Paper.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY, in seconding the Motion, said, that they had got through six words after an eight hours' discussion. He considered the Government were too anxious to get on with their Business, regardless of the duties of private Members.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Jacob Bright.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER appealed to hon. Members to proceed. The House had been engaged the whole evening in discussing one proposition not of a very complex character. They were now pretty well familiar with the arguments urged on the one side and the other, and he felt that they were perfectly competent to deal with the question in a very short time. It was to be hoped that the hon. Gentleman would allow this Resolution to be passed.

MR. RYLANDS hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Motion for adjournment. In addition to the Amendment proposed, he did know that other hon. Members had intended to propose certain Amendments upon this Resolution, and he was quite sure the right hon. Gentleman would see that it was utterly impossible to go on advancing that question at that time of night. He must say that if they were asked to change the procedure of the House, it was at least reasonable that the House should proceed with very great deliberation, and that it should not be considered unreasonable that they should ask for more than one night for the consideration of the question.

MR. NEWDEGATE hoped the House would go on with the discussion.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was not generally in favour of adjournments; but on this particular occasion, as regarded the Amendment then before the House, he could candidly say that he had no idea of what the Resolution was to be. If the hon. Member who proposed it had the opportunity to put it upon the Paper, they would know what it referred to; but really, as it then stood, the whole House was in the dark as to what its purport was. The Government were not acting as business men in asking them to sit there longer on that occasion, and he might say that he had had considerable experience of the right hon. Gentleman's endeavours to save time, the result being that he generally spent it. He did not believe that hon. Gentlemen would allow themselves to be forced into accepting the Resolution.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he was inclined to agree with the Motion for the adjournment of the debate. He thought it would not be impossible to agree to the Resolution that night; but he could not help recognizing that there were a considerable number of hon. Gentlemen who would not, at that time of the night, apply themselves to the task; and he was therefore afraid it would be quite hopeless for them to expect to get through the Resolution that night. He therefore put it to his right hon. Friend whether the further discussion of the Resolution had not better be adjourned?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he agreed with the suggestion of his noble Friend that there would be that sort of opposition, which he did not wish in any way to oppose. He would therefore consent to the adjournment of the debate.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

HABITUAL DRUNKARDS BILL.

(Dr. Cameron, Mr. Clare Read, Mr. Ashley, Sir Henry Jackson, Mr. Edward Jenkins, Mr. William Holms, Mr. O'Shaughnessy.)

[BILL 47.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time"—(Dr. Cameron.)

MR. DILLWYN moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. He thought that where persons were deprived of their liberty they should be in the custody of State officials. In this case his hon. Friend had said there was no analogy between the institutions suggested by the Bill and lunatic asylums, and that in the one case it was a compulsory act, and in the other a voluntary one. But they all knew that the habitual drunkard got into a decrepid state of mind and body, and that while he might go into such an institution readily enough he was practically very glad to get out again. In both cases the persons having custody of them had a direct pecuniary interest in retaining them in those places during the whole of the time specified. The object of such people only ought to be to discharge their patients as soon as possible; whereas in this case it would be exactly the opposite. He would not trespass on the House further, but would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR, in seconding the Motion, said, he did not for one moment wish by so doing to suggest that the intention of the promoters was not of the most charitable design. Though the persons intended to be benefited formed a very sad spectacle, it was at the same time quite impossible for him to give his support to the Bill, as he looked upon it as one of the waves of the last great wave of paternal government, or rather grand-maternal government. He was of opinion that they could not enforce morality upon any class of the community, nor could they interfere with what they eat or what they drink, or wherewithal they should be clothed. The habit of gambling was one which frequently led to ruinous results, and it was impossible, perhaps, to break a person of it. He was sorry to say that the habit had been increasing of late of endeavouring to get the State to interfere with the liberty of the subject. His hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) was strongly endeavouring, amongst others, to make the people sober by shutting up the public-houses. He thought that was an impossibility, and that the people ought to be dealt with by more philosophical means, by the spread of education, the influence of friends, and such genuine influences. A right rev. Bishop had said that he would rather see a people free than sober. That might be rather extreme; but, at any rate, with regard to such legislation as was now proposed there was an element of truth; with freedom there was everything to be hoped for; but when they stopped an individual from some disastrous vice by shutting him up, they did not cure him; they left him to exercise his brutal tastes in some other direction—perhaps in a more evil way. Beyond this, there was the much greater evil that they were dealing with the liberty of the subject; they were taking away the freedom of which every man was possessed. He believed that it was not a principle of law for a man to sell his freedom. A man had no right to sell his freedom, even for 12 months. There was no doubt at this time the Lunacy Laws had immensely improved; yet, nevertheless, at this time he believed that there were grave abuses of it, and that there were at that moment people confined in lunatic asylums who ought not to be there. The present proposition was a very serious one, and one could imagine many instances where a Justice of the Peace would sign a certificate to the best of his belief when a maudlin drunkard was signing his liberty away for 12 months. He did not believe that this was a safe condition of things, and he believed that there would be cases in which persons having an interest in putting people away for 12 months would succeed in doing so. Even more, the state of the law might tempt people to give way to drink; and as they were aware there were unprincipled men in every profession, there would not be much difficulty in surmounting the medical certificates.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

DR. CAMERON said, he was glad now to learn the exact grounds upon which this Bill was opposed. As to the objection that there existed an analogy between the institutions suggested by the Bill and private lunatic asylums, there was not the remotest resemblance. A private lunatic asylum was a place where a person was committed for an indefinite period against his own will—perhaps by some unprincipled member of the Medical Profession. If he were ill-treated, his complaint was treated as that of a lunatic—the only witnesses he could bring forward would be lunatics. Therefore, to compare such a man with an habitual drunkard under this Bill was unfair. The hon. Gentleman characterised this Bill as "grand-motherly legislation;" but, he asked, would they allow a man to permit himself to be held down and mutilated by a surgical operation in order to obtain a cure, and yet refuse to allow another man the permission to get cured, by a brief surrender of his liberty, which the Bill would give him? When he introduced the Bill last year, he adduced evidence to show that there were a number of habitual drunkards incarcerated in lunatic asylums, and that there were a number of lunatics incarcerated in private institutions, called "Inebriates' Homes." As to the practical support he had received, it came from men who had no interest in the matter. He had a Petition in favour of the Bill from 80 medical superintendents of as many public asylums for the insane in all parts of the United Kingdom—men who thoroughly understood the whole subject, and who were fully alive to the evils complained of, in the case of private lunatic asylums.

EARL PERCY said, that the principal objection to the Bill appeared to be on the ground that it was proposed to punish vice by legislation. That was entirely a misapprehension of the intention of the Bill. It was not a Bill to prevent drunkenness, but to provide a means for those who wished to do so to reform. Those who supported the Bill believed that drunkenness after a time had such an influence—for practical purposes—as to cause the loss of that healthy control which sane people were supposed to possess. It was supposed that at the time of his signing away his liberty for 12 months, the habitual drunkard was in sufficient possession of his faculties to know what he was doing. The question was, which was the greater of the two evils—that he should perhaps be incarcerated in one of those houses for a limited space of time, or that he should be reduced to the state in which he was now?—and those who had studied the question knew which was the greater evil very well. There were hundreds in this country who would be glad to reform if they had the opportunity to do so. He had some experience on this subject, and the great difficulty met with was the absence of any power of restraint over those who were willing in the first instance to enter these retreats.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

RACECOURSES (METROPOLIS) BILL.

(Mr. Anderson, Sir Thomas Chambers, Sir James Lawrence.)

[BILL 48.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Anderson.)

Mr. ONSLOW said, this was a very important Bill, and it affected most materially the liberties of the subject. He should oppose this Bill, and all such others, which had for their object putting a stop to the legitimate amusements of the people on the plea that they could by legislation improve the morals of the public. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would consent that it should not go into Committee at this hour. He believed that since the hon. Member for Glasgow carried this Bill certain facts had come out which his hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Sir Charles Legard) would tell the House; but to be asked to pass a Bill through Committee at that hour, it could hardly be expected that many Members would not oppose it in every way. He opposed the Bill last time, and was instrumental in stopping it. It was somewhat a long Bill, and at the present time he did not think they had had time to consider it properly, even though it was said to be the same Bill that did not pass last Session. He begged to move that the consideration of the Bill be taken that day six months.

Mr. STACPOOLE seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Onslow,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR CHARLES LEGARD said, notwithstanding the decision which the House arrived at on Saturday morning, he should again oppose the Bill. He stated, on the last occasion, that he had been present at the meetings to which the Bill was to be applied; and he had not seen anything which ought to cause the measure to become law. He had taken some little trouble to ascertain whether those few meetings were really of the description that it was necessary for the House of Commons to legislate for. He believed the House ought not to indulge in any mere sentimental legislation. He thought there never was a case in which there was greater reason to pause than there was now, before they legislated to do away with two small suburban meetings. He need not say he was not personally interested, directly or indirectly; but, as far as he understood it, the House was asked to legislate expressly to do away with the race-meetings at Kingsbury and Streatham, because he understood the Bill would not apply to the Alexandra Palace meeting owing to the more amiable disposition of the magistrates of that district. Therefore, it came to this—Kingsbury and Streatham had offended the dignity of a few people who lived in their vicinity, and they wished to get them stopped. Well, he had obtained from the proprietor of Kingsbury racecourse that he had canvassed the whole of the ratepayers of Kingsbury upon the question. There were 55 ratepayers, and out of that number eight were neutral, eight were from home, and three only were opposed to the races—consequently, giving all as against, there were still 36 in favour of the races. He knew nothing about Streatham; but, with regard to Kingsbury, he was informed that not a single police case occurred, not a robbery was reported in the neighbourhood, until the magistrates withdrew the licence for refreshments, and then the police were withdrawn. Up to that time, not a single case of rowdyism had occurred. Consequently, if the magistrates had not withdrawn the police from attending the race-meetings, no disturbance would probably have occurred. Well, then his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Henry James) had said that he objected to Kingsbury races because no good horses ever ran there. Now he (Sir Charles Legard) had ascertained that three Grand National winners had run at Kingsbury; and although he did not bring forward that as an argument, the argument of his hon. and learned Friend was done away with. He read part of a letter from the Vicar of Kingsbury in support of the respectable manner Kingsbury races were conducted. And, in conclusion, he contended that the House of Commons should not be asked to legislate simply to do away with two small race-meetings.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 64; Noes 30: Majority 34.—(Div. List, No. 11.)

Question again proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. STACPOOLE moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. ERRINGTON seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question put, “That the Debate be now adjourned.”—(Mr. Stacpoole.)

The House divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 61: Majority 37.—(Div. List, No. 12.)

Question again proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MAJOR O’GORMAN: Sir, I move the adjournment of the House. Nothing is so disgusting to me as sanctimonious hypocrisy. If hon. Members wish to be very virtuous, why do they not move that the Derby shall be abolished, or the St. Leger, or the Chester Cup, and all the rest of the races in England? Why do they not move that we shall have no more racing at the Curragh? They oppose two miserable races near London. I have been informed that the Directors of the Glasgow Bank were gentlemen who were extremely sanctimonious, and that they subscribed large sums of money—which, I believe, they never paid—to the Irish Church Missions, and others, for sanctimonious purposes. And what became of them, Sir? We know what became of them. They utterly impoverished and destroyed thousands of the poorest families in this country. It is perfectly well known that they were the most sanctimonious hypocrites in the whole Kingdom. I move the adjournment of the House.

THE O’CONOR DON seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question put, “That this House do now adjourn.”—(Major O’Gorman.)

The House divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 64: Majority 46.—(Div. List, No. 13.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. ERRINGTON thought hon. Gentlemen ought to have further opportunity for discussing the Bill.

MR. ANDERSON said, all the Amendments on the Bill were debated last year; and therefore, as there was no time later on in the Session, and the sense of the House had been so decidedly pronounced on the matter, he hoped he might be allowed to go on.

MR. ONSLOW said, he believed that Her Majesty’s Government had almost in a body supported the Bill, while some of the strongest supporters of the Government would vote against them in reporting Progress. There was a very strong feeling against this Bill; and he felt that, considering all that had happened—that many Bills had been stopped on account of the lateness of the hour—it was not inconsistent to ask that further consideration of the Bill should be postponed till a more suitable opportunity.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA agreed with the hon. Member that it was absurd to think of the House being asked to go into Committee on a Bill at 2 o'clock in the morning. There was something preposterous in the Motion. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) had, no doubt, a high moral standing on this question; but he did join with hon. Gentlemen on the other side in asking the hon. Member to allow the Bill to be put down for another day.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, the hon. Member would not expect him to agree that they had not made substantial Progress that night; and having regard to the progress of the Bill last Session, he thought they might now report Progress.

MR. ANDERSON consented.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

M O T I O N S .

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS AND CORRUPT PRACTICES BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend and continue the Acts relating to the prevention of Corrupt Practices at Parliamentary Elections.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked whether it was the intention to change the law with regard to the employment of vehicles at elections?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir JOHN HOLKER) said, it was not proposed to alter the law in that respect in Parliamentary boroughs. He might anticipate, however, that when the Bill was brought into Committee some alterations might be made, and he should wish that the question might be thoroughly discussed; but, at present, it was not contemplated to change the law in respect of the employment of vehicles at elections.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE gave Notice that the introduction of a new Bill which did not alter the present state of the law in regard to that question would be unsatisfactory.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to amend and continue the Acts relating to Election Petitions, and to the prevention of Corrupt Practices at Parliamentary Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. Secretary Cross, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 78.]

OYSTER AND MUSSEL FISHERIES ORDER (BLACKWATER, ESSEX) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. J. G. TALBOT, Bill to confirm an Order made by the Board of Trade under "The Sea Fisheries Act, 1868," relating to Tollesbury and Mersea in the River Blackwater (Essex), ordered to be brought in by Mr. J. G. TALBOT and Viscount SANDON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 76.]

PATENTS FOR INVENTIONS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Bill to consolidate, with amendments, the Acts relating to Letters Patent for Inventions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. Secretary Cross, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 77.]

DISTRICT AUDITORS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Bill to amend the Law with respect to District Auditors, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, and Mr. SALT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 79.]

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO SERVANTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MACDONALD, Bill to amend the Law as to Employers' Liability for Injuries to their Servants, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MACDONALD, Dr. CAMERON, Mr. MELDON, Mr. EARP, and Mr. BURT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 80.]

House adjourned at a quarter after
Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 18th February, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment (11); County Courts (12).

AFGHANISTAN—THE WAR—DECLARA- TION OF GENERAL ROBERTS.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I wish to ask the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India a Question of which I have given him private Notice. In the course of last month reports reached this country that General Roberts had issued a Proclamation annexing the territory of the Khurum Valley to India. I understand it has been stated on behalf of the Government in "another place" that they are not in possession of any information on the subject. I am anxious to ask if that is the case; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government have caused inquiries to be made as to what grounds there are for the report?

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: We have no information on the subject. A great many telegrams have been received; but there is nothing in them to indicate that such a transaction has taken place as that attributed to General Roberts. Of course, if such a thing had occurred, we should have taken the earliest opportunity of letting Parliament know.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: I should be glad to hear, for the convenience of your Lordships, what the course of Public Business is to be. I observe that the noble Earl the Prime Minister is not in his place; but if it is convenient for the noble Duke the Lord President to give the House some information on the subject I should be glad.

THE DUKE of RICHMOND AND GORDON: I have not had an opportunity of consulting the Prime Minister, but I shall reply to the Question of the noble Earl opposite to the extent of my knowledge. In addition to the Bill on the subject of Bankruptcy which was introduced last night the Lord Chancellor will introduce this evening a Bill dealing with County Courts in England. I hope at an early day next week to introduce a Bill for amending the Medical Acts; and shortly after that, though not next week, I hope to introduce a Bill for the Conservancy of Rivers and on the question of Floods generally.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in presenting a Bill for amending the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts, said, the Bill was supplementary to the Bill which he laid upon their Lordships' Table the previous night. Its object was the creation of an additional Judge of the High Court of Justice and to incorporate the London Bankruptcy Court with the High Court of Justice. It was thought better to deal with these matters apart from the Bankruptcy Bill. He now begged to move that the Bill be read a first time.

Bill for amending the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts — Presented (The LORD CHANCELLOR); read 1<sup>a</sup>; and to be printed. (No 11.)

JURISDICTION OF COUNTY COURTS (ENGLAND) — COUNTY COURTS BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am about to lay upon the Table, and to ask your Lordships to give a first reading to a Bill to extend the jurisdiction of the County Courts in England. My Lords, the extension of the jurisdiction of the County Courts has been long under consideration. Various recommendations upon that subject were made by the Judicature Commission; and in the course of last Session three Bills were introduced into the House of Commons by private Members proposing extensions in different forms of the jurisdiction of County Courts. Those three Bills were referred to a Select Committee, and in course of the proceedings alterations were suggested in them and made on the part of the Government; but, owing to the state of Business, the one measure which sprung out of the three could not be proceeded with last Session. We have thought it desirable that the measure should be introduced this Session as a Government measure, and therefore I propose now to lay it on your Lordships' Table. I will not enter in any detail into the arguments as to the extension of jurisdiction, because I propose to move for the evidence taken before the Select Committee. Your Lordships will find that in the whole of this question, without any exception, there is a general recommendation in favour of the extension of jurisdiction. The extension which I propose is this:—To increase the jurisdiction of the County Courts from the sum of £50, at which it now stands, to the sum of £200; and we propose further that the plaintiff shall have the power of commencing actions in the County Courts for still larger amounts; but in that case there would be an absolute right on the part of the defendant, if he does not wish to have his cause disposed of by the County Court, to remove the case to the higher Courts. The Committee to which I have referred made some recommendations last year with regard to the increase of the salaries of the County Court Judges. Her Majesty's Government do not make any proposal on that subject in this Bill, because it remains to be seen what the effect of this change will be on the business of the County Courts. If it should have the effect—as it is very likely it will—of considerably increasing the amount of business to be transacted, it will be then for Parliament to consider whether some additional strength will not be necessary on the County Court Bench—whether it will not be necessary to increase the number of Judges. That would seem to be the more natural way to meet the difficulty than by an increase of the salaries of the present Judges.

As I have referred to this subject, I have thought it right to put down on the Notice Paper to call your Lordships' attention to the state of business in the higher Courts, which is closely connected with the subject. Your Lordships have possibly seen statements made as to the state of the legal business at the present time, and I am anxious to put your Lordships in possession of some accurate information on the subject, which may tend to remove misconceptions which have arisen about it. I will take the different Courts, from the highest to the lower Courts, in order to inform your Lordships how the business stands in those Courts. Commencing with your Lordships' House, the appellate business is certainly in a most satisfactory condition. At the beginning of the present Session of Parliament, which, for legal business, was in November last, there were only nine cases left for hearing. Some more were set down in November and December; but in the November sittings 12 appeals were heard; therefore, there were no arrears at the close of the winter sitting. The state of the appellate business, therefore, is such that I am happy to say it would be in the power of the House, with regard to a certain number of appeals presented from Scotland, connected with the lamentable failure of a bank in that country, to advance those appeals and hear them without delay. Turning to the Judicial Committee, at the commencement of the sittings of the present year there were in that Committee only nine cases put down for hearing. I go to the Court of Appeal. At the commencement of the year 1878 there were 175 cases for hearing—that is, both causes and motions; and at the commencement of the present year there were 224 cases. Of course, the cases which were ready for hearing were all heard, and there were new cases which will be heard in the course of the present year. It cannot be said that there is an arrear of cases there which have been standing for any length of time. As to the Court of Chancery, the number of cases ready for hearing at the commencement of the present year was somewhat less than at the commencement of the preceding one. In January, 1878, there were 528 cases for hearing; in January, 1879, there were only 512; and I have the authority of the Master of the Rolls for saying that already a great number of these have been heard, and that, although new cases are being set down, there are no arrears in the Court of Chancery. With regard to the Probate Court, at the beginning of 1878 there were 33 cases for hearing of probates, and at the beginning of 1879 there were 34 cases. As to the matrimonial cases, there were 141 at the beginning of 1878, and 104 at the beginning of 1879. In the Admiralty Court at the beginning of 1878 there were 11 cases, and at the beginning of 1879 there were 12 cases. That is the state of business in all of the Courts excepting those Divisions generally called Common Law Divisions—Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and the Exchequer. With regard to these Divisions, the first matter to which I wish to refer is the subject of Circuits, on which a good deal of observation has lately been made. Some time ago an opinion was expressed in the House of Commons in favour of having four gaol deliveries throughout the country in the course of the year; and there are at present, under recent arrangements, four Criminal Assizes. As to the expediency of that measure there has been a good deal of difference of opinion throughout the country. There is no doubt it entails much additional labour on the Judges, the jurymen, High Sheriffs, and others connected with the Assizes. On the other hand, it is certainly very difficult to say that the state of things which formerly prevailed was satisfactory—that prisoners should remain untried, and perhaps afterwards acquitted, for four or five, or sometimes six months together, and this at a time when, in one part of the country—at the Central Criminal Court—there is a gaol delivery every month. The additional tax upon the judicial time of an additional Criminal Circuit was not very great. The great argument against this Criminal Circuit is this:—It is said that criminal cases are so sifted before prisoners are committed for trial that, in almost all cases, the prisoners are convicted; that it is rare there is an acquittal; and that, inasmuch as the form of imprisonment before trial is less severe than after conviction, and as the length of time the person is in prison is always taken into account in the sentence, it is no hardship to remain in gaol a certain number of months before trial. That had considerable weight with me; but I have looked into the statistics of those who are tried and acquitted, and the result turns out to be something different from what I expected. I have taken the Return for the Criminal Assizes in last October and November, and I find that none of the prisoners then tried were out on bail—they were all in prison. I find 484 persons were tried, and of these 353 only were convicted, and 125 were acquitted. The proportion is one in four acquitted; and it cannot be said that the state of things would be satisfactory which would lead to the detention of these 125 for a great number of months without trial. This does not include those offenders who are out on bail; although, no doubt, it is hard for any persons charged with the commission of offences, even though such persons may have been admitted to bail, to be kept without trial for several months. The result, therefore, is that I think we shall never return to a system of having less than four gaol deliveries in the course of each year. This is a state of things to which we must make up our minds, and I cannot think that it will be so great an additional tax upon judicial time as that we shall not be able to meet it. Let me now pass to the question of the times at which the Circuits of the Judges should take place. We have, at present, four gaol deliveries in the course of the year; and along with them there are two Circuits upon which civil business is tried in all the counties of England, with the exception of some parts of Yorkshire and Lancashire, where civil business is taken at a third Assize in each year. With regard to the most convenient periods of the year for the trying of civil actions at Assizes, I have seen some complaints as to the times which have been adopted; but I cannot think that there was any choice in the matter, inasmuch as it would have been altogether unadvisable to have two Civil Assizes in the counties occurring within three months of each other; and they have therefore been placed in June and July, and January and February. It has been urged against this that the result of the practice in the present year has been that nearly all the Judges have been absent from London from the middle of January until far on in February. This is quite true, and that thereby three Divisions in London have been weakened. But it must be remembered that if the learned Judges were not absent during the period to which I have alluded, they would have had to leave London about the middle of February and to have remained away until well on into March. The result of the present arrangement will be that the Judges, instead of returning to London at the end of March, will be back in their Courts near the close of February, and will sit there continuously until July, with the exception of the Criminal Assizes about Easter, which will not withdraw more than about six Judges from town. Although, therefore, there has been for a short time a dislocation of the usual arrangements in the London Courts, the result will in the end be the same as it has been hitherto. I must not forget to add that there have been special circumstances which have added to the inconvenience, and the circumstances of Justices Lush and Stephen being withdrawn from judicial work by their labours as members of the Commission appointed to consider the Criminal Code—labours from which the country will, I believe, reap very great advantage, but the performance of which has, as I have said, withdrawn those two learned Judges for a time from the performance of their judicial functions. This, I hope and believe, is a circumstance not likely to occur again. With regard to the amount of civil business remaining to be disposed of in London and Middlesex, I find that on the 11th of January, 1878, there were 1,164 causes ready for trial as against 957 on the corresponding day of the present year. There were on Monday last 843 causes ready for trial; and I have the best authority for saying there is every reason to believe that between this time and the month of July all these causes will have been tried, in addition to any new ones which may arise in the meantime. Having said thus much, I should like merely to add—and I hope your Lordships will agree with me—that I think the statement I have made affords no ground for the demand that additional Judges should be appointed, or the statement which is sometimes made that the present judicial strength of the country is not equal to all the work that has to be done. In addition to the reasons which I have stated as accounting for the temporary delay in the transaction of legal business which has recently occurred, there has been the practice—a practice which, I hope, is now disappearing—of two or more Judges sitting in Courts where one only was necessary. This will effect a saving of judicial time; and I hope that the Bill which I have this evening laid on the Table with reference to County Courts will be the means of providing some further assistance, inasmuch as it will have the effect of withdrawing some of the more trifling—I might, perhaps, say frivolous—causes from the Superior Courts. And if the proposal of Her Majesty's Government, which I explained to your Lordships last night, is accepted, the additional Judge appointed would, being a Judge of the High Court, be available to assist in discharging the work which devolves upon the Judges of the Superior Courts. In these circumstances, it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose any addition to the number of Judges in the High Court of Justice. They would not shrink from such a duty if they thought there was any occasion for it; but they do not think that any such occasion has at present arisen.

The only other observation which I have to make is that I think the transaction of business in the Courts would be much facilitated if steps were taken to inform the Profession and suitors at the earliest possible period as to the times and places at which the various Judges in the Common Law Divisions would sit, and as far as practicable, as to the cases likely to come before each Divisional Court. I trust that in some way this object will be attained, and if it is I think your Lordships will have reason to think that in all respects the working of the Judicature Acts has been satisfactory. With this explanation, I will now only ask your Lordships to read this Bill a first time, and, in conclusion, say that if the Bill passes into law it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce, before the Session has advanced very far, a measure for consolidating the whole of the Acts of Parliament now in force relating to County Courts.

Bill to extend the jurisdiction of the County Courts, and to amend the Acts relating or giving jurisdiction thereto—Presented (The LORD CHANCELLOR); read 1<sup>a</sup>; and to be printed. (No. 12.)

SOUTH AFRICA — THE REINFORCEMENTS—CONDITION OF THE REGIMENTS.

ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

LORD TRURO moved—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for a Return in a tabular form showing (1) ages, (2) length of service, (3) number of privates who have not completed their drill and musketry instruction, of the non-commissioned officers, corporals, and privates of 2nd-21st, 58th, 3rd-60th, Rifles, 91st, and 94th, at present under orders for the Cape of Good Hope, as they embark for active service; also the number of men from each regiment left at home on account of physical unfitness, and the number drawn from other regiments to complete the battalions."

VISCOUNT BURY said, that a Return in the form suggested by the Motion of the noble Lord would involve a large amount of labour upon the officers of regiments under orders for the Cape, and that, therefore, the Return would be prepared in the same form, or very nearly, as that which had been ordered in the other House of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE REINFORCEMENTS — DISEMBARKATION.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether any special preparations have been made for the disembarkation of the reinforcements of troops and stores on their arrival at Port Natal? The noble Viscount said, he believed the existing harbour to be one of the most dangerous in the world for an operation of the kind. There had been many cases in which lives and stores had been lost in the attempt to cross the bar, and the mouth of the harbour was so narrow that two boats could not enter abreast. He trusted the Admiralty and the military authorities would make all possible arrangements beforehand for the reception and landing of the troops about to be sent out. On a future evening he would inquire, if it were inconvenient to answer the Question now, whether any measures had been adopted to prevent the importation of arms into Zululand? In former wars it was found that the weapons which destroyed our own troops had been once in English arsenals, and on one occasion all the muskets taken from the enemy were marked "Tower." It was only through Portuguese traders and our own countrymen that the warlike stores in such abundance in the hands of the Zulus could be obtained. Other European Powers adopted stringent measures on this subject, and he trusted that like measures would be adopted by us to prevent the supply of arms to our enemy.

LORD ELPHINSTONE said, that, in answer to the first Question of the noble Viscount, a captain and staff of naval officers would leave London on Monday in the steamer Pretoria, charged with duties connected with the disembarkation of the troops and stores. Other steamers would start in a day or two with stores and a portion of the Army Hospital Corps with their equipment; and vessels of light draught would be provided capable of crossing the bar when the bar was in a fit state to be crossed—namely, when the water was at a depth of 12½ feet. Arrangements had also been made with the different steamship companies trading to Natal for the use of their light craft—steamers, tugs, and lighters. These were on the spot and were constantly being used for the carriage of merchandize across the bar. They would be placed at the disposal of the military authorities, and would, no doubt, prove of the greatest value. In addition to this, transports were about to take out light draught boats for the conveyance of horses and stores. The steam pinnaces and cutters belonging to the men-of-war on the spot would also be available, and a steam pinnace was also being sent out from this country. In short, every available vessel had been already taken up and every possible precaution adopted. There was, no doubt, great difficulty in landing troops there. It was a very dangerous and exposed part of the coast, and frequently a heavy swell set in over the bar; but he might mention that the present was the most favourable time in the year for operations of that sort, and that the favourable season was likely to continue until the middle of April.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH intimated that he would put his Question as to the importation of arms into Zululand on Monday.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 18th February, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Public Petitions, appointed and nominated; Public Accounts, nominated.

QUESTIONS.

MINES REGULATION ACT, 1872—THE DINAS MINE.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it be correct that the Dinas Mine, Rhondda Valley, county Glamorgan, at the time of the explosion whereby over sixty persons lost their lives, was being carried on without a properly certified manager in terms of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1873; whether such a state of things was known to the inspector for the district, and if he had taken any action to enforce compliance with the section of the Clause which leaves it in the hands of the magistrates to impose a penalty of £50 sterling for neglecting to have a certified manager, and the liability to a further penalty of £10 sterling for every day until the Act be complied with, or whether he intimated he would take the advantage of the provision that permits an owner not to appoint a certified manager for two months; further, if there was any Correspondence between the inspector and the owner of the colliery; and, if he will object to lay such Correspondence upon the Table of the House?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the manager of the Dinas Mine at the time of the explosion did not hold a certificate, having been appointed by the owners after the suspension of his predecessor, under the provisions of subsection B of the 26th clause of the Mines (Coal) Regulation Act, 1872, which provided that the owners of a mine might appoint any competent person not holding a certificate for a period of two months, or for such longer period as might elapse until the manager had an opportunity by examination of obtaining such certificate. In the case in question, the proper notice had been given to the inspector. There was not the slightest foundation for the suspicion that the owners of the colliery intended to close the mine. On the contrary, they were doing all in their power to recover the bodies of those that were unfortunately lost.

THE NEW LAW COURTS.

QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN asked the First Commissioner of Works, If he can state when the new Law Courts, now in course of erection in Carey Street, will be sufficiently advanced to admit of judicial and other business being transacted therein?

MR. GERARD NOEL: Sir, there were originally two contracts for the new Courts of Justice; according to one the eastern wing ought to have been completed during the year 1877, but, unfortunately, owing to frosts, strikes, and other unforeseen circumstances, the work was delayed; but I am happy to state that it is now ready for occupation, with the exception of some minor details connected with furniture and fittings. The legal authorities are now considering the question of the apportionment of accommodation, and of removal, which will take place at their convenience. The main building should, according to contract, be completed during 1880; but it is impossible at this moment to fix any precise date at which it will be finished, but every exertion shall be made to hurry on the work.

INDIA—THE MAHARAJAH OF CASHMERE.—QUESTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that the Maharajah of Cashmere is carrying out or is about to carry out operations in the direction of Chitral and the Hindoo Koosh; and, if so, whether those operations are undertaken at the instance of the Government of India, and what is the object which it is proposed to attain by them?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, we have received no information that the Maharajah of Cashmere is carrying out, or is about to carry out, any operations in the direction of Chitral or the Hindoo Koosh.

BAR EDUCATION AND DISCIPLINE
BILL—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is intended to re-introduce the Bar Education and Discipline Bill this Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that having regard to the prospects of Public Business, the Government were not able at present to say whether they would be able to re-introduce the Bill referred to this Session.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS ACT
—ARTIZANS' DWELLINGS — GRAY'S INN ROAD.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that since he declined as "Confirming Authority" to approve the scheme promoted by the Metropolitan Board of Works under "The Artizans Dwellings Act, 1875," in respect of an unhealthy area in Gray's Inn Road, no other has been substituted for it; whether he is also aware that the official representation of the unhealthiness of the place in question was made by the Holborn District Board of Works as far back as the 19th July, 1875; and, whether he has taken or can take any means to induce the Metropolitan Board to remedy the state of things which exists?

MR. J. G. HUBBARD stated that he had received information that the distress arising from the insufficiency of accommodation in Gray's Inn Lane was of a most disheartening character.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, the scheme referred to by the hon. and learned Member came before me in 1876. It appeared that the Board of Works had originally a very good scheme; but it was cut down so much that I thought it was one that ought not to be passed, and I therefore rejected it. In the autumn of 1876 the Board gave Notice of their intention to apply to Parliament for its sanction to a scheme for the widening of Gray's Inn Road, prepared, not under the Artizans Dwellings Act, but under the Metropolitan Improvement Act. Under the Bill so brought forward by them and approved by Parliament, the greater portion of the area affected by the original scheme was destroyed. The building of the artizans' dwellings as substitutes for those pulled down has not been proceeded with in accordance with the terms of the Act, and I am sorry to say that I have no power to compel the provisions of the Statute to be carried out. I trust, however, that before long a smaller scheme will be introduced which will remedy the evils complained of.

SCOTLAND — AGRICULTURAL HYPO-
THEC AND OFFICE OF LORD CLERK
REGISTER.—QUESTION.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce this Session a Bill to abolish Agricultural Hypothec in Scotland; and, whether he is prepared to state the conclusions at which he has arrived in regard to the appointment of an Under Secretary of State for Scotland and the office of Lord Clerk Register?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, with regard to the first part of the Question, I think the better course for the Government to adopt would be to explain their views on the 19th of March, when the Bill on that subject is to be read a second time, and when the Lord Advocate will discuss the Bill on the subject. With regard to the office of Lord Clerk Register, the details of the arrangement are not yet finally settled; but I hope, in the course of a few days, to answer the Question of which my hon. Friend has given Notice. Meanwhile, I may state that the Government do not intend to abolish the office of Lord Clerk Register. In their opinion, there ought to be one person to undertake the whole Register Office, and that person ought to be a man, as he is described in the words of the Report of 1866—

"Learned in the law, of great classical ability, and resident, so as to be able to devote his whole time to the duties of the office."

As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the office of Lord Clerk Register is one of the chief Offices of State in Scotland. Therefore, it is not the intention that he should occupy this office, but that it should be given to a person of very high standing, who would not receive any salary. As to the other part of the Question, I must reserve my remarks till after I have perused the Bill on the subject.

CATTLE DISEASE—THE AMERICAN CATTLE TRADE.—QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it has come to the knowledge of the Irish Government that several carcasses of fat cattle have been washed on shore on the coast of Ireland, and have been found to show symptoms of disease; whether there is any evidence to show that cattle were thrown overboard from the steamers engaged in the American cattle trade; and, what steps have been taken to bury these carcasses, or otherwise to prevent the propagation of disease from them?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, a representation was recently made to the Irish Government to the effect that some carcasses had been washed ashore on the coast of the county Cork; but it has not been ascertained how they came there, or that they showed any symptoms of being diseased. Circulars, however, have been addressed by the Lord Lieutenant to the local authorities, and by the Board of Trade to the Receivers of Wrecks, suggesting precautionary measures in the event of any more carcasses being found.

GRENADA — ILL-TREATMENT OF COOLIES — THE PAPERS. — QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, When the Papers relating to the ill-treatment of Coolies in Grenada will be laid upon the Table?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he hoped to be able to lay the Papers in question upon the Table of the House in a few days.

SOUTH AFRICA—MASSACRE OF KAFFIRS IN GRIQUALAND. QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether his attention has been called to statements in the Cape papers regarding a massacre of natives by Boer volunteers near Kuegas in Griqualand West; whether it is true that out of a party of eighty natives, possessing among them only two guns, upwards of forty, including thirteen women and children, were killed, and twenty-four women and children wounded; whether it is a fact that after the whole party of natives had been killed, wounded, or captured, orders were given by the commandant of the Burgher volunteers to kill such of the wounded as could not walk; and whether, as stated, these orders were carried out on men and women alike; whether it is a fact that all the wounded women and children were deported into Cape Colony to be placed at service there as soon as they were sufficiently recovered from their wounds; and, if so, under what law did the deportation take place; and, if he has not already ordered an investigation into the truth of the statements referred to, whether he will take steps to have them thoroughly investigated?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, when my attention was called to these statements by the Notice of the hon. Member's Question, I thought they referred to some reports which reached this country last Summer, of occurrences which were alleged to have taken place in the suppression of the outbreak in Griqualand West. At that time I inquired into the truth of these reports, and on page 325 of the Cape Blue Book presented in December, and on page 116 of that last issued, will be found despatches from Colonel Lanyon denying the charges, and inclosing statements from the missionaries in support of his denial, forming in the whole, I think, quite a satisfactory answer to the charges that were made. The hon. Member has, however, been kind enough to forward me the newspaper extracts to which his Question alludes, in which the date of the events referred to is given as October 30; but I have no information as to anything of the kind which occurred at that date which would enable me to answer his Question. I will therefore cause inquiry to be made; but it is only fair to Colonel Lanyon, and those who fought under him in Griqualand West, to bear in mind the fact that previous statements very similar to these have been made and satisfactorily replied to.

Mr. Assheton Cross

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—
THE NATIVE CONTINGENT.

QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Surveyor General of the Ordnance, If his attention has been drawn to the Despatch of Lord Chelmsford to the Secretary of State for War, dated 25th November 1878, reporting that he was unable to mobilise the Natal Native Contingent owing to his demands for camp equipment not having been complied with; and if he will state the reason of the delay in complying with such demands?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Yes, Sir, my attention has been drawn to the matter in question, and with the permission of the House I will state what actually occurred. A telegram was received from Lord Chelmsford on 4th August as follows:—"No more supplies are required at present to be sent to Cape Colony or Natal." Acting upon this telegram, the outstanding orders for camp equipment were not executed; but the precaution was taken at the same time to so inform Lord Chelmsford. He telegraphed back on October 26 that his previous telegram referred to commissariat supplies only. The demands for camp equipment, which had been previously cancelled, were immediately ordered to be complied with, and the supplies were despatched to Natal with as little delay as possible.

MOTIONS.

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. DILLWYN, in moving that a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the Civil Service Estimates in the order in which they appear, observed that the discussion of the Estimates in Committee of Supply was not such a revision of them as business men would require of their own affairs. It was, in fact, little better than a farce. He admitted that the Estimates were generally brought before the House in a form which left little to be desired; but they took no further steps in their corporate capacity to criticize them and ascertain if they were right and proper, although that was one of the main functions of the House, and a duty which its Members owed to their constituents. He, however, made no charge against any particular Government. The Estimates were not proposed in their regular order; some hon. Gentlemen, perhaps, gave Notice of Amendments in regard to particular items, and Supply was repeatedly put off. As a consequence the Government ran short of money, and once or twice in the Session had to ask for Votes on Account. The discussion, it was said, could not be conveniently taken until the regular Estimate was brought forward, and the Vote on Account was granted. Thus the Session wore on, until about the last week of its existence, when hon. Members were anxious to get to the country and the moors and escape the heat of London; the Estimates were then brought forward in earnest, and hustled through the Committee, because hon. Members were too anxious and impatient to discuss them. The practical result was that private Members interested in the matter could seldom effect any reduction of Expenditure, even where such a reduction was shown to be practicable and right, the Government, by their numbers, being always able to win the day. He had, therefore, to propose, as a tentative measure, that a Committee should be appointed to go through the Estimates in order. They need not make any elaborate Report, but they might make their rough notes and bring up their Report on each Estimate before it was discussed in the House. Then the Estimates should be considered by the House in their regular order, unless some special reason was shown why that order should be departed from. He was not in favour of a large Committee, but the House would decide of what number it should consist. He made that Motion in no Party spirit, nor did he wish the Committee to be a political one in any sense; but upon it there should, he thought, be the Secretary of the Treasury or some other officer of the Government, and also a Member from the front Opposition Bench who had been connected with the Treasury. Without touching the policy of an Estimate, the Committee would see whether it had been sanctioned by the House, whether the money asked for by the Government was excessive, whether the service for which it was intended was required, or whether economy might be effected by a consolidation of offices, and so forth. It was said that such a Committee as he suggested would impair or destroy the responsibility of the Government. He believed that, on the contrary, it would tend to increase their sense of responsibility, because they would be subject to the criticism of an able Committee. Moreover, the Government did not seem to have felt their responsibility very keenly, for the Expenditure of the country was increasing at a fearful rate. In 1857-8 the Civil Service Estimates amounted to £14,340,000; whereas, last year, they reached £23,400,000, showing in the interval an increase of £9,000,000 per annum. The Civil Expenditure was now nearly equal to that for both the Army and Navy—namely, £26,586,000. He could not help thinking that if the Government had attacked those Estimates as they ought to have done, they would have kept them down to a much smaller amount. Another objection was that such a Committee as he asked for would diminish the responsibility of the Committee of Supply. On the contrary, he believed it would strengthen the hands of the Committee of Supply. He asked the Government to do what any Member of the House in his private capacity, or any master of a public establishment would do—namely, take some steps for the purpose of examining the items of expenditure which his manager or agent might present to him. He believed that if a Committee were appointed, the effect would be a reduction of Expenditure; but if that was not the result, then the House and the country would know that no reduction could be made. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution which stood in his name.

MR. BAXTER said, that since he entered the House he had been asked by his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea to second the Motion, and he at once acceded to the request. He had been 24 years a Member of that House, and during the greater part of that time he had devoted his attention to a criticism of the Civil Service Estimates. He had also filled the Office of Secretary to the Treasury. It was perfectly obvious to every candid mind that the House had entirely lost its control, if it ever had any, over this branch of the Expenditure of the country. It was perfectly true that some paltry sum for a picture or a door-keeper's salary might occasionally be disallowed; but there had been no serious diminution in any particular Vote, or any sensible lessening of the Civil Service Estimates, in consequence of any debate in that House. He was not going so far as to say that discussions in Committee of the Whole House on the Civil Service Estimates were altogether useless, because he thought they had a certain deterrent effect on the official mind; and although they might not get rid of certain Votes which it was proposed to put upon the Estimates, the probability was that some others were not brought forward at all in consequence of the discussions. Still, his experience was that the deterrent effect was of an infinitesimally small nature, and he had been driven with reluctance to the conclusion that the House must adopt some new plan in order to render the present farcical revision of the Estimates by the Representatives of the people something more than a mere sham. What had struck him in the course of these discussions during the last 20 years was this—that hon. Gentlemen assembled in Committee of Supply had no means of finding out where the blot lay in particular Votes. When he was in Office, he used to be amused seeing hon. Gentlemen beating all about the bush. Sometimes they were hot, sometimes cold, sometimes very near the mark, sometimes very far from it. How often did he see them taking a division on a Vote which was perfectly right, when the item above or below it was absolutely indefensible. In such a state of things it often occurred to him that what the House could not by any possibility, except by chance, discover, might be found out without much difficulty by a strong Committee which should have power to take evidence. It had been said that this proposal, if adopted, would diminish the responsibility of the Secretary to the Treasury. But, after all, the Secretary to the Treasury was only a subordinate officer, and sometimes he was sat upon by the other Departments. He often thought that if those hon. Gentlemen who insisted upon expenditure which the Secretary to the Treasury disapproved had the fear of a Select Committee of the House before their eyes, the Treasury would be greatly strengthened in resisting the demand for increased expenditure. For his own part, he was not ashamed to stand there and say that often when in Office he would have been extremely pleased to know that the expenditure of which he did not approve, but which had been forced upon him by other Departments of the Government, had to undergo revision and to pass through the ordeal of a Select Committee of the House of Commons. The best mode of obtaining economical Estimates, no doubt, was to put on the Treasury Bench men who were themselves advocates of economy and who desired to see the Estimates reduced. But there were practical difficulties in the way of a Minister, however conscientious in his desire to reduce particular Votes. The present system had notoriously failed, and he saw no reason why they should not try another, such as that which was proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Swansea. As far as the control of the House of Commons over the Civil Service Expenditure was concerned, it could not be in a worse position than it was now. Therefore, he had no hesitation in supporting, as an experiment, the proposal of his hon. Friend. Unlike many hon. Members, he thought the Committee on Public Accounts had done a great deal of good, and probably the Committee proposed by his hon. Friend would have a similar effect.

Mr. Dillwyn

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to consider and report upon the Civil Service Estimates in the order in which they appear."—
(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. HERMON also supported the Motion, although he was unable to agree with the assertion that the Government had frequently deferred these Estimates intentionally until a late period of the Session. Certainly the struggle of the Government last year was to bring them on earlier than they had ever been submitted before. Looking at what occurred last night, he did not see there was any great hope that the Civil Service Estimates, even if the proposed new Rule were passed, would obtain that full and candid examination to which they ought to be subjected. He thought the Motion which the hon. Gentleman had brought forward to-night was a practical and business-like proposition. If it were adopted, hon. Members would be able to ascertain whether the Estimates were presented in the right form. He had often noticed that when an explanation was asked of a Vote, Ministers retired in order to consult with their officials. If these Estimates were sent to a Committee upstairs, the Members of such Committee would themselves have an opportunity of interrogating the officials who actually prepared the Accounts. The enormous increase of Estimates was, in a great degree, due to the action of the Party opposite. One means of reducing them was to place a check upon expensive legislation, such as that relating to what he might term the educational craze, under which an extravagant expenditure was incurred in the construction of costly establishments and in the teaching of extra subjects. He believed the Ancient Monuments Bill, if passed, would cause more expense than appeared at present to be contemplated. There was a weekly journal in which from time to time had appeared the confessions of financiers and Premiers; but to-night they had the confessions of an ex-Secretary to the Treasury, and his revelations had, indeed, been somewhat startling. The appointment of the proposed Committee would not impair the authority or responsibility of Ministers. On the contrary, he thought it would strengthen the hands of his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury. He supported the proposal, because he believed it would enable the House to fulfil its most important functions with more regularity and more success than heretofore.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he differed from all the last speaker had said in support of the proposal. It seemed to him to be a move in the wrong direction. The greater part of the increase of Expenditure in the Civil Service was owing to the policy of the House of Commons, and he did not believe any Committee could give to that House an opinion that would be useful to hon. Members in guiding them as to the mode in which the public money should be expended. A great deal of good had been done by the Public Accounts Committee; but that was a totally different question. The Members of that Committee did not enter at all into a question of policy, but merely satisfied themselves as to whether the money had been expended in the manner contemplated by the House. His hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) proposed that a Committee should be appointed to examine into the Estimates and to report to the House their opinion as to whether those Estimates had been properly framed and were proper Estimates of the Expenditure of the country for the year. He believed it was impossible for any Committee to undertake that duty, and if they did they would undertake, on behalf of the House of Commons, a part of the duty which absolutely devolved on the Government. It was the duty of the House of Commons to see that the Government presented full Estimates before they asked for Votes, and to criticize those Votes; but the House would be misled if it appointed a Committee to examine into all these matters of detail. The hon. Member for Swansea said he confined his remarks to the Civil Service Estimates. Well, one large item in those Estimates had reference to Education, others to the salaries of the Civil Servants, to Public Buildings, and to the three Revenue Departments—namely, the Post Office, the Customs, and the Inland Revenue. Were these subjects which a Select Committee could possibly examine into and on which it could present a Report that would be of the smallest value in guiding the Committee of Supply? He maintained that such a Select Committee would mislead them. Nine-tenths of the increase of expenditure to which the hon. Member had alluded were due to the policy of the House itself, and a Committee would be incompetent to decide whether that policy was right or wrong. If, for example, it was right that money should be expended for Education, the Committee of Council must be left, with the check of the Treasury, to determine what Estimates they would submit. The real fault arose from the fact that the House did not take proper time to examine the Estimates. The Estimates were put down day after day and week after week, and nobody knew when they would be discussed. Such a state of things was, he thought, a discredit to the management of Public Business; but when the remedy for it came to be discussed the House seemed to be all at sea, for there were, he perceived, no less than 15 new Amendments on the Paper to the Resolutions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed, so that all further discussion of them was rendered almost hopeless. When he first had the honour of a seat in the House the Estimates were discussed. The late Mr. Hume spoke on them at what some hon. Members might regard as foolish length; but, be that as it might, it was evident they were not discussed at present. He trusted, therefore, the Government would exercise their power—and no Government within his recollection possessed greater—to persuade the House to adopt some Rule which would place matters in a more satisfactory position; but the proposal now made would have a very injurious effect by retarding the progress of Public Business, without the smallest chance of any public benefit.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he felt somewhat alarmed when he heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), for he had begun by stating that it must be obvious to every candid mind that the House of Commons had lost its control over the Estimates and that its supervision was a mere sham. The right hon. Gentleman went on to speak of the amusement with which, when in Office, he had watched the discussion of the Estimates from time to time, and stated that it frequently happened that in cases in which the House had passed one Vote after much discussion, which required no defence, they had left unnoticed another which was entirely indefensible. Now, he himself had not long occupied the post which he now had the honour to fill; but he must altogether deny that the present Government regarded the Votes which they laid before the House as being indefensible, either in whole or in part. As to the functions performed by the Committee on Public Accounts to which the right hon. Gentleman had referred, they were entirely different from any which were likely to devolve on such a Committee as that which was now proposed. The Committee on Public Accounts criticized matters after the money had been spent, and dealt with abstract questions of Account. But what would the proposed Committee have to do? They would have to deal with proposals of the Government, many of them involving questions of future policy.

Mr. Thomson Hankey

Now, a Government responsible for its future policy would, he fancied, look with considerable jealousy on a Committee by which that policy might be picked to pieces, and on which they would be represented, perhaps, by only one Member; whereas their policy ought to be judged by the Whole House. No Government, he ventured to say, would so far abdicate its functions as to intrust to a Committee of the House, composed of Members of different Parties, and not representing the opinion of the House at large, the Estimates which it deemed to be necessary to be discussed. But, to turn from what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), he would point out the real remedy, for the evil of which the hon. Gentleman complained was not that which he proposed, but that which had been suggested by the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey), and which had before been submitted to the consideration of the House — namely, to secure, as far as possible, the certainty of Supply being taken on the evenings for which it was fixed without the danger of it being delayed day after day because of Notices of Motion. He recollected pretty distinctly the discussions on Supply last year, and he might state to the House that the Government had proposed on 34 occasions to consider the Estimates in Supply, and that on 15 occasions the subject was never approached; while there were only three occasions during the whole Session on which no discussion took place before Supply could be obtained. On all the remaining occasions Supply was reached not until after considerable discussion; and he would further observe that the objection which had been urged by the hon. Member for Swansea against the House being so often called upon to take Votes on Account would be greatly obviated if Supply could be fixed with such certainty that it might be taken earlier in the year. The hon. Gentleman had also referred to what he appeared to think the alarming increase in the amount of the Estimates; but he took no account of the increase in the population and the wealth of the country, nor of the fact that the amount of the Estimates depended in a great degree on the legislation for which the House was responsible. The Vote for Education, he would remind him, and one or two other Votes formed so large a portion of the increases on the Civil Service Estimates as to leave very little room for any substantial reduction under other heads. The hon. Gentleman last year laid great stress upon the interest which he said the permanent officials of the Government must have in increasing the Estimates; but that increase would more properly be ascribed to the causes which he had just mentioned. The real point to consider was whether the proposal would facilitate Business. Now, he had always found that discussions by a Committee, so far from diminishing subsequent discussions in the House, had tended to enlarge them by furnishing new material; and he believed that that would be the result if the hon. Member for Swansea's views were carried out. Besides, the House could never be too careful of delegating its authority over the Estimates to any Committee, however vigilant, or of decreasing in any way the responsibility of the Government. The Secretary to the Treasury would probably be very glad indeed to share his responsibility with a Committee; but it was very doubtful whether the public interest would benefit. The Government, in all probability, would by degrees get to believe that the preparation of the Estimates was not so important a matter as their consideration, and that the responsibility of framing them rested really with the Committee, whose views might not always be economically sound or calculated to promote the efficiency of the Public Service.

MR. LOWE: Sir, the brilliant imagination of my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) has made out a state of things which, I apprehend, has little counterpart in reality. He represents to us a Treasury anxious above all things to increase Expenditure, and a House of Commons anxious above all things to diminish it. Starting from that point, my hon. Friend naturally wishes that the good principle in matters of economy, represented by himself and other hon. Members, should have the upper hand, and that the evil principle, represented by the Treasury, should be trampled under foot. But, alas! these things are not to be decided by the hallucinations of even the most brilliant imagination. We have to deal with matters of hard fact, which stand, it seems to me, in the most diametrical opposition to the hon. Member's theories. If there is a man in the world anxious for economy, depend upon it that man is the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that not from any superior virtue he may happen to possess, but because his character, his position, his very existence is involved in his being able to keep the Expenditure of the country within bounds. Others may be sincere in their professions of economy; you may always thoroughly believe him. On the other hand, as to the House of Commons, can any hon. Gentleman who has had experience in this House really believe that the Business of this House is mainly, or, indeed, in any perceptible degree, the promotion of economy in any way whatever? The Chancellor of the Exchequer is exposed to the most urgent importunities. What for? Does my hon. Friend suppose that people go to Downing Street and say to the Chancellor of the Exchequer—"For Heaven's sake, retrench this expenditure, do away with that job, alter or cut down this office!" Nothing of the kind. I venture to say that in the course of the five years I held the Office no such application was made to me. I had frequently 50, 60, or 100 gentlemen calling upon me to urge their views—gentlemen whose support was most valuable to the Government, and who knew it and felt it, and desired that I should feel it too; but who went away little less than furious, because the things they wanted done—things very good and proper, perhaps, in themselves—could not be done by the Government simply because the expense would have been too much for the public purse. If it were once understood that the Treasury was facile in these matters, and that you had only to make a good case in order to have it dealt with, the Government would be overwhelmed with projects, not one-hundredth part of the expense of which it could bear. That being the case, what is the remedy my hon. Friend proposes? That this man, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who above all others is bound to practise economy, shall be, in fact, placed under the control of a Committee of this House. Now, let hon. Members just think how the arrangement would work. At present a number of Gentlemen holding the destiny of the Government in their hands come to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and ask for a particular thing. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, if he knows his duty and is fit for his Office, and does not think the Revenue will bear the expenditure demanded, says "No." But in the case my hon. Friend proposes, what would he do? He would say—"Well, this sort of thing ought not to be done; but, after all, there is the Committee. If the Committee passes it nobody can blame me." And so you would have a quantity of things done which no Chancellor of the Exchequer would have dared to sanction had they not been brought forward by the Committee. Then there comes the question of responsibility. At present the Treasury exercises a control over the whole Departments of the Administration; but to appoint such a Committee as my hon. Friend proposes would be to place the Treasury in an inferior position, and the Committee in a superior position; and the officials of that Department, instead of attending to their proper duties, would have a great deal of their time taken up during the Session in appearing before the Committee. In a word, it appears to me that if you wanted the greatest possible facility for increased Public Expenditure, coupled with the least possibility of retrenchment, you could not do better than appoint this Committee. I will not trouble the House by going into details. I have never myself been accused of being too anxious to spend public money. Of all the charges brought against me that was not one; and if there was the least probability of economy resulting from it I would not hesitate to advise the adoption of this proposal. But I am quite certain that, well meant as it no doubt is, it would break down the responsibility of the only safeguard which you have, which is the Treasury, and would inevitably tend to increase the Expenditure.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he believed the admirable speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University (Mr. Lowe) was one which could not be answered. He would not attempt, therefore, to follow the right hon. Gentleman in again demonstrating the weakness of the proposal before the House in that direction which the right hon. Gentleman had taken; but there were one or two points connected with the question on which the right hon. Gentleman had not touched, and which seemed to call for remark. One was economy of time. As things were, hon. Members complained of the Estimates being late; but if the Committee had to examine them before they were presented to the House, they would not be in the hands of hon. Members till close upon the end of the Session. The officials of the Treasury would be so much worried by having to attend before the Committee that they would be unable to do their work properly, and the multitude of questions suggested by the investigations of the Committee would give rise to endless discussions in the House when the Estimates were at length presented. The result would be that Public Business would be much delayed, and that the Government would be obliged to ask for Votes of Credit, as to the objectionable character of which all parties were agreed. With regard to the question of responsibility, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury seemed to speak of the House of Commons as being responsible for the Estimates. Now that was a mistake. [Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he certainly did not mean that.] He was glad to hear the hon. Baronet's explanation, for it would be a bad day for this country if the Government wished to shift its responsibility for the Estimates upon the shoulders of the House of Commons. He would never vote for relieving the Government of any responsibility; and the Government would be utterly irresponsible if the House handed the Army and Navy Estimates and the Civil Service Estimates over to a Committee. It was the Members of the House, individually and collectively, who were responsible for the great increase of Expenditure under the Civil Service Estimates; and it was only by resisting the proposals that were made by Members that the Estimates could be curtailed. He was surprised to hear the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), who had been a Member of a Liberal Government professing economy, because if indefensible proposals were made when he was Secretary to the Treasury it was his bounden duty to have resisted them. It was all very well, when he was out of Office, to come down and tell the House what he had done; but what they wanted to know was what he did when he was in Office, and he admitted that the Liberal Government placed before the House indefensible items. If so, it was his bounden duty to have warned the House, which would have taken care that they were expunged from the Estimates. If the Motion had done nothing else, it had elicited a reply from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London, and also from the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Henkey), who had always expressed himself frankly and plainly, and he thoroughly understood this question. He believed no greater mistake could be made than to place these Estimates in the hands of a Committee, and therefore he should vote against the proposal.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: Sir, when, in the year 1861, I submitted to the House a Motion for the appointment of a Committee of Public Accounts, the terms of the Motion, as they first stood, contained a clause to the effect that the Estimates also should be investigated by the Committee. In consequence, however, of what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), and others, said to me in private, I struck out that clause before submitting the Motion to the House. It was, therefore, with a peculiar interest that I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), to see if it contained any arguments to cause me to revert to my original view, which he now advances. His speech has, however, failed to convince me. He has said that "at least his proposal can do no harm." If I thought so, I would certainly vote for it, and give his "experiment," as he termed it, a fair trial; but I feel sure that it will be productive of the greatest harm, and that, too, in both the ways in which he pointed out his aims in making the proposal. The first of these two principles of the hon. Member was this—"We must bear in mind that this House is responsible for the Expenditure, and yet makes no provision for a consideration of the Estimates." It seems to me, in passing, a very droll thing to propose, if it is the House which is responsible, to shift that responsibility on to a Committee of the House—or, rather, as I will show, to get rid of it altogether—while laying it down as the fundamental principle of the plan, that the House alone is responsible, and stating the aim of that plan to be the perfecting of that responsibility. The second aim of the hon. Member is the economy of time. “The Estimates are now,” he said, “unduly delayed in the first place, and then they are hustled through without consideration.” His two aims are, then, responsibility and saving of time. What would be the effect of his Motion in regard to time? When the Session opened, there would first be the debates on the Address, and then the hon. Member’s Committee would be appointed. After a time it would meet, and taking the Army Estimates, it would send for the officials of the War Office and cross-examine them on every item and on the general policy. All this while the hands of the Government would be tied. They could not proceed with Supply until the Committee’s Report on the Army Estimates had been for a due time in the hands of hon. Members. The same may be said of the Navy Estimates, the Revenue Estimates, and each class of the Civil Service. This Committee will therefore commence by causing a great delay. But a greater delay will be occasioned when each Report has been made, unless he intends to preclude the House altogether from a consideration of the Estimates; for each Report will be a perfect arsenal of arms and ammunition for hon. Members to fire off at the Government, night after night, on each Vote. Certainly, the effect of this Committee would be to prevent “the Estimates being hustled through at the end of the Session,” for the end of the Session would never come. We should have to sit en permanence. So much in regard to time. Now let us consider how it will affect the responsibility of the House. Whenever an item should have been objected to, and all the ammunition had been fired off, the Secretary to the Treasury would rise and say—“You have appointed a Committee to consider the Estimates, and the Committee have had the advantage of examining all the officials on the subject; surely the Committee must know more about it than the rest of the House; why cannot you trust to your own Committee?” Thus the responsibility of the House would be undermined. At the same time, the responsibility of the Government would be obliterated, for the Government is now responsible for every item of Expenditure which they ask the House to grant. The plea of the Secretary would shift that responsibility from the Government on to the shoulders of the Committee. There is another evil which would not be long in showing itself—an evil which the Secretary to the Treasury did not see, when he said—“The Government will be represented on the Committee by only one Member.” For, consider what is the Government, under our present system of Party Government? It consists of those persons who are pleasing to the majority of the House—persons who represent that majority. The Committee would be appointed by the Government, in that it would be appointed by the majority at their beck and call. The Government would, therefore, take care not only to have a clear majority on the Committee, but, also, it would see that all the other Members of the Committee should be “safe men”—that is, men who would not be inconvenient to the Government; pliable men or ignoramuses; at all events, persons who had not too much independence. Thus the Committee would be a mere creature of the Government, and a screen for the Government to ward off attacks and to shield it from being called to account. The country would then say that the Committee was packed, and would put no faith in it; while both the Government and the House would have got rid of their responsibilities, without any responsibility being incurred by the Committee, as the House would not call its own Committee to account. Thus all responsibility for Expenditure would be destroyed. The late Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Baxter) said—“It is always useless to try to reduce any Vote, as the Government will always beat you.” He meant that the Government have a phalanx, which is the majority of the House, to support them; and that when this ceases to be so they cease to be the Government. That is Party Government. That is an evil of the Representative system. In former days our forefathers devised a tripartite check on Expenditure. First, the Treasury check. Everyone who has been in Office knows that his own Department aims at perfection and extension of power, and this cannot be done without expenditure. Yet not an item of Expenditure can be incurred without the leave of the Treasury; and it is ruthless in its economical cruelty, as every head of a Department has bitterly experienced. The second check is the House of Commons; and the third is the Appropriation Audit, the object of which is to see that no money is expended except in the way, and within the measure, indicated by Resolution of the House of Commons. The Treasury check and the Audit are nearly as perfect as they can be. If there is too great an Expenditure, the House of Commons alone is to blame. It is in that part of the State machine that the screw is loose. The late Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Baxter) told us that when he was in Office he observed that the House would take two divisions against some Vote which was quite right and necessary, while it would leave unnoticed some indefensible or profligate expenditure. This means that the House of Commons is not informed, not intelligent, and ignorant of its chief duty—its chief duty, I say—for the House is certainly not a good legislative machine. No one would look to a meeting of 600 men to make laws. In effect, the House of Commons, as Mr. Thring has remarked in his evidence, makes cumbrous, unintelligible, or contradictory laws, and throws the Statute Book into confusion. Legislation is not the proper duty of a Representative Assembly. Its functions are the control of the purse; and, subsidiary to that, the representation of grievances. By the latter, the wishes and opinions of the country are made known. These opinions are not made known by newspapers; but are, to a very great extent, manufactured by newspapers. But newspapers are under an editor, and subject to his prejudices, and idiosyncracies, and interests, and private aims; and they are carried on partly as a commercial speculation, and partly—as in the case of newspapers belonging to hon. Members and to Ministers—as a stepping-stone to power. Well then, the result of this debate is this—The House of Commons does not exercise its proper functions, while it busies itself about that which it cannot do. In other words, the House has made itself useless, and worse than useless. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Lowe) has said that it is the Chancellor of the Exchequer who is always the most eager and anxious to restrain expenditure and promote economy. Economy, Sir, is a good thing, when it is the effect of wisdom. But there is such a thing as economy without wisdom or knowledge. As the House of Commons fails to perform its functions, so a Chancellor of the Exchequer may fail in the duties of a statesman. We have a Zulu War, which might have been avoided if a telegraphic wire had extended from Ceylon or St. Vincent to the Cape. The expenditure of that war will be enormous; that waste would have been saved if we had telegraphic communication with the Cape. Yet I believe that a Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Lowe) refused a comparatively small sum to promote or assist such an enterprize. That was economy without wisdom, and there was a Chancellor of the Exchequer without statesmanlike intelligence and prudence.

Lord Robert Montagu

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that nothing was more evident from the proceedings of the previous night—and, indeed, from those of that night also—than that that House was devoted to discussion rather than to Business. In the proposal that was made by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), they had a practical illustration of a system that had been suggested before Committees of the House on Public Business over and over again. This system had been recommended by an authority whose knowledge of the House was inferior to that of no man living. The system was that the House should appoint grand Committees upon subjects of great importance; and he (Mr. Newdegate) could conceive no circumstance upon which the appointment of a Select Committee—selected with the greatest care by the House—would be more useful than one appointed upon the production of the Civil Service Estimates, to consider and report upon them. One reason for the negligence shown in the consideration of these Estimates was, in his opinion, that under the recent centralizing legislation these Estimates had increased in volume, had been enlarged page by page, and chapter upon chapter, until the Members of the House became appalled at their extent and volume—in fact, felt individually unable to deal with them. The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B.

Barttelot) had urged the House not to appoint the Committee now proposed, because the House generally would get thereby an "inkling" of the detail of these Estimates upon which it might be disposed to take action. It was this very "inkling," as the hon. Member described it, which was so much needed. The volume of these Civil Service Estimates had been enlarged until, if an individual Member took up one point, he was treated as if he was dealing with something either insignificant, or with a subject of which he did not understand the bearings; and, indeed, it was almost impossible, at all events very difficult, for an individual Member to compass the relation of any one item to the vast mass of items among which it was involved. This must be patent to every Member of the House. In former years, when the Legislature was content that county expenditure should be managed by the county authorities, and municipal expenditure by municipalities, the Estimates submitted to the House were comparatively simple. It was quite possible that, aided by knowledge acquired in local administration, the Members of the House should be individually competent to deal with those Estimates. The Civil Service Estimates in former days were limited to the expenditure, salaries, and conduct of a limited number of officers; but the Civil Service had grown up to such vast dimensions under recent legislation that it had become a great trading corporation—it had become an army—with which the House was almost unable to cope. He could not see the force, or rather the value, of the argument that the House would diminish the responsibility of Her Majesty's Ministers by the appointment of this Committee; while it was admitted that, as matters now stood, the House itself was incompetent to exact that responsibility. In answer to that observation, he need only appeal to the recollection of the Members of that House in saying that when the Estimates were considered, instead of the House having of late years been very decently full, it was always disgracefully empty. The real fact was that those who opposed the Motion did not make allowance for the change of circumstances. He had heard it argued that Her Majesty's Ministers formed for financial purposes a delegation, if not a Committee, of that House; while some seemed to imagine that Her Majesty's Ministers were solely responsible for the Public Expenditure. Who was to exact the responsibility of the Administration? The truth was that the House itself was responsible for the aggregate Public Expenditure, and if the House intended to discharge its responsibility, it would adopt some such method as that which had been suggested—to furnish it with those inklings which were necessary for its understanding the aggregate details of, and thus the aggregate Estimates. That applied particularly to the Civil Service Estimates, because the Civil Service had become so powerful that they were capable of refusing information to the House, and practically did so. Under the changed circumstances and form of the Government of this country, if the House intended to discharge its duty by enforcing a wise economy, after having deprived the local authorities to a great extent of their control over a large part of the Public Expenditure, this House would replace that control by some organization within itself, which should furnish it with information, without which the House, when it went into Committee of Supply, felt itself incompetent. He had considered the matter for some time, and he was convinced that the House ought to accommodate its action to the new position it had itself shared in creating. The House ought to abandon old-fashioned notions as to dealing with the Estimates in their new and enlarged volume and form. His belief was that if the House meant to discharge its primary duty of controlling the Expenditure of the country, it would act in the sense of, and support the Motion of, the hon. Member for Swansea.

MR. LAING thought an unfair attack had been made on his right hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), because he said that, as Secretary to the Treasury, he had passed Votes in which he saw blots, but could not avoid passing them. When the House considered that a Secretary of the Treasury was a very subordinate official, that there were more than 200 Votes in the Civil Service Estimates, and that it was not a remarkable thing that out of such a number the opinion of the Secretary to the Treasury might be overruled by the Cabinet, they would see that it would be nonsense to expect the Secretary to the Treasury to think of resignation every time such divergence of view occurred, or to set him down as a pattern of insincerity in Liberal Governments. In the case of Alderney Harbour, for instance, when he (Mr. Laing) was Secretary to the Treasury, a great deal of money had been expended, or rather thrown away; but Lord Palmerston took a strong political view of the importance of Alderney to watch the French Establishment of Cherbourg, and it would have been of no use for him to oppose such an item against the opinion of the Prime Minister, backed by the dictum of the Duke of Wellington. He perfectly agreed that at present the House exercised no efficient control over the Estimates. That arose, not from the fault of the House, but from the nature of the case. The time had been when the Estimates had been criticized with much thoroughness. Mr. Hume, when in the House, devoted nearly his entire time to the object; but there were not then a fifth of the Votes there were now. It would be perfectly impossible for the House now to go over all the details of the Estimates. They had not the time. He could not, however, think that the appointment of a Select Committee on the Estimates generally would be sufficient to meet the evil complained of. It was true that a week-kneed Chancellor of the Exchequer might be able, by referring the matter to a Select Committee, to say "no" where he would otherwise have said "yes;" but this argument might also tell the other way, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer might say "yes" to a proposed increase of expenditure, trusting to the Committee to throw it out. Practically, the Estimates in these cases were very much the result of a compromise between the Treasury, fighting the battle of economy, and the other Departments which gained the popularity of expenditure. The control possessed by the House was very much what had been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London—namely this, that if the Expenditure got ahead, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and eventually the whole Government, lost popularity. This was in itself a great security. He thought the House of Commons might exercise a more efficient control over the Expenditure if it would abstain from looking too much into mere matters of detail, and look broadly at the whole Estimates. By taking upon themselves the work of subordinates, and criticizing details in a meddling, petty way, they lost sight of the broad facts on the face of the Estimates. They might take up the Civil Service Estimates, for instance, and if they found there had been in any one head an undue increase, and found large Votes for which they could see no sufficient reason, and of which Ministers could give no satisfactory explanation, they might properly send these to a Select Committee for investigation. In this way they would exercise a more efficient control than by appointing a Select Committee to go over the wages of all the post-runners throughout the Kingdom, or other such matters of detail. Special items of large amount might be with advantage referred to a Select Committee, but not the examination of the entire Estimates.

Mr. Newdegate

MR. RYLANDS: I shall only occupy a few minutes with reference to the points that I wish to bring under the notice of the House. My principal reason in rising is in consequence of the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). That speech has been received with evident approval on the other side of the House; but I venture to say that the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman proceeded from an entire misapprehension of the objects of having the Committee. It is a fundamental principle, in reference to this House, that we shall have no power of proposing increases in the Estimates. I think it is a most valuable regulation, and clearly, if a Committee were appointed, it would have no power or authority to represent to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that Estimates should be further increased. There is no question, on the part of the opponents to the Committee, or on the part of those in favour of it, that the Government is responsible for laying on the Table of the House those Estimates for the Public Business which they think necessary; and they are bound, on their own responsibility, to keep down the expenses as much as possible. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury admits that that is the duty of the Government, and that it is also the duty of the House of Commons to reduce, as far as possible, the Estimates. He said that the House cannot be too careful in sifting the Estimates. Well, the point we are now urging upon the House is this—we believe that, under the present system of Committee of Supply, there is not an opportunity of sifting the Estimates put before the House by the Government. We see—we may be mistaken, but I do not think we are—a strong reason for believing that if these Estimates prepared on the responsibility of the Government are subjected, before they are laid before a Committee of the Whole House, to a careful investigation by the Select Committee, we should be putting a very great check indeed on the expenditure of the different Departments, and be strengthening the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in resisting the pressure put on the Treasury by the different Departments of State. We are in the presence of a very large army—the permanent officials—whose influence is continually brought to bear on the Members of this House, on the public Press, and upon others, to induce a large expenditure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knows better than I do the influence which is constantly brought to bear on the Treasury to justify large expenditure in various directions. All we say is, this is an experiment. We ask for a Committee as an experiment, and if it will not act you may dismiss it in another year. But let me remind the House that we are not asking for an untried experiment. There have been cases where certain expenditure has been referred to Select Committees, and the Estimates so referred have come out with considerable reductions. That has been the experience on previous occasions. But I will not, at this moment, trouble the House with information which I think is important, and may, perhaps, be new to some of the hon. Members, though I may remind them that most of the civilized countries of the world have got Committees to which the Estimates are referred previous to being brought before the Legislature. France, Italy, Germany, Austria, Holland, and the United States have got them; and now, when we ask to have an experiment of this kind, which is adopted by nearly all foreign Legislatures, we are driven from it by what is very much in the nature of bugbears. I hope, however, that the House will support the experiment which has been proposed by the hon. Member for Swansea.

MR. MACARTNEY pointed out that the Committee would have to be a large one, and expressed a belief that if it were appointed the time of the House would be very much more wasted than it was at present.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought it would be admitted the question under discussion was one of the greatest importance. The difficulty of getting on with the Estimates, so as to make fair progress, had been increasing every Session. A variety of plans had been proposed from time to time to remedy that difficulty; but none of them had succeeded. Almost every foreign Legislature had adopted this system of referring to a Select Committee the task of going over the Estimates either before the commencement of the Session or during the Session. The reason was that those bodies had found it difficult to devote that amount of attention and consideration to the Estimates which they required. They had been told that there would be ample time for the consideration of the Estimates during the present Session; but he wished to tell the House what he thought about that. He believed if any set of Members in the House were to attempt the consideration and discussion of these Estimates fairly and profitably, that before the Session was over the Chancellor of Exchequer would bring forward a Motion for their imprisonment or expulsion. He did not see how the right hon. Gentleman would have any other resource, because if these Civil Service Estimates and the Army and Navy Estimates were fairly considered in the House, it would be quite impossible to obtain Votes for the supply of the nation during the period of six months which the House sat. This was a conclusion to which he had been forced to come after a most careful examination of the whole question. It had been said by some people, including the Secretary to the Treasury, who had let the cat out of the bag when he said—"Oh! if you submit these Estimates to a Select Committee you will have discussion in Committee of the Whole House increased." No doubt it would have that effect, and why? Because, by the labours of the Select Committee, the attention of the Committee of the Whole House would be directed to the necessary points of discussion, and in that way discussion would be increased. But after the first Session all that would disappear and these inequalities would be removed, and the recommendations of the Select Committee which were of value would be acceded to, and the necessity for discussing the Estimates would gradually disappear. Now, at present, they were in this position. Last Session the Estimates were brought forward at a very early period by the Government, and they were kept on the Notice Paper with very sufficient steadiness during the whole Session; in fact, he believed they had Estimates on the Paper once a week during nearly the whole of the Session. But before three months had elapsed, notwithstanding that the Notices of Motion did not prove a bar to the discussion of the Estimates in Committee, notwithstanding that in very nearly every instance when Supply was the first Order of the Day that the House got into Committee early—notwithstanding all this, before two or three months had elapsed the Chancellor of the Exchequer recognized his utter inability to get the Supplies for the nation voted, and the whole of the Parliamentary system broke down; and that was what he believed would occur again this Session, in spite of the proposals which had been made by the Government for the purpose of facilitating Public Business. They would have the attention of hon. Members directed in an exceptional way to the discussion of Estimates, especially on Monday, and Parliament would undertake what it was a physical impossibility for it to perform, and they would have continually occurring all that ill-temper and many of those unseemly exhibitions which they all so much regretted last Session; so that he would impress upon the Government that they ought to submit the Civil Service Estimates to the consideration of a Select Committee, the experience of foreign countries before them. Even if the Government believed their Estimates were as clear as the Secretary to the Treasury said they were, why should they not submit them to the examination of a Select Committee? It was all very well for the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), with that lofty demeanour which so became him, to contrast his position under the late Government; but he had frequently heard the hon. Baronet during last year say he could not defend certain Votes because he knew nothing about them. That was, of course, a necessary consequence of the system. It was impossible that one man could understand all the multifarious branches of these Estimates. They might depend upon it that either this year, next year, or, it might be, a good many years yet, the views of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) would impress themselves upon the House; and that, however unpalatable they might be at present to Her Majesty's Ministers, and the majority of those who would follow them into the Lobby, they would ultimately be recognized and acted upon, if this House was to continue its functions as supervisor of the Expenditure of the nation. Of course, they knew that Ministers and ex-Ministers would be opposed to any change, because they were well enough aware that the system of patronage was a most important portion of the Government of this country. What was it that made such a vast number of Members obedient to the Government and follow them? It was more or less the system of patronage which, either directly or indirectly, had permeated every branch of the Government, whether Army, Navy, or Civil Service, and, in fact, its influence extended to the Church. It further extended itself to the policy of the Government. Whether at home or abroad there was no Department, however minute, upon which patronage had not its effect. It was not reasonable to suppose, therefore, that Ministers would lightly give up a weapon which was of so much importance to them, and which they knew so well how to use.

MR. WALTER said, he hoped that one result of this discussion would be that hon. Members would see that it was their duty to attend more scrupulously than they had hitherto been in the habit of doing on the occasions when the Civil Service Estimates were being discussed in Committee of Supply. Having listened to this debate with attention, he had come to the good resolution of intending to give the right hon. Gentleman opposite as much trouble as he could whenever those Estimates were under consideration. As he understood the matter, what hon. Members really wanted was more definite information with regard to the vast mass of details relating to the Estimates than was afforded them by the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury. The difficulty would be largely met if a Report were formulated by the Treasury giving the information required and setting forth the reasons why hon. Members were called upon to vote the different items in the Estimates. At present, unless some hon. Member in pursuit of his particular hobby put questions to the Secretary to the Treasury, the House obtained no information whatever with regard to these items. They were asked to vote some £23,000,000 in respect of these Estimates, and of that sum probably about £20,000,000 would have to be voted without reduction; but he felt satisfied that a considerable reduction might be effected upon the remaining £3,000,000. To take one instance, a vast sum was wasted annually upon the printing of unnecessary Blue Books, some of which, two or three inches in thickness, and costing hundreds of pounds to print, contained nothing but a mass of undigested tabular matter. It was certain that £20,000 or £30,000 might be saved under this head alone every year, without any detriment to the service of the country; and no doubt similar savings might be effected under many other heads if the question were carefully examined into by a Select Committee. Whether or not it was advisable to interpose a permanent body between the Government and the House in reference to the Estimates might be a moot point; but he intended, on this occasion, to vote in favour of the hon. Member's Motion, in the hope that some improvement on the present system might result from the experiment he suggested being tried.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 158: Majority 63.—(Div. List, No. 14.)

PARLIAMENT — PUBLIC BUSINESS (HALF-PAST TWELVE RULE).

RESOLUTION.

MR. MOWBRAY rose to move the following Resolution:—

Mr. Walter

"That, except for a Money Bill, no Order of the Day or Notice of Motion be taken after half-past Twelve of the clock at night, with respect to which Order or Notice of Motion a Notice of Opposition or Amendment shall have been printed on the Notice Paper, or if such Notice of Motion shall only have been given the next previous day of sitting, and objection shall be taken when such Notice is called."

The right hon. Gentleman said, he should be very brief in proposing this Motion, as it was one which had met for several years with general approval. He moved the adoption of this Rule not from any Party feeling, but with a view to promote good order and the convenience of Members, and, indeed, the interest of the House generally. The Business taken after half-past 12 ought, he thought, to be Business on which they were all pretty well agreed, and which they could transact efficiently and in a way that would give satisfaction to the country. That Motion was originally proposed in the last Parliament, in 1872, by the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), then Leader of the House, and was unanimously adopted. It was brought forward the following year by no less an authority than Mr. Bouverie, and carried by a majority of 191 to 37. It had been adopted every Session during the existing Parliament, and in the last Division, when he had the honour of moving it in February, 1877, the votes were 185 for and 23 against it; therefore, they had had long experience that it had worked well. The hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) had an Amendment on the Paper which would prevent the Rule from applying to Bills which had passed the stage of Committee. Now, he proposed the Rule as it was originally proposed by the right hon. Member for Greenwich, and as the House had had experience of it during the seven years for which it had prevailed. It was true that in 1875 the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) induced the First Lord of the Treasury, then Leader of the House, to accept an Amendment to the same effect as that about to be moved by the hon. Member for Maidstone; but the House, after a trial of one year, went back in 1875 to the original form of the Resolution. In that shape he now proposed it, hoping that it would be agreed to and made a Standing Order of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, except for a Money Bill, no Order of the Day or Notice of Motion be taken after half-past Twelve of the clock at night, with respect to which Order or Notice of Motion a Notice of Opposition or Amendment shall have been printed on the Notice Paper, or if such Notice of Motion shall only have been given the next previous day of sitting, and objection shall be taken when such Notice is called."—(Mr. Mowbray.)

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK moved as an Amendment to the Resolution, in line 1, after the word "Bill," to insert the words "or a Bill which has passed through Committee of the whole House." The hon. Baronet said, that this had been the Rule in 1874, and, though the Proviso was dropped in 1875, no sufficient reason was given for the change. The noble Lord at the head of the Government then supported it, though he said he did not feel strongly about it. In 1874 the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) and the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) gave cases in which the Rule as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite had led to very unsatisfactory results, as hon. Members had been compelled to accept proposed changes under pain of losing their Bill altogether. He would not occupy the time of the House by quoting cases which were probably familiar to most hon. Members. He submitted, however, that when a Bill had passed through Committee it was hard that the House should have no opportunity of determining whether it should become law. Under these circumstances, the time spent by the House in getting the Bill through Committee might be all thrown away at the discretion of a single Member; and he proposed, therefore, that the Resolution should not apply to such Bills. He concluded by moving the Amendment.

MR. MUNDELLA seconded the Amendment. He was not opposed to the spirit of the original proposal; but he thought the Rule would work much more advantageously, and a considerable amount of now wasted time would be saved, if the provision contained in the Amendment were embodied in the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

In line 1, after the word "Bill," to insert the words "or a Bill which has passed through Committee of the whole House."—(Sir John Lubbock.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that the Resolution had been on previous occasions supported by Leaders of the House on both sides. It had worked well for many years; and he thought it had contributed not only to the health and comfort of individual Members, but to the real transaction of Business.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, the experience of the past week, when hon. Members had been kept there night after night until 2 and 3 in the morning, ought to strengthen the hands of the right hon. Gentleman who brought forward this Resolution. If an accidental circumstance had not deprived him of the opportunity, he had intended to move that the Rule should be amended so as to apply to all Business whatever at midnight.

MR. CHARLEY supported the Amendment.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he thought the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone could not have found a worse defender of the Amendment than the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley), for many persons thought that the latter hon. and learned Gentleman had passed through the House some Bills which had much better never have been passed at all. His vote on the Motion would depend on the course taken with regard to the next Resolution. If the Motion were made a Standing Order of the House, he should vote for it; but if the Rule were to be as hitherto—a Sessional Order—he should vote against the Amendment, because otherwise Bills might slip through, as, for instance, early in the Session, before the Rule was set up, which otherwise might have been stopped.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had never concealed his own opinion with regard to the half-past 12 o'clock Rule, of which he was not fond. He thought there was a good deal to be said for the Rule, and quite as much against it. It did not signify nearly so much what the Rules of the House were as in what spirit they were worked. If the Rule were worked in a proper and fair spirit, with a sincere desire to attain the objects its promoters had in view, it would be useful and valuable; but if, on the other hand, it was worked for the purpose of wasting a great deal of time over Business—which would be opposed only for the purpose of throwing something else over the limit of half-past 12—it would be not merely useless, but mischievous. He was fully conscious that the Rule met the wishes of the large majority of the House; and he thought it the duty of the Government in such a matter to yield to its wishes. If the House adhered to its former decision, it would be convenient to make the Rule a Standing Order, because there was no use in wasting time in discussing it every Session.

MR. DODSON said, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the House would be induced to pause before making the Rule a Standing Order. If the Rule was popular in this Parliament, that was no reason why they should make it binding on the next. It would be better to let it remain as a Sessional Order, and leave it to the next Parliament to decide whether they would adopt it or not. He was prepared to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maidstone.

MR. C. B. DENISON said, he did not think the argument of the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken was valid against adopting the Rule as a Standing Order. This Parliament might last longer than hon. Gentlemen seemed to suppose. He objected to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maidstone, because, if carried, there would be really only one occasion on which the Rule would operate, and that was the second reading, because, as a matter of courtesy, Members generally allowed a Bill to go into Committee.

MR. ANDERSON said, he was very much opposed to making the Rule a Standing Order in its present form; but if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maidstone were adopted, his objection would not be so strong.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 81: Majority 24.—(Div. List, No. 15.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, except for a Money Bill, no Order of the Day or Notice of Motion be taken after half-past Twelve of the clock at night, with respect to which Order or Notice of Motion a Notice of Opposition or Amendment shall have been printed on the Notice Paper, or if such Notice of Motion shall only have been given the next previous day of sitting, and objection shall be taken when such Notice is called.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. MOWBRAY moved that the Resolution be made a Standing Order of the House. Were that proposal accepted, there would be no need each year to waste time by repeated discussions as to whether the Rule should or should not be adopted. Those who had experience of the working of the Rule could tell the next Parliament how well it had worked.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Resolution be a Standing Order of the House."—(Mr. Mowbray.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON remarked that it had been pointed out that it would be competent for the next Parliament to repeal or adopt this Resolution. If in the next Parliament they had anything to say about this Rule, they would have to tell something about it not so pleasant as the right hon. Gentleman supposed. They would have to tell them that, in the opinion of the Speaker, this Rule, so far from shortening the Sittings of the House, had had the effect of prolonging them. It also put into the hands of any individual Member the power of obstructing a Bill which the House generally desired to pass. They would also have to inform them that it placed in the hands of any Members who wished deliberately to obstruct the Business of the House the most convenient engine they could use. Although he thought it was to be regretted that the Motion was made so late in the Parliament, he did not intend to offer any opposition to it.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK protested against the Resolution being made a Standing Order of the House.

MR. BIGGAR supported the Motion. He considered that Business could not be properly carried on after half-past 12 o'clock. Bills might be pushed on; but they were not maturely considered.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he voted for the Amendment of the hon. Baronet because he believed it modified a Rule to which he had a very strong objection. He had always stated in the House that he looked upon this half-past 12 o'clock Rule with considerable distrust. He believed the experience of the past few years proved that when they had no such Rules the House did not sit later than it did under the operation of this Rule. He quite admitted that the general feeling of the House was in favour of this Rule, and he was not prepared, any more than the noble Marquess, to vote in opposition to the general feeling of the House; but he desired to record his protest against stereotyping a Rule which, in his opinion, had not tended to facilitate the progress of Public Business.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE thought it a little curious that, after the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had led them to suppose that the Government would support the proposal, the only speech that had been made from the Treasury Bench had been one against it.

MR. HEYGATE, in reply to the statement of the hon. Member for Maidstone, that the House sat as many hours, in Sessions when the 12.30 Rule existed, as before, wished to point out that though the House might often be kept up to a late hour, and a few of its Members, including the officials and ex-officials, might not gain so much by the 12.30 Rule, yet to the bulk of the Members it was an enormous boon. The great majority of the House were enabled to see with certainty what measures could not come on, and to retire at a reasonable hour. Some of the Government officials would, no doubt, very gladly get rid of a Rule which was in their way; but which was, nevertheless, supported by the general feeling of independent Members. His belief was that hitherto it had certainly worked with advantage to the comfort and the health of every Member of the House, and that its continued action would equally be for the benefit of all concerned. No one could say that the Members of the House had not work enough to do. No one of common sense who had sat within the walls of that House 15 or 20 years could doubt the wisdom of the proposal, for they must know that before the Rule was enforced proceedings arose of which the House ought to be ashamed. A few nights ago, after the debate on the Irish Franchise Question, and a late division in a full House, he had sat up to watch the proceedings in the interregnum before the renewal of the Rule. What happened? Why, just as in old times—two Bills of private Members were urged on in a thin House and divided upon, when proper discussion was impossible, and newspaper reports of the proceedings were entirely absent. He had voted for both those Bills; but he felt it was a most unseemly procedure, and that such legislation was an absurdity, to say the least. Members should be exceedingly glad that there existed a Rule to put an end to such proceedings at an unreasonable hour of the night.

MR. DODSON strongly opposed the proposal. He would remind the hon. Gentleman, who had said that no one of common sense would oppose the Rule, that the Speaker had given evidence against it, and that a much humbler individual, but a former officer of the House, he (Mr. Dodson), had opposed it. The Return moved for by the hon. Member for Durham proved that it had no effect in diminishing the time of the Sittings; and he (Mr. Dodson) contended that it told against those who sought to promote legislation. As a challenge had been thrown down imputing want of common sense to those who opposed the Rule, he felt bound to answer that challenge, and to state that, in his opinion, it would be a mistake on the part of the House to make the Rule a Standing Order. It was in favour of those who wished to obstruct the Business of the House, and hon. Members sometimes prolonged debates on the first Motion in order to prevent the second from coming on.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, so far as the Government were concerned, he never looked on this as a Government question at all. He regarded it more as a matter for the convenience of the House. But his opinion was that as the House had pronounced its opinion in favour of the Rule, it was better that it should be made a Standing Order, so that hon. Members might have a clear arrangement from the beginning of the Session, and be saved discussions on the renewal of the Rule.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he believed he was the first person who mooted this question in the Committee on Public Business, and his appeal was immediately answered. The object was to thought new blood ought to be introduced, and that the principle of co-opting Members ought to be abandoned. They ought to encourage rising talent among the young Members, and at the same time have regard to the districts Members came from.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter after Nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 19th February, 1879.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—East India (Public Works), appointed and nominated; Parliamentary Reporting, re-appointed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Jurors' Remuneration * [81]; Licensing Boards (Scotland) (No. 2) * [82]; Assizes * [83].

Second Reading—Burial Law Amendment [10], debate adjourned.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

BURIAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(Mr. Balfour, Lord Francis Hervey, Mr. Wait.)

[BILL 10.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BALFOUR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the Resolution which had last year been brought forward on the subject by the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), and which was rejected by a small majority, had been commended by him to the favourable consideration of the House on the ground that the long-pending controversy respecting burials in churchyards ought to be closed. If the Resolution had stopped there, there was not, he felt assured, a single hon. Member on either side of the House who would dissent from it; for he believed there was among all religious and political parties but one desire—namely, that this controversy should come to an end. He believed the present Bill contained a plan by which that object might be effected.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy

So strongly was he of that opinion, that he had been induced to bring it forward in opposition to the wishes of many hon. Friends of his sitting around him, with whom in Church matters he generally concurred, and also against the wishes of the Government which he usually supported. Having made that remark, he thought it would be sufficient if he were to detail very shortly the main provisions of his Bill, the chief principle in which appeared to have been overlooked or misunderstood by many persons who had discussed it, and notably by a very influential newspaper in an article which it contained this morning. The main and central provision of the Bill had been put down by him on the Notice Paper as early as 1877, in the form of an Amendment upon the Motion of which the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had given Notice, but did not bring forward. He had again put it down last Session, and it was now embodied as a substantive proposition in the present Bill, which had been drafted by his noble Friend (Lord Francis Hervey). Roughly speaking, the Bill had been drawn to attain three objects. The first was to give relief to the Clergy of the Established Church, and the provisions relating to that part of the subject would be found chiefly in the last clause of the measure. Another object was the preservation of the endowments to their original purpose. It was the more necessary that he should say something in reference to this portion of the Bill, because Petitions had been circulated among Members of both Houses of Parliament, in which it was stated that his Bill interfered with the rights of property, by handing over property originally given to the Church to the Nonconformists. That was a peculiarly gratuitous assumption, because by the 10th clause of the Bill its provisions were not to apply in the case where gifts of land for the purposes of burial had been made to the Church within the last 50 years. Therefore, whatever else might be said against the Bill, it could not be contended that it unduly interfered with the wishes of Church donors. But, important as they were, these two points were subordinate. The third and main object he sought to attain would be found in the 6th clause and the 7th section of the 10th clause. These two clauses taken together embraced the real marrow of his measure. By those two portions of the Bill it was provided that every single Nonconformist throughout the country, wherever he might have lived and wherever he might die, should be buried in the churchyard with such religious services as his friends might approve, care being taken, at the same time, that this gift should be handed over to the Nonconformists without any violation of the principle under which Church property was held. He conceived that his Bill was the only one of the six before the House which would attain these two desired objects. He admitted that his measure might be described as a compromise, and that it could not, therefore, any more than other compromises, afford full satisfaction to everybody; but he claimed for it the merit that, while on the one hand it gave to the Dissenters all that they could reasonably ask, it did not take from the Church its property. The main grievance which the Nonconformists had, and of which they had made a most successful political use, was that, as the law stood, they might have to be buried with forms which they disapproved in their lifetime, and of which their surviving relatives also disapproved. That was undoubtedly a substantial and a real grievance. He would not stay to inquire how that grievance originally arose, but that it existed no one even on the side of the House on which he sat would be bold enough to deny, and as it did exist it was only fair that it should be removed. His Bill really did remove it. So much for the Nonconformists. Looking at the measure from the point of view of the Established Church, he might bring forward considerations of a somewhat similar character. The debates in that House on this subject showed that hon. Members who had voted against the Bill of the hon. and learned Member opposite regarded the measures he had introduced as intended to be a step towards Disestablishment. Whether that was the intention with which the hon. and learned Member had introduced his Bills it was not for him to inquire; but certainly those measures had the appearance of having been introduced with that object, and it was clear that the principle upon which those Bills were supported might be applied with equal force to the churches as well as to the churchyards. It appeared to him, and also to the noble Lord who was associated with him on this question, that no Churchman could assent to a principle which would lead to Disestablishment, and therefore they had constantly voted against the Bills introduced by the hon. and learned Member. By the present measure, however, that dangerous principle was altogether avoided, because the gift to the Nonconformists was in some cases only temporary, and in all cases conditional. If Nonconformists had an absolute right to the churchyards then his Bill was unjust, because it gave them no indefeasible right to the churchyards. For instance, the Nonconformists would have no right to be buried in the churchyards under the Bill if there was a cemetery within three miles of such churchyard; and whenever a cemetery was established within that distance the right of the Nonconformists to be buried in the churchyard would cease. The course of historical events had no doubt produced a grievance, and he suggested a method by which that grievance should be dealt with; but, in doing so, he did not in any sense hand over ecclesiastical property to Nonconformists. It was an abuse of language to characterize the provisions of his Bill as having that effect. He therefore thought he had shown, on the one side, that the legitimate Nonconformist grievance was done away with, and, on the other, he had shown Churchmen that they would not be giving up any principle on which their right to ecclesiastical property depended, and that nothing done by this Bill could be used hereafter as an argument in support of Disestablishment. Having thus stated the main principle of his measure, he had nothing more to do but to commend it earnestly to the attention of hon. Members on both sides of the House. To his Nonconformist Friends he would say that they had been accused, justly or unjustly, of inventing or manufacturing grievances for political purposes, and that they had been accused of using those grievances with great skill as weapons for attaining their object of Disestablishment. They had been accused of using one set of arguments when they wanted to get rid of the church rates, and of using another set of arguments of an entirely opposite character now they wanted to get a footing in the churchyards. This, therefore, was the time for them to show that those accusations were groundless, by voting in favour of his Bill. If the main principles of his measure were accepted by hon. Members opposite, it would show that the motives which had formerly actuated them were either misunderstood or had lost their force. Unless, however, he had been greatly misinformed, he was afraid that his Bill would meet with a much less serious opposition from hon. Members opposite than from his hon. Friends around him. He sincerely trusted that this would not be the case. The grievances under which the Nonconformists suffered were confined to a few persons in a limited number of rural parishes; but the anxiety under which Churchmen suffered in respect of this question must be felt by every member of the Established Church. There was great danger to the Church Establishment through the impolitic resistance of Churchmen, who ought to be even more anxious than hon. Members opposite for a settlement of this vexed question. He had been compared to a General who, instead of holding out a stubborn resistance to the enemy, retreated when defeat was imminent; but if a strategic parallel were to be drawn, he would rather say that he was like a General who declined to fight for an outpost, which could be maintained only by an overwhelming sacrifice, and which could not in any case be held for long. He had often been asked tauntingly by hon. Members whether he intended to conciliate political Nonconformists by this act of concession? He expected to do no such thing. It would be a very poor compliment indeed to the political Nonconformists, who sought the Disestablishment of the Church, to expect that they would be content with accepting a right to be buried in a few churchyards in satisfaction of their far wider claims. But while he had no hope of conciliating them, he did expect, by means of this concession, to remove from their hands one of the most efficient and formidable weapons against the Established Church which they possessed. This was a question which, of all others, should not be fought by Churchmen à l'outrance. In the first place, the subject was one that appeared to the people at large, who had naturally little acquaintance with the historical aspects of the controversy, to be one which affected the Clergy rather than the Laity, and the privileges of the Clergy rather than their duties. This fact alone made the question a difficult one to fight; but, in the next place, the whole attitude of the Church had about it a flavour of intolerance, although, in strict point of fact, the law was not intolerant, inasmuch as no pressure whatever was brought to bear upon a man to induce him to change his opinions. There, however, was undoubtedly something shocking to the feelings in compelling a man's relations to see a service performed over him after death to which he objected during his lifetime. If any demonstration of this fact was required, it would be found in the opinions entertained in Scotland and in Ireland, and in the divisions which had occurred on this subject in both Houses of Parliament. In Scotland and in Ireland, of course, the question was no doubt imperfectly understood; but people in those parts of the United Kingdom regarded the attitude which had been taken by the Church of England on this subject as the mere insanity of intolerance. The divisions in both Houses of Parliament showed the tendency of the feeling which was entertained on this question by the average Laity of this country. No one would pretend to say that if it was supposed that the passing of a measure of this kind was a mere stepping-stone to Disestablishment and to a sequestration of Church property, that the divisions in the two Houses would have been what they were. The tendency of the large class of floating opinion was decidedly in favour of the Church; but it was not wedded to it by an indissoluble tie, and if it once received such a shock as would send it over to the Nonconformists, the days of Church Establishment would be numbered. It was evident to the eyes of all who could understand the signs of the times that this concession to the Nonconformists could not be much longer delayed. That concession, however, might be made in several ways. If wrested from Churchmen against their will, it might become a stepping-stone towards Disestablishment; but if made with sufficient safeguards, it might become an additional bulwark against it. In this way it might either become favourable to Churchmen or to the political Nonconformists. It was now within the power of Churchmen—and who knew how long it might be within their power? but it was certainly within their power now—to accept the more favourable of these alternatives, and he earnestly prayed his hon. Friends around him to assist him in carrying it. He wished to impress upon them that in trying to keep all they risked all; and that, from too great a determination to retain the churchyards in their power, they were endangering the whole fabric of the Established Church. In conclusion, he begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. Balfour

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Balfour.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said: I have to thank my hon. Friend, to whose eloquence we have been listening, for having made what is as good a speech as a man could make for his case, and by no means a bad speech, too, on my side. I have also to thank my noble Friend (Lord Francis Hervey), who was the draftsman of the Bill. It is very well drafted, as we might reasonably expect. No man in this House is so competent to draft a Bill on this subject as my noble Friend; for, whatever else our churchyards may be, everyone must own that they are “ancient monuments.” I must also congratulate my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), and other hon. Gentlemen I see opposite, on having selected, or having had bestowed upon them, so admirable a fuggleman of their cause. My hon. and learned Friend has promised to vote for the second reading of this Bill, and the Liberation Society advertises in The Nonconformist its word of order to give a similar vote; and, accordingly, the Liberationists are voting in favour of the Bill of an hon. Gentleman who gets up and tells them, amidst cheers from this side of the House, that Dissenters have no claim to the churchyard, and similarly, and à fortiori, of course, no claim to the church. My hon. Friend, in the latter part of his speech, dwelt, in a very touching manner, upon the folly of our not giving up a part in the vain struggle to maintain the whole. That argument would be worth something if the something which he wants us to retain were worth anything. Our contention is that his Bill not only surrenders absolutely everything that is asked for by the other side, but surrenders that one thing also, which the French King is said to have boasted that he preserved—our honour—in the vain struggle. I put myself on the ground of my hon. Friend; and I assert that in endeavouring to retain the use, not of all but of a selected number of churchyards absolutely, and to acquire the power of ousting out of the remainder those who have got their foot into them by the action of this very measure, we surrender the principles which have made it our duty to contend for the maintenance of the existing system. My hon. Friend dwelt very strongly on his Bill only giving a temporary and incomplete user of the churchyards to the Nonconformists. Surely such a condition of matters would be intolerable! Either Dissenters must come in of right, and using, as they will do, the churchyards on an equal footing with everyone else as citizens, must retain their position permanently, or the present state of things must continue. I go thoroughly and entirely with hon. Members on the other side, and even with the Liberation Society, in condemning the injustice, the narrowness, the absence of logic, involved in grasping at a temporary advantage, and condescending to keep your own footing under those new and degrading conditions which are, as far as I can read this Bill, its most salient and flatulent elements. The Mover says that in his proposed provisions he has a great regard for property. Of course, he and I, like the Lincolnshire Farmer, have a great regard for property. But let the House consider in what difficulties this vain respect for property, grafted on a measure of regulated confiscation, would land us. Let us take the instance of two contiguous parishes, in one of which the churchyard was given 51 years ago, and in the other 49 years ago. To one of these my hon. Friend lets the Dissenter in, though only under his own proposed conditions, while he is to be ousted out of the other for ever. Can we suppose that such a provision can last for any time? Is it not a mere invitation to further agitation? What must come out of that 10th clause, which is propounded as the panacea for all existing troubles? Under it the Nonconformist is to be buried in one class of churchyards, but not all Nonconformists; only the Christian Nonconformist who has crystalized himself into a particular sect, which I deny that my hon. Friend has any right to force Nonconformists to do. We know there is such a thing as a Corporation sole, and I have never seen any reason why you should not have a Nonconformist Denomination sole made up of a single personage, or why two friends may not become a joint denomination, with an obligation on the survivor to bury the other with or without usages, and then to hand over a direction of burial for himself to his solicitor, who should officially inter his deceased and lamented client. My hon. Friend does not even allow the Nonconformist all round to be buried as he likes; he must be a member of a Christian sect, and have usages appropriate to that sect, which we know several sects have not got. Quakers have neither usages nor a distinct ministry. Your Nonconformist, he may not be a Christian, but belong to that influential and respectable denomination, whose distinctive peculiarity is that they hold a religion, not Christian, but anterior to Christianity. I must ask my hon. Friend why the Jews are quite shut out of all the good things of his Bill? Well, let the Jews answer for themselves. My hon. Friend knows a great deal, and he answers for the whole of the Clergy of the Church of England. He knows what their grievance is, and he knows how to settle it for them. He knows what the Jews would have, and the Secularists, too, I suppose; in short, he knows everything that everybody wants. He comes forward like Dr. Dulcamara, with his famous elixir, to make everybody young and well. I contend, however, that he proposes a remedy which is illusory and incomplete. He does not allow every Nonconformist to be buried with "usages," but only the one whose representatives can produce credentials—endorsed by whom I am utterly at a loss to conceive—that he was a Christian, leaving, however, the definition of "Christian" unexplained.

Supposing the state of things which he proposes ever to become an actuality, how long is it to last? The Nonconformist is in happy enjoyment of some churchyard in a pleasant county. He goes on burying in a "solemn and Christian" manner for 12 or 15 years, when suddenly some authority comes in to say that an anonymous benefactor has given an acre and a-half of land two miles and three-quarters off for the burial of Nonconformists. The next Dissenter who dies there is decently and quietly carried to that churchyard, in which the pre-deceased Dissenters have been buried for all those years; but the sexton stops the bier at the gate, and says—"Stop, gentlemen! A new cemetery has been provided under Mr. Balfour's Act. Take your body there." The executor will probably reply—"This is very hard; because some man, quite unknown to the place, and to whom that land is of no value, has chosen—perhaps to torment us—to give that barren corner, on which nothing but rushes have hitherto grown, therefore you are to drive us out of what we have been so long encouraged to look upon as our heritage." Does my hon. Friend seriously believe such a state of things would last? If we pass the second reading of this Bill, we simply pass the second reading of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan); so I, for my part, say if we are to be beaten, if we are to be ousted out of our own, let us fairly and honourably acknowledge that we are ousted out of our own—for the evasive attempt to parade ourselves as still holding something, while we have really lost the whole thing, is not respectable. That is what I mean, when I contend that we should lose all that the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire would strip us of, and our honour to boot, if we accept this Bill. If we are turned out of the churchyard absolutely and wholly, we know the worst. We are prepared for the worst; and as honest, consistent, and conscientious men, we are able still to fight the battle for the churches which are menaced by the policy, towards which the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire is only the first step. He will, of course, get up and say that it is very unfair in me to impute such motives to him; he has no such wish. I fully grant this; but I must add that my hon. and learned Friend is too sharp a man of the world not to observe what is going on around him. He knows too much of what is behind the scenes not to be very well aware how many of those who most loudly support his Bill only advocate it, as this afternoon they only are advocating the Bill of the hon. Member for Hertford—namely, as the first step to ulterior objects. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford may complain of being thought too halting, inconsistent, and grudging, in only giving one quarter of what is wanted, and that in the most ungracious way; but let him take this comfort to himself—the thorough-going Liberationist says the same of the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire. I shall shortly prove this; but first let me place fairly before the House the demurrer which I mean to raise to any Burial Bill at all, except of a particular class. For purposes of argument, I grant there was a grievance some dozen years ago—a considerable one possibly—so long as church rates were compulsory. Whatever may have been the motives of the Liberation Society, many persons who do not belong to that Society thought that however much the Church might lose in money and prestige, there was reasonable expectation of closing the controversy by depriving the church rates of their compulsory character. I myself was one who held that opinion, and was accordingly looked upon as a very weak-kneed brother, and very sharply taken to task by sundry friends of mine. The Dissenters complained that they were taxed against their consciences, and the whole question was reduced to chaos by the decision of the Courts of Law that the minority in any parish could not make a rate. I held, therefore, that in face of this conviction of a grievance, we were right to remove it. But that being done, you took your compensation; and, in so doing, you surrendered any claim to urge the national character of churchyards. You said—“Let those who approve of what goes on in the churchyards have the churchyards.” Having yielded that, we took a considerable burden on ourselves—no man has ever estimated how much it has cost Churchmen to surrender compulsory church rates; but we gave them up, and did so cheerfully; but not two years had passed over, after what ought to have been a settlement, and which was a most liberal compromise on our part, when you turned upon us and claimed to come in and use in your own way those churchyards, the whole expense of which you had thrown upon us. I see my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire is prepared to get up and remind me, as he has done more than once before, that in the first draft of his Bill he did propose to restore the churchyard rate. I grant that. He may also tell me he found in me an opponent of that proposal; but was I not right to fight against a new rate? Can there have been anything more unpopular? Would it have ever gone down? I felt that, however an offer of a churchyard rate might have been made with the utmost bona fides by my hon. Friend, it would not go down with the House and would not go down with the country. You accepted our gift; you were very grateful for it; and then you turn round upon us and say—“Having made us a present of this money, be kind enough now to let us come in and make use of what we compelled you to maintain out of your own pockets.” I believe the Mover, when he says they know very little about this question in Scotland or in Ireland. We well remember that although our majority was only 15 all round last year, the English Members—the people who are affected by and know something about it—who voted with us, gave an overwhelming majority of 101. My hon. Friend now comes forward and argues—“You had, no doubt, a majority of 101; but what business have people who know something about the matter to regulate it? I go to those who know nothing about it. I go to Scotland and Ireland. They live in pure and absolute ignorance of the English Burials Question; and, therefore, I call upon you to take the verdict of Scotland and Ireland.” My hon. Friend, I know, can appeal to the precedent of a famous politician of the last century. He knows that Wilkes said he would appeal to the nonsense of the country against its sense, and boasted that he would win by 10 to 1. My hon. Friend proclaims himself the Wilkes of the 19th century.

Mr. Beresford Hope

However, I affirm that there is a possible solution of the controversy. We are so accustomed to be pillaged, that really the operation has become—I will not say pleasant—but less acutely painful than it was. Having given up our churchyard rates, we must proceed to extend the cemetery principle over the country as far as we can. It is already the established rule at the centres of Liberation agitation in all our great towns such as London, Manchester, and Birmingham. It exists in those places where speechifiers and lecturers have declaimed most loudly—they are out of the wood—they have settled the matter, and got what they pretended at the outset to want. It is an easy and pleasant amusement for them, in the interest of their “three hundreds,” or “four hundreds,” or whatever the number may be, to claim relief from a grievance which does not touch them. The fire does not singe even a hair of their heads, and yet they scream as if they were in the flames. Well, I promised the House a little taste of the eloquence and arguments of the gentleman whose mouthpiece, my hon. Friend, with touching innocence, has become. There is Dr. Landels, an eminent preacher of the Gospel of Charity, on whose words, on successive Lord’s Days, Christians hang with becoming reverence. What is the message of Dr. Landels?—

“Do not conceal the fact that this (taking the ‘fortress,’ i.e., the ‘Church’) is our final aim, and that we cannot rest satisfied until that aim has been realized. Our clerical friends, in arguing against the Burials Bill, tell us, with refreshing simplicity, that if we get into the churchyards we shall want to get into the church next. What charming innocents they must be to put it thus! I think that if, by getting into the churches, they mean that we shall demand to have national property employed for national purposes, and not reserved for the exclusive use of a sect, why, then, of course, we mean to get the churches. And, what is more, if our right to the churches is as good as our right to the churchyards, we will succeed in getting what we demand.”

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford has virtually, though he does not say it, admitted their right to the churchyards; virtually, then, he must have admitted, according to Dr. Landels, their right to the churches. But there is another gentleman even more eminent than Dr. Landels—Mr. Dale, of Birmingham—and what says Mr. Dale?—

“Nonconformists had not concealed what their real intentions were. What they were going in for was complete religious equality in life as well as in death, and as they asserted the graveyards belonged to the parish, so they asserted that the church belonged to the parish. They did not intend to disguise how far their principles carried them.”

Mr. Beresford Hope

Here is my hon. Friend, who kindly helps them with the invitation—“Come, my friends, allow me to drive you a mile or two.” Indeed, my hon. Friend’s Bill itself starts under very favourable auspices. There is Mr. Carvell Williams, a gentleman of considerable eminence in the Liberation Society, of which he is, or was, the secretary. This gentleman published, two years ago, a pamphlet on The Present Position of the Burials Question; and after observing the Notice of my hon. Friend’s Bill, he has gratified the world by bringing out a second edition, continued down to the present time. His estimate of this Bill, the second reading of which he and his Society advocate, is as follows:—

“The practical objections to the proposed limitations are as strong as the legal objections. For is it likely that the public would long tolerate the co-existence of two descriptions of churchyards—namely, those in which the ancient restrictions were abolished, and others in which they existed in full force? Would not a second agitation, to secure what the first had failed to accomplish, be inevitable? And would it not be certain to succeed?”

Certainly, and in my hon. Friend’s lifetime. But there is an influential Dissenting paper—The Nonconformist—and what says this organ about the Bill of my hon. Friend? On the 11th of December, while the Bill was still in its fresh and salad days, The Nonconformist said—

“There is, perhaps, some advantage in the fact that this time the debate will be initiated by a Tory—especially by one who goes so far in Mr. Morgan’s direction as Mr. Balfour unquestionably does; because, while he must of necessity rest his case to some extent on the same facts as those adduced by the Member for Denbighshire, his principal aim must be to convince Churchmen and Conservatives of the practical wisdom of making timely concessions rather than wait for a complete, as well as an inevitable, defeat.”

I think there is considerable practical wisdom in that, so I read it for the edification of my hon. Friend. I resume my extract—

“His motives may differ from Mr. Morgan’s, but he will practically be his ally, though an ally who cannot yet screw his courage up to the full measure of Mr. Morgan’s demand.”

Just as the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire cannot yet, I believe, screw his courage up to the full demand of the Liberation Society. That article appeared in December; and on February the 12th, The Nonconformist returns to the charge, in anticipation of this debate, and says of this Bill that—

“With all its defects, it unquestionably destroys the clerical monopoly, by allowing other than Church of England burial rites in churchyards, and also allowing other persons than its Clergy to officiate. Obviously, therefore, the measure is not one to be met by indiscriminate opposition; more especially as the restrictive provisions which make the measure, as it stands, inadequate and inconsistent, are such as can be modified with great facility.”

Now I must call the attention of the House to another phase of the matter. I supposed, with all our dissensions, that there was one point upon which all right-thinking men, whether Christians or non-Christians, Churchmen or Dissenters, Conservatives or Liberals, were more than agreed:—That whenever, with general consent, a painfully-crowded churchyard can be closed, and whenever the piteous spectacle of ragged grave-heaps, where, if disturbed, the mouldering remains of former generations are turned up by the sexton's spade, can be removed, it should be done; and with it the dangers to the public health of corruption tainting the air and the water-springs. I believed it was agreed that when a well-kept cemetery could be supplied instead, it was a good thing, not only for the Church but for the State, and for the health and happiness of everyone. I fancied a general conviction, whether openly formulated or not, that the development of cemeteries was a practical solution of the question. I have never concealed that I looked upon the development to terminate the strife, as the only possible, I will not say compromise, but as the only possible, reasonable, and workable solution of this question. I thought, at last, we had come to unanimity upon that one point. I could not have believed that ingenuity could have been carried so far as to make the extension of cemeteries a battle-field between Churchmen and Dissenters, or that any legislator could have conceived a scheme which would have made it to the interest of the Liberation Society to put a check upon the provision of cemeteries. I should have laughed at the suggestion that the maintenance of our crowded churchyards, with typhus haunting their purlieus and poisoned water distilling out of the soil, could have been connected with a political advantage. But now I have lived to see that in the Bill of my hon. Friend. The vice of his Bill is that it is built upon the principle of revocable concession, as to which, I tell hon. Members on both sides of the House, that revocable concession is the one thing impossible in politics. Whatever one may think of special applications, we all know that the principle of modern legislation is that when a thing is settled you must accept it and make the best of it. That is the understanding upon which Constitutional liberty, the Parliamentary system, and Government by Party are possible in this land, because all sides have accepted that fundamental agreement. We see abroad the evils which have flowed from the imperfect and inconsistent acceptance of it, even in lands constitutionally governed. Well, but if this impolitic and impossible principle of revocable concession ever was embodied in any measure it is embodied in the Bill of my hon. Friend. I had to touch upon that point a few minutes since. I touch upon it again. I pointed out what would be the position in a parish in which the Church had been beaten, as it would be if the Bill passed, and accepted its beating, and in which Nonconformists had practically used the churchyard. There might come in the personal donor, with his cemetery at a little distance, and all the ill-blood and disunion and controversy would begin again. That is the practical result that we should get from the principle of revocable concession, which is the backbone of this Bill. I invite the House to consider what must the upshot be. To make the development of cemeteries a Liberation grievance, to put crowded churchyards now and Disestablishment hereafter against the Church of England, and cemeteries open to all. What a preposterous conclusion to bring matters to!—and not less mischievous than preposterous. Does not this consideration demonstrate, with a certainty absolutely mathematical, that this Bill of my hon. Friend is as a settlement of the matter illusory, and that the only possible satisfaction which any person can anticipate from it is the conclusion which the Liberationists will surely reach—that if it passes, half, at least, of the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire—and that the worst part—will have passed;

while as to that which it preserves, it overlaps even that with such fantastical and irritating restrictions, as only to make the future passing infinitely more certain. On that account, I do not blame my hon. and learned Friend for announcing that he intends to vote for the second reading. I should consider him and his Friends very much wanting in the first elements of political tactics, if they did not do so. The only thing I might blame him for was proclaiming his vote beforehand. It was candid and magnanimous; but if he and his Friends had only kept their counsels in the dark, some Conservatives on this side—some “innocents,” as Dr. Landels calls us—might have voted with my hon. Friend, and swollen his followers. For its part, the other side might have adopted the strategy recommended in the columns of a newspaper called The Liberator—

“The citadel of the Establishment must be approached by mines, such as the Press and the Post Office afford; and in view of a General Election, it is the conviction of the electors you must win over.”

I do not venture to guess when there may be a General Election; but whether it is to be this year or next, it is clear that the mighty shadow of “bunkum” is throwing its gloom over our deliberations, and people are talking with a view to what can only now be figuratively called the hustings. So I pardon my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford for giving expression to his political opinions, and having very proper regard and respect for the account he must one day render. But then, I put it to him, has he done what he wanted? Does he think his Bill a success? Is he proud of himself for the performance? Whom has he got to cheer him on his way? What Bishop, or Dean, or Archdeacon, or rural Dean; what Rector, Vicar, Curate, or Workhouse Chaplain, has he ever found to come forward and say—“Ave Liberator?” So far as one can tell, Church opinion has said—“This Bill won’t do. It gives up what we think very precious, and it gives nothing in return.” And when we turn to the other side, what do they say? They say, perhaps—“This is a very kind and scholarly offer of an accomplished gentleman, who proposes what he thinks will gratify us and meet all our grievances; while he says himself that he has drafted it in intentional contradiction of the claim which underlies our special case.” My hon. Friend, acknowledging that he is legislating for a presumed grievance, brings his proposal before the House with much eloquence, in a speech in which he tells self-chosen clients—“You are an unreasonable set of agitators, asking what you have no right to ask. I do not mean to give you what you ask; but I mean to give you something that is so like what you ask for, that although it is not what you ask for, and although you know, and we know, too, that it is not so, yet it will help us to say we have met your demands, and perplex you to show that we have not; while we shall be free to denounce you for being so unreasonable as not to be contented with our thoroughly illusory offer.” Some people may think that a statesman-like offer; but it can be only such if it is successful, if it goes down, if it takes anyone in—that is not a Parliamentary phrase, so I will say instead—if it carries conviction to the mind of anyone on either side of the House. If it does not carry conviction; if it is seen through as soon as it is propounded, then the sooner he drops it the better, for he will not settle the matter. My hon. Friend must not think I do not thoroughly and entirely believe in his absolute and perfect sincerity. I do so. It is my conviction of his sincerity that compels me to go into the subject with greater fulness than I might otherwise have done in trying to make him and my noble Friend below him see the matter as I believe it is seen by the great majority on this side of the House, and seen, as I am perfectly convinced, by the entire body of Members opposite, and by the entire body both of those who only wish to carry the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire pure and simple, and to stop there, and of those whose policy is merely to use his Burials Bill as a stepping-stone to that so-called religious equality which the Liberation Society and the whole body of political Dissenters, so-called, through the country, proclaim to be their ultimate aim.

My hon. Friend will possibly urge that all Dissenters are not political Dissenters. I agree with him, and I believe there are many amongst the Nonconformist body who are not political Dissenters. I respect those who, while they cling to the dogmas which approve themselves to their consciences, and while they desire to worship God in the forms which move their spiritual nature, yet do not look on religion as the handmaid of politics, but desire to live in peace with their fellow-citizens, the Churchmen, in the full conviction that those fellow-citizens are equally desirous of being at peace with them. But why do they keep themselves in hiding? There was a time when the shining and conspicuous lights of Nonconformity were venerable men like Watts, Doddridge, Wesley, and other great names of the last century. They were not political but religious Nonconformists. But where can we find such as they were now? We are not to blame if we are driven to interpret the silence of unpolitical Nonconformists as something like an admission of failure, and a virtual surrender to the more violent members of the partnership. They let the Liberation Society speak for them. Dissenting literature speaks for them in the speeches of Dr. Landels and Mr. Dale, the articles of their favourite newspapers, the leaflets of the Liberation Society, and the words of Mr. Spurgeon, when he brags that—

Mr. Beresford Hope

“To ravine like a wolf, and to plunder like a freebooter, has been the peculiar prerogative of the Church of England.”

Yet who bears so distinguished a name in the Dissenting ministry as Mr. Spurgeon? Who is more looked up to as a pastor of souls by those who hang on his ministry? The Christian charity of such a sentiment we must all admire! But I wonder what Mr. Spurgeon would say, if an equally pious and equally distinguished preacher of our Church were to use the language of Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Landels with regard to the sects to which they belong. The non-political Nonconformists have abdicated their position, and they now hold their tongue. They may have been convinced by more vehement polemics. They may be simply cowed and scared. They may be afraid of social excommunication, which people quite as much dread now as they formerly quailed before ecclesiastical censure. They may not dare to come forward, or to appear as black sheep among the “true blue” believing Christians. But we tell them—“So long as that is the case, we must measure you by your own measure, and pay you the compliment of thinking that you believe in the sincerity of your own chosen leaders’ uncontradicted denunciations.” If, however, you wish the Burials Question to be peacefully settled in any way at all, you must let me tell you to repudiate the Liberation Society and all its works. Do not revel in its vehement assertions, its flatulent platitudes, its burly denunciations. You must not mislead and trifle with us by parading statistics such as those which you have been parading lately, when you struggle to prove that there are 19,000 or 20,000 Dissenting places of worship in the country, when you know as well as we do that the places of worship which show any guarantee of fixity, by being licensed for marriage, only number 8,200, and that amongst the remainder that go to make up your alleged 19,000, you have I do not know how many railway arches, several harmonic halls, various rooms in cottages, the Agricultural Hall, and the Holborn Circus. All these places are licensed for Nonconformist worship, and help to swell up the statistics upon which you rely in order to discredit the visible proofs of the Church’s growth in influence, popularity, and visible resources.

Now, then, as to the last clause about the clerical grievance. I wish to ask my hon. Friend whether—good as his intentions are—he acts wisely by trying to meet a grievance of the Church of England in such questionable company as the remainder of his Bill? Supposing you were to bring that clause in by itself, it would be acceptable on its own merits, and, at any rate, it could be discussed on independent grounds; but the Mover only prejudices the question by confounding it with others of so different a complexion, and making it necessary for us to reject it when it is brought in as the comet’s tail of this rocket. Its fate must be the usual fate of whatever is left of a rocket when the illumination is over. And, thereby, what does he do? He only renders a possible remedy for the clergy more impossible by coming forward unasked, and not only without tangible support, but with most tangible opposition as to his main intentions from those whose mouth-piece he wishes to make himself.

I have spoken at length; but we have heard so much of this as the burning question of the day, and as really the one matter which divides Parties, that I felt I could not do adequate justice to it without trying to present an analysis in various aspects of what is certainly a very important and a very tangled controversy. I most heartily acknowledge all that earnest and devoted Churchmen owe to anyone who proposes remedies in the belief that he will restore peace to the Church and contentment to men's minds; but I think, Sir, that I have proved that all which my hon. Friend proposes, when brought together, is inharmonious and impossible; that his concessions are not only the precise concessions which we think it would be most mischievous to make, and that they are not only difficult to make without leading to other concessions still more mischievous, but in themselves over-weighted by fantastical and irritating limitations. But, Sir, I wish particularly to press upon the House that if my hon. Friend did succeed in carrying his Bill, if it could pass through its stages and receive the Royal Assent this week, yet people's feelings would be much more bitter and the matter would be in a much more hopeless state than now. The other side would, of course, only take the Bill as a stepping-stone, and would at once agitate to get rid of its restrictions, and we should be angry with the other side for doing so. That would naturally lead to a much worse fever of irritation and recrimination, to a much more hopeless antagonism—tending, perhaps, to the downfall of the Established Church—and therefore, as we believe, to the heavy detriment of spiritual religion. It is for these reasons that I move that the Bill of my hon. Friend be read a second time this day six months.

MR. MARTEN seconded the Amendment. The Bill had been, he said, recommended to the House by the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour) on the ground that it was a compromise. In a compromise, however, there must be two parties, and it was therefore well that the House should know in what spirit the other party with whom the compromise was to be made accepted the proposal. They were, no doubt, willing that the Bill should be read a second time, with avowed intent of assimilating it in Committee to the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan); and accordingly that hon. and learned Gentleman himself had, with his usual frankness, placed upon the Paper Notice of his intention of moving, when the Bill reached that stage, the omission of those very safeguards which the hon. Member for Hertford relied on when recommending it to the acceptance of his political Friends. The hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire proposed, for example, to omit entirely the 10th clause, which provided for the protection of churchyards which had been dedicated within 50 years of the passing of the Act, or where there was a cemetery within three miles. If the Bill was intended as a compromise, how was it being accepted? Instead of being accepted in the conciliatory spirit in which it was made, it was entirely repudiated, and the principal safeguard was to be rejected. Again, the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire proposed that, instead of saying that the burial service should be a religious service or ceremony agreeable to the usages of the religious society of which the deceased person was a member, it should simply be conducted in a "decent and orderly" manner. It was quite consistent with that that there should be an address delivered at the open grave by some person professing atheistical opinions, and who declared under the shadow of the Church that he did not believe in a God, and had no faith in any religious service whatsoever. It was evident, therefore, that his hon. Friend's attempt at a compromise had failed, so far as the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire was concerned. In the second part of his remarks his hon. Friend had confessed that one of his chief objects was to take out of the hands of the Nonconformists their strongest weapon for the Disestablishment of the Church. But the Bill would fail of silencing the political Dissenters. On the contrary, they were promised a further agitation. The object of the Liberation Society was to proceed by steps, and if all the concessions asked by the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire were granted, the opponents of the Church would accept their new position not as a settlement, but only as a step for further advance. Therefore, on the two principal grounds on which the proposal was recommended—namely, compromise and the disarmament of the foes of the Established Church—the Bill would clearly prove to be a failure. In the next place, the Bill contained provisions which were open to very serious objection. At present, Nonconformists had as much legal right as Churchmen to burial in churchyards. If it was said that this Bill gave no more rights than now existed, he denied that assertion. The 5th clause contained a positive declaration of the right of burial. That clause was most pernicious. Either the law as at present ascertained in regard to the right of burial was satisfactory or it was not. If it was satisfactory, that declaration was superfluous. If it was not satisfactory, let them have a measure fairly defining that right. But this Bill contained a declaration which was unnecessary unless it was intended to make some serious change in the law; and if such a change was to be made, its exact nature ought to be clearly stated and fully explained. It was urged in favour of the Bill that it was a stopgap, providing for the use by Nonconformists, with their own services, of churchyards until such time as cemeteries should be established. But, looking at the measure as one of a provisional nature, it was open to objection, because it dealt with important principles which must be of a permanent character. Mere stopgap legislation should interfere as little as possible with the feelings of large bodies of the people. But the great objection to the Bill was that it would seriously check and discourage that most beneficial improvement which had been going on for many years past in this country—namely, the general introduction of cemeteries. Throughout the Kingdom the existing churchyards were in many cases over-full, and in the majority of cases were a danger to the villages in which they were situated. The time had come when they should re-affirm, on sanitary grounds, the old maxim of the Twelve Tables, that sepulture should take place away from human habitations. There could, moreover, be nothing more repulsive to every right feeling than that people should go to the House of God surrounded by all the foul and decaying elements of humanity. They ought to insist on that being done for the rural districts which had been already done for the towns, and that the dead should not be buried in such a way as to endanger the health of the living. If Dissenters encouraged the formation of cemeteries, they would be pursuing a course in accordance with their own principles, and they would all be returning to the practice of the primitive Church. In the first seven centuries of the Christian era the places of burial were situated at a distance from the churches, and churchyards were introduced when superstition crept into the Church in connection with the practices of the priests, who prayed for the dead. He, therefore, now advocated a return to the early Christian usage. During the past 23 years the establishment of cemeteries in the country had proceeded much faster than the public generally supposed. From 1853 to 1875, in London alone, there were closed, either wholly or partially, 208 consecrated and 92 unconsecrated burial-grounds; and in the country, from 1854 to 1875, there were closed, either wholly or partially, 1,705 consecrated burial-places, and 1,143 unconsecrated burial-places. The result was that in London and the country together there were closed, either wholly or partially, in 23 years, 1,913 consecrated and 1,235 unconsecrated burial-places, making a total of 3,148. All these were dealt with by Orders in Council, and were practically closed; for, as explained by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Assheton Cross) in this House in 1876, the meaning of the term “partially closed” was, as a rule, that the closing was complete, subject to a reservation in favour of certain vaults. In the same period, on the other hand, between 600 and 700 cemeteries had been opened. These were available for 14,000,000 of the population of England and Wales, out of a total population of 22,000,000. The rural population amounted to about 13,000,000, and even if the whole of the 8,000,000 still unprovided for were in the rural districts, still 5,000,000, or one-third of the total rural population, had already cemeteries provided. Looking at what had already been done, it could not be regarded as a work either of great difficulty or requiring any great length of time to make provision for the remainder. Thus, by a great sanitary reform, they would be entirely relieved of that vexed religious question. He contended, therefore, that that should be treated wholly as a sanitary question.

Mr. Beresford Hope

It was said that the Nonconformists had a strong feeling upon this matter; but it should be remembered that Churchmen also had strong feelings, which were equally worthy of respect. With regard to the provision of cemeteries, he desired to say a few words on one point—namely, the necessity of consecration. Some time ago he had published a letter on the subject, in consequence of which many clergymen had written to him to say that in their opinion the consecration by the Bishop of the churchyard was not necessary. The Bishop of Ely, in a Charge delivered in 1877 in reference to that subject, had expressed the same view, and stated that he conceived it was undesirable to perpetuate the custom of dividing a cemetery into consecrated and unconsecrated parts. A strong preference was often shown, even among Nonconformists, for interment in consecrated ground; and if in particular districts there was a desire felt to have one portion of a cemetery consecrated and another unconsecrated, that desire might be gratified. But it was important to know on so high an authority as the Prelate to whom he had alluded that it was not ecclesiastically necessary that the ground should be severed into consecrated and unconsecrated parts; but that the cemetery of the future, if desired, should be appropriated by law to purposes of burial, and should not require any other or more formal service of consecration. That would greatly diminish the expense of providing cemeteries. It had also been said that it was unnecessary to have two chapels, or any chapel at all; and if that view were adopted nothing would be required for the cemetery but some building as a means of shelter. He had had calculations made as to the expense of establishing cemeteries, and they showed that it would be of a trifling character. A gentleman of great experience had calculated the expense of establishing 30 cemeteries in the sanitary district of South Molton, Devonshire, from which it appeared that the purchase of the land and the erection of mortuary chapels would involve the expenditure of a sum which, borrowed at the usual rate for 30 years, would on the rateable value amount to rather less than 1*d.* in the pound. No doubt, donations of land would be given in many instances for cemeteries, and the present churchyards might advantageously be converted into church gardens under proper conditions. In conclusion, he should regard the adoption of that Bill as a retrograde step; for, so far from promoting the welfare of the people at large, it would give a great discouragement to a beneficent sanitary reform, now in progress, and would also pave the way not for future religious peace, but for permanent and most serious religious strife.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR CHARLES FORSTER: Sir, I am not going to trespass on the House for more than a few minutes; but as reference has been made to the liberality of the Scotch Church as to burials, I wish to give an instance of it which will powerfully appeal to the feelings of those hon. Members who sat, as I did for many Sessions, with the late Lord Marjoribanks, better known as David Robertson, the genial and popular Member for Berwickshire. When I visited him some time back at his hospitable abode at Ladykirk, I was shown the parish church, rich in ancestral monuments and memorials of Flodden Field. There, not in the churchyard, but in what before the change of religion was the altar chancel, the vault of the Robertson family was situated. There, Sir, some few years afterwards, the honoured remains of our lamented friend were gathered to his kindred dust, the service being conducted in the old Scotch kirk according to the Episcopalian rites, and the words of interment pronounced by his own Episcopalian minister. Why will not English Churchmen take an example from Scotch Presbyterians in this respect, by throwing open their burial-grounds to their Dissenting brethren? Talk of additional cemeteries, silent burials, or approved selected services as fitting solutions of the question! Surely the true solution is to be found in the combination of common sense with the slightest tincture of Christian charity. It cannot be too distinctly known that none of these miserable makeshifts can be accepted. We ask you to recognize the ancient common law right of every parishioner to sepulchre in the parochial burial-ground, and to allow the exercise of that rite on terms of perfect religious equality. But in truth, Sir, our opponents know, especially after what has happened in "another place," how untenable is their position, and if the citadel of bigotry and intolerance has not ~~fully~~ surrendered, the defenders have at least begun to capitulate. It was an instance of judicial blindness on the part of the Government that they did not avail themselves of the Amendment carried in the House of Lords to settle the question. Another opportunity has been now offered to them in the Bill of the hon. Member for Hertford, who makes his proposal in the interest of the Church. It is not for me to give advice to hon. Gentlemen opposite; but I should have thought the commonest dictates of prudence would have induced them to remove this stumbling-block from their path before the next General Election. But, Sir, before sitting down, I desire to put it to Churchmen whether, when they see the gathering clouds and the danger, not only from within but from without, whether, under these circumstances, it is wise and prudent to aggravate the perils of the position by refusing such an equitable proposition as that contained in the Motion of my hon. Friend? If such Motions are obstinately resisted year after year, with all the strength of Party organization, it requires no great prescience to foretel that on the next turn of the political wheel the force of the ascending Party will naturally be directed against an institution identified with so much injustice, and the days of the Establishment are numbered.

Mr. Marten

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON believed he had had as good opportunities as any Member of that House for ascertaining the opinions of Churchmen on this Burials Question. He had attended many Diocesan Conferences at which the almost unanimously expressed opinion was adverse to a Bill like that of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) or that of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour). Although the latter hon. Gentleman claimed to act on behalf of the Church of England, he believed the majority of the Clergy did not share the hon. Member's views. Churchmen in general had no desire whatever to enter into a compromise such as the hon. Member proposed. Indeed, their experience of giving up points was not of a kind to induce them to make further concessions. When the church rates were abolished, it was said that the last shred of intolerance was done away with; but within a few years an agitation had commenced for obtaining possession of the churchyards. In his judgment, the present Bill attacked the property of the Church of England in a very serious way. No doubt his hon. Friend was sincere in disclaiming such an intention; but his measure was more in accordance with the views of the Liberation Society than those of an ardent supporter of the Church. For his part, he should like to know whether any hon. Member connected with that Society was prepared to get up and express his concurrence in the statement, made by its lecturers, that the property of the Church was the property of the nation, and that, therefore, it ought to be in the hands of all sects indiscriminately. If any claim of that kind was to be made in the House it should be presented distinctly and boldly, when it could be answered. How, he asked, did the Liberationists get over the Preambles of the Statutes of Edward III. and Henry VIII., which clearly affirmed that the property of the Church was given for the benefit of the Church, not by the State, but by private individuals? It was true that the hon. Member for Hertford did not go so far as the Liberation Society, which said that the churchyard ought to be vested in the general ratepayers of a parish. The claim of the Liberationists applied not only to the churchyards, but also to the churches themselves, which they alleged were the property of the nation. The Bill of the hon. Member for Hertford went too far for hon. Members on the Government side of the House and not far enough for hon. Members on the other, and for that reason it ought to be rejected. The supporters of the measure were those who wished to go further than the hon. Member. He maintained that the Amendments proposed to the present Bill would render it identical with that of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire, and if that Bill became law the Church of England would be the only religious body which could not hold land for its own purposes. This was not so much a clerical question as it had been said, but a question especially of interest to laymen, because it affected not only corporate but individual property. He denied that the Nonconformists had any grievance in this matter, many of them had not the slightest objection to burial in the churchyard with the Service of the English Church. He knew of the case of a minister of an Independent congregation in his neighbourhood who preferred being buried by the clergyman of the Church of England in the parish churchyard, rather than in the neighbourhood of his own chapel. The real grievance arose from a sense of irritation on the part of the Dissenting minister, who, feeling his social inferiority to the clergyman in regard to holding the Burial Service, was now agitating for a position not merely equal to, but superior to, that occupied by the clergyman. Not for a moment did he contend that this Burials Question was in a perfectly satisfactory state. The circumstance of there being six Bills before the House proved that the reverse was the case. He thought, however, that this discussion was not likely to lead to legislation at the present time. Still, there was now a favourable opportunity of discussing the whole subject, and possibly suggestions might be made of which the Government could take advantage. He did not think this was a matter to be taken up by private Members; and although he had a little Bill of his own on the subject, he intended to press it forward only in the just possible event of the hon. Member for Hertford's Bill passing. At the same time, he was decidedly of opinion that it would be better for the Government to take the matter up. It was impossible to satisfy the political Dissenters; but he should, nevertheless, be glad if something could be done to remove anything like a real grievance on this subject. At any rate, he was sure of this—that whenever legislation took place it would be necessary to study the position of the Clergy of the Church of England, and to see that they were not unfairly treated. They certainly ought to be relieved from the obligation of reading the Burial Service in certain cases. Hon. Members on that side of the House would not be justified in voting for this Bill, which the hon. Member for Hertford had brought forward, no doubt with the best intentions, but the consequences of which he could not foresee. The noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition had recently made a speech at Liverpool, in which he stated that the Liberal Party were pledged to religious equality, and to remove the inequalities of the laws that affected burials. Those inequalities he described as an injustice, a grievance, and a social stigma. That was a grave charge; but, as far as injustice went, there would be a far greater injustice in confiscating the property given by Churchmen for Church purposes than in anything now suffered by the Nonconformists. With regard to the social stigma, if it were a grievance at all, it was hard to see how it could be removed without giving Dissenting ministers the right to officiate in the churches as well as in the churchyards. Moderate as might be the views of the noble Lord as expressed at Liverpool, there was good reason to believe that what Members below the Gangway thought to-day the Leaders above the Gangway thought to-morrow. They were therefore bound, as prudent men, to see in what direction they were going. The noble Marquess did not look with favour at present on the Disestablishment of the Church of England; but in the speech which he delivered last year at Glasgow the noble Lord went a great deal further, for he said in reference to the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland—

“ When the time comes, as I have said it may come, that Scotch opinion shall be fully formed on the subject, the Liberal Party in England will do its best to give effect to that Scotch opinion without undue consideration being given to other circumstances connected with the question.”

He would ask the noble Lord to apply the same argument to this question. The English Members of the House had repeatedly, by large majorities, expressed their opinion that these Burials Bills ought not to be carried, and he submitted that the opinion of the English Members ought to be respected in questions of this kind, in which English Members—and especially the rural districts—alone were interested. As had been pointed out, there was a strong case for the extension of cemeteries, when future requirements were taken into consideration. He thought that where there were any number of Nonconformists the landowners in such districts would be glad to give land for the burial of Nonconformists. He believed that if a short Bill were passed facilitating the formation of parochial cemeteries in rural districts, the bond fide grievances of Baptists, who wished to have rites performed by their own ministers, would die away in the course of a few years. The churchyards belonged to the Church of England, and could not be taken away from it without confiscation. The real grievance on this question, so far as conscientious Nonconformists were concerned, was infinitesimally small, and did not affect one-tenth of the Dissenters of this country. In his opinion, the proper remedy for the present vexed state of the Burials Question was to afford increased facilities for establishing cemeteries in rural districts. He, therefore, called upon Churchmen and all Members who on that side had voted against the Bill of the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan), to vote against the Bill of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour), which would not satisfactorily settle this vexed question.

Mr. Wilbraham Egerton

MR. ROBERTS wished to say a few words on the subject before the House, because it was one in which his constituents, and the people of Wales generally, felt the deepest interest. He was not going to take up the time of the House, and so to help in putting off a division on the Bill, by dwelling at any length on the discursive speech of the hon. Member who moved the Amendment; but he objected to the manner in which he had presumed to divide Nonconformists into sections, and to the motives which he ascribed for their actions. The hon. Member, and others who followed him, had spoken repeatedly of political and of non-political Dissenters. He wanted to know why they should speak of political Dissenters more than of political Churchmen? But to let that pass, he had been much interested in the criticisms of the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) on those clauses in the Bill on which his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had given Notice of Amendments; and he trusted that when they went into Committee, they might rely on the valuable assistance of the hon. Member in making the Bill into what he termed a consistent Bill. The hon. Member for Mid-Cheshire (Mr. Wilbraham Egerton) had said many things on which he (Mr. Roberts) would have liked to follow him, but he must refrain for the reason given before; but the hon. Member had said that this question was not merely a clerical one, but one for laymen as well as the Clergy. In that he entirely agreed, and he ventured to say that if the question had been left to the decision of the laymen of the Church, it would long since have been settled. In proof of that assertion, he might mention that whereas nearly 15,000 clerical signatures were obtained in a few days to a Petition against Lord Harrowby's Amendment in the Lords, a canvass, described by a clerical correspondent in The Times as a most energetic one, only succeeded in obtaining 28,000 lay signatures to a Petition against his hon. and learned Friend's Resolution—that was, less than two lay signatures against that of each clergyman. But what he rose to say was that in Wales the difficulty which the Bill of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour) sought to solve was not an abstract one; not, as had been said by hon. Members opposite, a manufactured or fancied grievance, but a real practical grievance, with which they were brought into contact almost daily. The majority of the people of Wales were Nonconformists; the cemeteries in the Principality were few in number, and very unequally distributed. Such burial-grounds as were attached to chapels were generally very limited in area; so that, as a matter of fact, parish churchyards in most districts formed the only burial-grounds available, and it was unfair that the right to use these parish burial-grounds should be clogged with onerous conditions by imposing the use of a Service which, though beautiful and appropriate, was distasteful because it was enforced upon them, and by debarring Nonconformist ministers from saying a word of comfort or of exhortation to their own people at the grave-side of their departed friends. There had been many instances in which the unfairness and disadvantage of the present state of the law had been prominently shown. Reference had been made, he believed, in the House before to the funeral of the Rev. Henry Rees, the father-in-law of the hon. Member for Anglesey. Nearly 1,000 people had travelled from Liverpool, a distance of 80 miles, to attend the funeral of their pastor, and yet they were not allowed to hear a word spoken in the churchyard by any of the well-known ministers who were present. Similar cases had occurred since that time, and there were many other instances in which inconvenience and scandal had arisen from the present state of the law. He would only refer to one, and he would quote that only because it occurred in the parish in which he lived. At Abergele, last spring, arrangements were duly made for the interment of an old woman in humble circumstances; the hour was fixed, the bell was tolled, and, as was the custom in Wales, a considerable number assembled to pay their last token of respect to the deceased; but the curate—generally very attentive to his duties—had forgotten the engagement, the vicar not being at home, the interment had to take place without any service, though the minister of the Presbyterian church, to which the deceased belonged, was at the grave-side. An old man, however—a layman—ventured to break the law, and to offer up a short prayer before the friends left the churchyard. Those, therefore, who knew the condition of Wales, and the feeling of the people there, could readily understand that the Welsh were very anxious to have this grievance removed. He would not enter on the general question—he thought that it was now beyond the scope or the necessity of argument. His hon. and learned Friend had four times obtained large majorities for his Bill in the last Parliament, and in the present Conservative House of Commons he was last year only beaten by 15 votes. The principle for which they contended had been adopted by the House of Lords. No one would venture to assert that the House of Lords was a revolutionary Body, fond of innovation, or desirous of subverting the Church of England as by law established; and seeing that the House of Lords had approved of the principle of his hon. and learned Friend's Bill, it was idle for hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side to say that it was a measure promoted only by political Dissenters, and the hobgoblin which some of them had conjured up in the Liberation

Mr. Roberts

Society. Though the Bill did not meet the views of many of those who sat on the Opposition Benches in its present shape, still he hoped it would be carried, and, with the assistance of the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge, it would be properly amended in Committee, and be made a good and workable measure. He was of opinion that the Bill ought to be passed into law as a measure of justice; for it was not right that the people of England and Wales should be the only people in Europe who were not to be trusted to manage orderly and decent burials.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY said, he owed some apology to the House for the part he had taken in introducing the Bill to the House, considering that there were no fewer than five other Bills on the subject of burial. The reason which had induced his hon. Friend the Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour) and himself to propose a Burials Bill was because they heartily wished that the question might be got rid of, and they thought they had devised some expedients by which the grievance that was felt might be removed. The hon. and learned Member for the borough of Cambridge (Mr. Marten) had devoted nearly the whole of his speech to a consideration of the question from a sanitary point of view. He (Lord Francis Hervey) himself did not believe that the Bill now before the House would preclude or prejudice in the slightest degree any just or necessary measure which might be introduced to deal with the question of burials on sanitary grounds. He agreed that those grounds ought to be considered, though not, perhaps, so exclusively as the hon. and learned Member seemed to imply. The hon. and learned Member had challenged the framer of the Bill as to the meaning and object of the 5th clause, which declared the extent of the right of sepulture. The explanation was this. The hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had, on more than one occasion, expressed the opinion that there existed, by common law, a right to interment in the parish churchyard, apart from the performance of the Service of the Church. He (Lord Francis Hervey) had himself made diligent search into legal authorities upon the question, and he had been led to think that the position assumed by the hon. and learned Member was an exceedingly doubtful one. The case of "the Queen v. Taylor" had been cited in support of it; and the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire had even, he believed, gone so far as to describe this case as a "leading case." But it should be remembered that this "leading case" was never tried, never argued, and never brought to an issue, though, no doubt, some words fell, in the course of what might be called a conversation, from Justice Fortescue which would appear to favour the conclusion of the hon. and learned Member. The case was to be discovered only in manuscript in the Library. On the other hand, he would cite one or two counter-authorities—authorities which were respectable, and even eminent. In the Parson's Counsellor, for instance, which was said to contain all things necessary for a parson to know or to observe, it was laid down that—

"By the custom of England every person (except such as are hereafter excepted) may at this day be buried in the churchyard of the parish where he dies. Some persons are denied Christian burial, and, therefore, such persons are excepted in what is said before, and may not be buried in the church or churchyard without special licence from the bishop."

In Comyn's Digest, under the title "Cemetery," they were told—

"By the custom of England, every one (who shall have Christian burial) may have burial in the common part of the church or chancel. . . . Every person (who may have Christian burial) may have burial in the churchyard where he dies by the general custom of England. . . . But by the canon, a felo-de-se shall not have burial in the church or churchyard without a licence from the bishop or ordinary. Nor a man excommunicated."

And Sir John Nicholl said—

"Taking the context of the law . . . it leads to the same construction as the general import of the words—viz., that burial is to be refused to those who are not Christians at all, . . . our Church knowing no such indecency as putting the body into the consecrated ground without the service being at the same time performed."

These were authorities on which he relied for showing at least that there was much more to be said on the other side than hon. Gentlemen might suppose; and, therefore, a clause was introduced into this Bill to meet the difficulty. But on the merits, he and the supporters of his Bill had no controversy with the hon. and learned Gentleman. It was now very generally conceded that if this right did not in strict law exist, it ought to be conceded. There was another clause intended to meet the views of many of the Clergy, and of still more of the Laity of the Church of England. His hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Wilbraham Egerton) had expressed an opinion that some form of Christian burial ought to be introduced for those who had not been baptized. He would find a clause for this purpose in the Bill, and as two of the three main provisions of the Bill obtained the assent or acquiescence of his hon. Friend he would claim his vote for the second reading. It was proposed by the 10th clause of the Bill to admit Nonconformists to the use of the burial-grounds of the Church of England with such services as were usual in the religious society of which the deceased was a member, in all cases where there was no other available accommodation for the bodies of such deceased persons, and where, at the same time, the question was not complicated by recent or definite endowment of the Church intended expressly for the benefit of Church people alone. They drew that limit, because it was one which had been sanctioned more than once by enactment of the Legislature in recent years. He believed they were bound to secure due regard for the wishes of recent donors. They had done so, and the only reward they had got was that the allies of his hon. Friend had circulated a list of donors who demanded the rejection of the Bill, although the rights of every one of them were by the Bill expressly secured. His hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge put the case of a Dissenter buried in a cemetery 49 years old, and within two miles and three-quarters of a burial-ground; but if his hon. Friend's opposition to the Bill were really founded upon such arguments, then he (Lord Francis Hervey) would ask the House to give the Bill a second reading, and to amend it in Committee. His hon. Friend objected that the restrictions which the Bill contained were so harassing and vexatious that they would not be accepted by hon. Gentlemen opposite; and yet, on the other hand, they were told that the Bill was accepted by the Liberation Society and by the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire. His hon. Friend said, in the first place, they had surrendered all the Church of England wished to retain, and then turned round and said the Bill was perfectly outrageous, because it gave so little and did not surrender a tithe of what was desired. But the Bill could not be a measure of prodigal liberality and of niggardly parsimony at the same time. His hon. Friend must choose which stool he would stand upon. [Mr. BERNESFORD HORE: Both.] They all knew what happened to gentlemen who stood upon two stools. He would now state why the author of the Bill had not thought it right to adopt the proposition of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), who desired to follow the lines of Plunkett's Act. If changes were to be carried out, they ought to be done by force of law, and not by leaving them to the discretion of ministers of religion. Plunkett's Act was found insufficient in Ireland, and was repealed; and he could not but shrink from exposing the Clergy to the obloquy which the possession of so invidious a privilege would be sure to bring upon them. Again, objection had been taken to the word "Christian" as applied to the services in the churchyard, on the ground that it was vague. But this objection must have been considered in "another place" by many of the most eminent members of the Church and of the Legal Profession; and Lord O'Hagan, Lord Selborne, Lord Blackburn, Lord Coleridge, and Lord Hatherley, all appeared to have come to the conclusion that there was no extraordinary difficulty in interpreting the words "Christian services." Then it was said this was called the thin end of the wedge, and they were called upon to resist the Bill as the introduction to "Disestablishment," and some Members of the Episcopal Bench had even gone so far as to liken their position to the Greeks fighting at Thermopylæ. For his own part, he did not like so ominous and sinister a suggestion. Thermopylæ was a splendid disaster? He feared that if they were to listen to their right rev. Friends, they might find that while they were fighting the battle of the Church, receiving and giving hard knocks, from and to their Nonconformist opponents, some Malian scout might point out a path, say through Hatcham or Holborn, by which the enemy would pass through to Disestablishment, and they would thus suffer entire and total defeat. He would ask his political Friends where they supposed the strength of the Church, considered as an Establishment, to lie? He did not conceive that the position of the Church rested upon the possession of exclusive privilege or the preservation of professional dignity; their strength rested upon popular esteem and upon the sympathy and appreciation with which the work of the Church was regarded amongst the mass of the people. He did not believe that the opposition of the Clergy and others to this Bill was sympathized with and appreciated by the bulk of what he might call "unattached Christians" in the large towns. He believed that the Church of England, if wisdom guided her councils, had a great future before her, and that the mass of English artisans would not prove hostile to the Church so long as the Church not only upheld the standard of a vigorous and healthy energy, but also displayed a charitable, benignant, and tolerant spirit. He believed that the "common people" were utterly unable to understand for what reason it was that the Clergy of the Church of England so persistently refused to grant their Dissenting brethren the right to lay their dead in the churchyard of the parish with such decent and Christian services as their religious usages might sanction; and he believed that by such refusal they were gradually estranging the feelings with which the working classes regarded the Church. Before sitting down, he would quote the words of one justly considered a high authority on matters concerning the Church of England, though they were not spoken with reference to the present subject of debate. These words were—

"What shall we gain if we adhere to the principle of 'No surrender' upon the subject? That is the question, which you must answer by looking at it in the light of the circumstances of the time. You must look not only to the disposition of the nation out-of-doors, but at the course of events in this House, the principles upon which parties guide their movements, and the laws by which public men regulate their conduct; and looking to, and having regard to, all these things, I am bound to say, taking the most impartial view I can upon the subject, I do not think the Church will gain anything by prolonging this contest. I do not conceal for a moment the reluctance with which I give up anything which the Church possesses; but I am bound to look to both sides of the question, and not to content myself with stolid opposition, and refuse to give way to that tendency by which it seems to me so many of us are apt to be affected, of pursuing for many years a steady obstruction and then giving way to an unreasonable panic. I think, therefore, it is wiser to accept the terms now offered, because I am distinctly of opinion that we may go further and fare worse." —[3 Hansard, cxc. 970.]

Lord Francis Hervey

These were the opinions of Lord Salisbury, spoken when he was Lord Cranborne in that House on the Church Rates Abolition Bill. The words were applicable without the alteration of a letter to the present question. They had a chance now before them of settling the question with dignity; but if they went further they would fare worse. In a few years this question would be settled. It would not be settled on a basis of "No Surrender;" it would be settled on a basis of sacrifice, and it rested with those who sat upon those—the Ministerial—Benches to say whether they would accept the best they could get under the circumstances, so that the sacrifice should be as little as possible, while it should be adequate to the necessities of the case.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, that it would not be respectful to the House, or to his hon. Friend the Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour), if the Government, however inadequately represented by him (Mr. Talbot), were silent on the question, or if a Representative of the University of Oxford did not make its voice heard on this Bill. He would endeavour to lay before the House the grounds on which he thought they would be justified in refusing their assent to this Bill. He could not help thinking that his noble Friend who spoke last (Lord Francis Hervey) was a little injudicious in one of the passing allusions he had made. His noble Friend had alluded—as he called it—to the "splendid disaster" of Thermopylæ; but surely he could not have forgotten that that splendid disaster was due to treason in the camp. The noble Lord had also told them, on the authority of the noble and learned authorities in the other House, that no difficulty would arise on the interpretation of the words "services of a solemn and Christian character." But he would point out to his noble Friend that the objection to those words was not only that they were vague, but that they were unjust. If they were going to settle this question, why were they going to settle it only on behalf of Christians? There were those who differed from the Established Church even more widely than any Christians whatever, and that was not the place in which they could ignore the existence of the Jews. It would certainly be a much greater sacrifice to make the Jews listen to a Christian service than it would be to any Nonconformist to listen to the Burial Service of the Church of England; and his hon. Friend the Member for Hertford could not say they had quite settled the matter as long as they only dealt with Christians of the various denominations. He congratulated his hon. Friend on the respectful consideration which had been given to this attempt to settle this question. He (Mr. Talbot) also had tried his hand in the matter, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) took care that he did not go very far. He had had some difficulty even in being allowed to withdraw his Bill in 1876. The Government, also, must envy the hon. Member for Hertford, because they, too, two years ago, made an attempt to legislate on the question; but those proposals did not meet with a respectful hearing. There was a great gathering of Nonconformist deputies, and the measure was denounced as a monstrous invasion of the rights of conscience and the liberty of the subject, when they attempted to deal with this as a sanitary question. His hon. Friend had, however, been supported by both sides of the House; but he would ask him to consider how the Bill was received, and by whom. On the 10th of February of the present year the Executive Committee of the Liberation Society passed the following resolution:—

"That, as the Bill of Mr. Balfour recognizes the right of parishioners to have other burial services in churchyards than that of the Church of England, and is objectionable only as far as it limits the exercise of that right, the second reading may be assented to, with a view to proposing, in Committee, such Amendments as will secure the results aimed at by the Bill of Mr. Osborne Morgan."

Support of that kind must make them look upon the Bill with some suspicion. The Liberation Society was not an unknown or uninfluential body. They knew that the Liberation Society aimed at the separation of Church and State, or, as they expressed it, "the liberation of the Church from State control ;" and if he (Mr. Talbot) wanted to liberate the Church from the control of the State, he would go and ask their assistance ; but until that time arrived, he preferred to take on this question the opinions and authority of Churchmen. Now, what did the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire say? In his speech to his constituents at Wrexham on January 6, 1879, the hon. and learned Gentleman thus expressed his intention of supporting the Bill of his hon. Friend—

" Referring to Mr. Balfour's Bill, which this year had precedence in point of time over his own, he said that by admitting Nonconformists to the parish churchyards under certain restrictions, it virtually conceded the principle for which he had himself so long contended. He thought, therefore, the proper course would be to vote for the second reading of the Bill, and to amend it in Committee by rejecting limitations under which Nonconformists could never rest, and which, it was fair to say, the author of the Bill did not regard as vital to his Bill. If this was done—and it could be done by a few strokes of the pen—there would be no difference between Mr. Balfour's Bill and his own."—[The Times, January 7, 1879.]

How did he know that his hon. Friend did not consider these limitations as vital? Had the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire been in secret conclave with his hon. Friend the Member for Hertford?

MR. BALFOUR: There is no authority whatever for the statement to which my hon. Friend has just referred, as to what I regarded as being vital in my measure, and I am sure my hon. and learned Friend opposite will confirm that statement.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN: I quoted from a letter written by the hon. Member for Hertford to The Daily News.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he would leave it to the two hon. Gentlemen to settle the matter between themselves. If there was any secret communication between his hon. Friend and the hon. and learned Gentleman, he did not know how far it had gone. But if the case was as stated, and if the Amendments of the hon. and learned Gentleman were agreed to, there would be practically no difference between his own Bill and that now before the House. If those Bills were the same, he would wish to know how his hon. Friend the Member for Hertford could suppose that the Conservative Government, and the Conservative Party, could give their sanction to it. Something had been said about the thin end of the wedge. He (Mr. Talbot) did not hesitate to say that he opposed the Bill, because he thought it was the thin end of the wedge of Disestablishment, and because he knew there was a thick end outside. If he saw the thin end of a wedge under his window, he would strongly object, and he would endeavour to remove the wedge with all the force he could command. He did not deny that there was a grievance in the matter ; but he said it was an infinitesimal grievance, and it was one which was daily diminishing, and if hon. Gentlemen opposite would have allowed Her Majesty's Government to proceed with the Bills they had introduced, and to settle the question as it was proposed to settle it, the grievance might, he would not say entirely, but at least very greatly, have been removed. But there was no disposition on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite to settle the matter by compromise in a satisfactory manner. As soon as any proposal was introduced from that side of the House, unless it was an entire surrender of principle, it was at once attacked by hon. Gentlemen opposite. What they really wanted was a triumph over the Church, and ultimately its Disestablishment. That was the more abundantly shown by the Amendments which had been put down by those who were now really supporting the second reading of the Bill. He could not understand how hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, whom he knew to be attached members of the Church of England, could make common cause with those whose avowed wish was to put it down ; but that was so. Until there was an alteration, he did not see how the Government could be expected to help any measure such as that now before the House. He asked his hon. Friend the Member for Hertford whether this Bill was likely to be regarded as a settlement of the question? The proposal to permit an interment without any religious ceremony had been described as the " burial of a dog," and would certainly not be accepted as a settlement of the grievance complained of ; while to bury a disbeliever in God or in revealed religion with a Christian ceremony was a mockery so dreadful as to be equally abhorrent to both the relatives of the deceased and Christians. If it were passed, there would certainly be a demand for amendment on a great many points in the clauses. Not alone would Jews be opposed to it, but those persons who, unfortunately, were in antagonism to all revealed religion, and who would not wish to have their bodies committed to the ground with any kind of Christian ceremonial. The hon. Member for the Flint Boroughs (Mr. Roberts) had said there was a wide difference between the number of signatures of the Clergy and those of the Laity attached to the Declaration which had been drawn up against the Burials Bill, the signatures of the Laity being comparatively few compared with those of the Clergy. The hon. Member, however, could not have paid much attention to the history of that document, if he did not know that the Laity who signed it were men of a representative character, and there had been no attempt to canvass for signatures among the Laity. The noble Lord who led the Opposition (the Marquess of Hartington) had used language upon the subject in his speech at Liverpool in the present month, which he (Mr. Talbot) thought were remarkable. The noble Lord said—

Mr. J. G. Talbot

“ You know that we are pledged to religious equality. Although I may not attach to that phrase so wide a significance as is attached to it by some of our friends who sit near me, yet I think I may say that the Liberal Party as a whole is pledged to remove all civil disabilities which weigh upon any part of the people in respect of their religious opinions, and to repeal those laws, for instance, which affect burial, which are felt by our Nonconformist fellow-countrymen to be an injustice, a grievance, and a social stigma.”

He would ask the noble Lord whether, in considering the question, he was not impressed by the feeling that it was the social stigma which was the sting of the whole Nonconformist grievance? He did not believe that the Nonconformists looked on this as an injustice. [Cries of “ Yes, yes ! ”] Well, perhaps, they might consider it as a wrong or a grievance ; but he would put it to the House whether there were not two sides to the grievance? Many of the churchyards were given to the Church by persons who wished the Services of the Church of England alone to be performed in them, and would not they feel an injustice if the Bill were passed? He could not help feeling great regret that it was upon social grounds that this matter pressed upon the feelings of Nonconformists ; but surely this was a little unworthy of the great body of Nonconformists? The history of England spoke to the honour of the Nonconformists. There was a time when the Nonconformists considered it a high privilege to give up all the advantages they possessed, and when they did not mind going out into the wilderness, because they disapproved of what was being done, and because they conscientiously objected to the doctrines and discipline of the Church of England. He honoured the Nonconformists who acted in that manner ; but when he heard so much about privileges and social stigma, he did not regard that as a very noble way of looking at the question. It was painful to him to take any part in opposition to an hon. Friend whom he so highly esteemed as the hon. Member for Hertford ; but he had a long-cherished conviction that the connection between the Church and the State had been the origin of untold and increasing blessings to this country, and it was because he felt that the proposition of his hon. Friend, however well-intended, really went to weaken and ultimately destroy that connection, that he asked the House not to assent to the second reading of the Bill.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, his name had been so often and so pointedly referred to during the debate that he wished to state frankly what course he intended to take in regard to the Bill. But, first, let him congratulate his hon. Friend (Mr. Balfour) on the courage, as well as the ability, which he had shown in grappling with this difficult and delicate problem. He would only add that, should the hon. Gentleman's Bill eventuate in the satisfactory settlement of a difficulty which he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had spent nine or ten years in trying to solve, no one would rejoice more heartily than himself. As to the last speech they had heard (Mr. Talbot's), it contained one argument, and one argument only, against the Bill. The Government were going to vote against the Bill because he (Mr. Osborne Morgan) was going to vote for it. That was an argument which it was rather difficult for him to answer. Nor was he going to follow his noble Friend (Lord Francis Hervey) into his abstruse legal argument on the question of the parishioner's right. He would only ask him one question—Had he ever heard of Lord Stowell? Because Lord Stowell had laid down the law on this subject in these words—

“Every parishioner has a right to interment in the parish churchyard without the leave of the incumbent.”

Surely that ought to settle the question. Well, then, the law having, as Lord Stowell and, indeed, as this Bill emphatically declared, made the churchyard the burial place of every parishioner, irrespective of Church or creed, did it not follow that in a free country the burial ought to be allowed to take place with the ceremonies which were most in harmony with the professions of the dead man and, above all, with the wishes and sentiments of the mourners? They, and not the clergyman, were the persons for whose consolation the service was intended; and surely it was only reasonable to allow them to be consoled in their own way. That was the whole of their contention. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, on the other hand, contended that the law, having several centuries ago secured to every baptized person the privilege of being buried with a certain ceremony which was then universally accepted, you ought to continue to force that privilege upon those who had long since ceased to desire it, or if it were dispensed with, then that you ought not to allow any service at all. Well, then, those being the two principles for which they were respectively contending, what was the principle of that Bill? If they looked to the 2nd sub-section of Clause 6, they would find it provided that at the option of the mourners the burial might take place

“Without the performance therein of the Burial Service of the Church of England, but with such religious service or ceremony as is agreeable with the usages of the religious society (other than the Church of England) of which the deceased person at the time of his death was a member.”

Why, that was the very thing for which he had been struggling for the last nine years; and that being so, he felt bound to vote for the second reading. No doubt there were things in the Bill to which he objected; but he had always understood that if a Member approved the general principle of a Bill and objected to certain clauses, his proper course was to vote for the second reading, and then, when the Bill got into Committee, to endeavour to expunge the objectionable clauses, and that was exactly what he proposed to do. He objected to the service being made to depend on the “usages” of the religious society of which the deceased was a member. The word “usage,” it had been well said, was one of the most expensive words in the English language, and never ought to be introduced into a well-drawn Act of Parliament. Besides, the ceremony ought not to be made to depend on the creed or church of the deceased, but on the wishes of the mourners, for whose benefit it really was intended. As the Bill stood, if the deceased had been a member of no religious body, or by reason of tender age, or for any other reason, had remained unbaptized, the Bill would not apply, and such scandals as the Akenham burial case would go on unchecked. He should, therefore, move in Committee to amend the 6th clause, by giving the right to select the service or ceremony to the persons who had charge of the burial. As to the 10th clause, he objected to it in toto. Why were the words of a “solemn and Christian character” introduced? After more than 25 years' experience of services in the unconsecrated portions of cemeteries, surely such a limitation, if it could be justified as a matter of right—which he denied—was unnecessary. The 1st sub-section would exclude the operation of the Bill in some 5,000 out of the 13,000 parishes in England and Wales in which the churchyard was still open, so that his hon. Friend would be giving a boon with one hand and taking away half of it with the other. But besides this, the sub-section involved a fallacy. It assumed a principle hitherto unknown to English law—that the donor of land for a public purpose could reserve to himself the right to dictate to the Legislature the way in which the purpose was to be carried out. The donors might, if they pleased, have given the land to private persons to be held in trust to permit the burial of Episcopalians therein, in which case they would have been, like Nonconformist burial-grounds, private property, and no one would have sought to interfere with them. In fact, as stated by Sir John Audry, in a letter to The Guardian last year—

Mr. Osborne Morgan

"The complaint of the donors of land for churchyards has a colour of equity, but it is only a colour. If they gave their land for churchyards, they gave it for all to which the churchyards are liable, and they cannot repudiate the gift because they had not anticipated all its legal consequences."

But in some cases the land for the churchyard had been given by Nonconformists—a notable instance of which occurred in a parish close to that in which he had spent many years of his life, where the churchyard had been enlarged by land given for the purpose by a Unitarian. When the donor died, his family naturally felt it a hardship that he should not be allowed to be buried by his own minister in his own land. But this injustice would be perpetuated by the 10th clause. He objected to the clause on the further and broader ground that it would create side by side two classes of churchyards, one of which would be open and the other closed to Nonconformists. Nay, more; in the same churchyard one part might be open and the other closed, or, as pointed out by the hon. Member (Mr. Beresford Hope), a churchyard might be open one day and, in consequence of a gift of a piece of land some two miles distant, it might be closed the next. On these grounds, he would move in Committee to omit the clause altogether; and he felt so strong on the question that, if he failed in his attempt, he should be compelled to join the hon. Member (Mr. Beresford Hope) in endeavouring to reject the Bill on the third reading. But with these Amendments the Bill was his own Bill. It was a case of "Shakespeare and I thought of the same thing," only this time he thought he might say, "I thought of it first." Still the Bill was an honest Bill, and in this respect differed from the other 14 Bills which, since 1870, had been brought in from the opposite side of the House for the purpose, not of solving the difficulty, but of evading it. What was the use of offering cemeteries to people who did not want them? If the Report, which he moved for and obtained two years and a-half ago, showed anything, it showed that the people of England did not love those new-fangled cemeteries; for, at the rate at which they were being constructed, it would take 304 years to close all the churchyards in England and Wales. They loved the old churchyard, endeared to them by its solemn memories and its revered associations, the rugged yew trees under which

"The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep."

And to say that any man, much less any minister of religion, could wish to enter that hallowed spot for the purpose of desecrating it, would be a calumny if it were not an absurdity. As an instance of the feeling in favour of keeping up the churchyard instead of constructing a cemetery, he instanced the case of the parish of Islip, where, the churchyard being full, the adjoining landowners had offered to enlarge it, and the following Memorial had been presented to the Rural Dean of the district by the Rector on behalf of the parish:—

"(1.) The feeling of the parishioners is unanimous that the (for us) heavy expenses of making the ground available by levelling, planting, building walls, should be defrayed out of the rates, and not be left to voluntary subscription.

"(2.) The feeling is equally unanimous against turning the new ground into a cemetery, both on account of the extra cost involved, and also because it would perpetuate in the very centre of the villages, so that all could see, those religious differences which sometimes divide even families.

"(3.) There remains, therefore, but one course, concerning which once more there is no difference of opinion—that the ground should be converted into a churchyard at the expense of the parish, but that access should be given to religious ministers of all denominations to perform the burial service over all persons whose friends desire it.

"(4.) We have no choice, therefore, but to wait, at any inconvenience, and possibly danger, till Parliament sees fit to confer upon villages the power of extending their churchyards, subject to this equitable condition, as before stated. That I am fairly representing the opinion of the people of Islip I have no doubt whatever.

"THOMAS W. FOWLE,

"Dec. 7, 1878.

Rector of Islip."

He had no doubt that Memorial fairly expressed the opinion of nineteen-twentieths of the rural Laity of England. But did it represent the opinions of the rural Clergy? Unfortunately, this was a subject on which there existed the greatest possible divergence of opinion between the Clergy and Laity, as was shown by the famous Memorial against Lord Harrowby's Clause, which, in a few weeks, had received the signatures of 15,000 clergymen; but, although it was hawked about the country, and no pains spared to obtain lay signatures, each clergyman could do little more than obtain two laymen—presumably his own churchwardens—to affix their names to it. The fact was the Laity of England were becoming ashamed of the opposition which was offered to his Bill. They were ashamed of being told, when they went to Austria or Russia, or even to Turkey, that England on this question was lagging behind the most bigoted countries in Europe. Why, Cyprus was miles ahead of us in this matter. The other day an English soldier was buried in one of the parish churchyards of the Greek Church in Cyprus. Now, if a Greek sailor had happened to die in a rural parish in England, everybody knew that he could only have been buried by an Anglican clergyman with the rites of the Anglican Church. But what took place in Cyprus? Why, the Burial Service of the English Church was conducted by an English chaplain. A Greek priest was present, but the only part he took in the service was to bless the grave! Well now, he really thought that poor Greek priest might have taught a lesson of Christian charity to many an Anglican Bishop; and if the acquisition of that unfortunate Island should lead us to assimilate our Burial Laws to those of other and more barbarous countries, he, for one, would feel almost disposed to condone the means by which it was acquired. He deeply regretted the course which the Government had thought proper to take. They had thrown away a great opportunity. They might gracefully have made to one of their own supporters a concession which they had always refused to make to himself. By so doing, they would undoubtedly have earned the gratitude of the Nonconformist bodies. But, paradoxical as it might seem, the Nonconformist bodies were not the religious bodies which were most deeply interested in the settlement of this question. Strong in the justice of their claim, they could afford to wait. They knew that their ultimate triumph was secure, and that the longer it was delayed the more complete it would be. But what about the Church of England? One thing was absolutely certain—that the prolonged agitation of this question was doing incalculable mischief to that Church, and was more than anything else hastening its downfall. If the Government chose to play into the hands of the Liberation Society, it was not for him to thwart them. But had they forgotten the solemn warning uttered two years ago by the Archbishop of Canterbury, when he entreated the House of Lords to remember that the most vital interests of the Church of England demanded that this question should be settled at once and for ever? And how, then, could it be settled? Did any man with a head upon his shoulders, and with eyes in his head, believe that it could be settled in any other way than upon the lines of this Bill? Why, if every one of those 14 Bills to which he had already alluded were passed tomorrow, they would not advance the settlement of this problem—no, not by one single inch! And it was just because he saw in this Bill an honest attempt to effect that settlement that he would give to the second reading his humble but hearty support.

EARL PERCY understood that the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken supported this Bill not with the view of carrying it, but in order that he might be enabled really to pass his own measure. He should like to know how the hon. Member (Mr. Balfour) and his other hon. Friends who supported the Bill felt, when they were given to understand that, in so doing, they were only playing into the hands of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Osborne Morgan)? What object could they have in trying to force this measure on the House? The second reading could only be carried by the assistance of hon. Gentlemen opposite; and when they got it in Committee they would reject the saving clauses on which his hon. Friends relied. It was hopeless to attempt to conciliate the Liberationists by concessions. The question whether there was a real grievance to be remedied had been already so fully discussed that it was hardly worth while now to enter upon it; but it had been said that even if there were only a supposed grievance on the part of Dissenters, still it was the duty of the House to remove it. But there were many grievances with regard to which the House was not so unanimous as to assent to their removal. There were what were called the grievances of the Sister country; but it did not follow that what was called a grievance must be removed. He ventured to think that that would be a dangerous argument for the House to adopt. No one said that the Nonconformists would read over the dead services repugnant to Christian feeling; but there were sects in this country who, under such a Bill as this, would be able to hold services in the churchyards which would be most repugnant and repulsive to Christian feelings. What was it that was now proposed? The hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire last year said that the English Church could no longer consider herself both National and Denominational; but that would go much further than churchyards, and it was because of that frank avowal of the hon. and learned Gentleman that this Bill should be rejected. It had been said that it would be prudent on the part of Churchmen to yield upon this question; but what had they gained by yielding upon the question of church rates? He should vote against the Bill.

Mr. Osborne Morgan

MAJOR NOLAN: I must say that I give my hearty support to this Bill, which, if it goes to a Division, would, I am sure, have the support of the majority of the Irish Members. Now, I will mention to the House a little fact which, I think, is a powerful argument in support of the Bill, and which came under my own personal observation. At Shoeburyness, where there is a large garrison, not long ago—in March last—a Catholic soldier died. There they were obliged to have him buried under Protestant rites. This fact, as I have said, is entirely within my own personal observation—indeed, the soldier belonged to my own battery, and I had to make most of the arrangements for the funeral. A Catholic clergyman was allowed to say prayers in the dead-house of the garrison—there was no objection to that; but when the funeral procession arrived at the churchyard the Protestant clergyman performed the rest of the ceremony, and the comrades of the man who had lived all his life a Catholic saw him at the last moment handed over to a Protestant clergyman. It was not the fault of the military authorities that this happened, for there was no cemetery within 40 miles. I say that the existing state of the law inflicts a great grievance, and I hope that it may be amended somehow. I think that those who refuse to allow the churchyards to be used for such burials are bound to find some accommodation elsewhere.

MR. GRANTHAM would not say that this was one of the worst attempts to settle this question, but he would say that it was one of the most dangerous. There was no doubt it was the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) in disguise; and the moment the Bill got into Committee that hon. and learned Member's Amendments would at once prove fatal. The Nonconformists had, he was prepared to admit, a grievance, and it was this—that there was no ground open to them in many parishes where they could bury with their own services; but that was the fault of the State and not of the Church, and that did not give them a right to force their ministers or their services into the consecrated ground of Churchmen. This Bill would cause heartburnings all over the country; because in one district the interments would be allowed, and in another, adjoining, they would not be allowed, owing to the grant being made within 50 years. What an invidious position this would place the recent donor of ground in; upon him would be thrown the onus of closing it against certain classes of the community. They had no right to place individuals in such a position as that. Besides, another great objection was that it proposed to re-create the difficulty again, after it had been once settled, by declaring that when once a cemetery was provided in a parish, the Nonconformists would, ipso facto, be debarred from continuing to use the parish churchyard for their services, after, perhaps, many, many years' quiet exercise of that right under this Bill. He believed there was a satisfactory way of dealing with the question. They must look at it from a sanitary point of view; and where it was necessary to close churchyards, cemeteries must at once be provided. That would leave, no doubt, many churchyards with ample accommodation for several years to come; and as many clergymen might not object to Nonconformists using their burial-grounds, this part of the question ought to be made a parochial one, and certain time allowed for arrangements to be made. They had a precedent to which they could look and by which they could be guided in what had been done by the Education Act of 1870. There, a certain time was allowed the advocates of Church schools and voluntary schools to determine whether they would or could provide sufficient accommodation for their respective districts, so that there should be both sufficient and efficient accommodation for the district. Give, therefore, each parish two years to deliberate whether they would provide a burial-ground or not. In most cases a ground would be given, and in others it would be bought by subscription. Still, in some cases, owing to there being so few Dissenters, or else so many, it would be thought better to let the Nonconformist minister officiate; so that in whatever parish at the end of two years no cemetery had been provided, it would be assumed that it was desired to let the Nonconformists in. His own opinion was that the Laity felt quite as strongly upon this subject as the Clergy themselves felt, notwithstanding what had been said about the "protest," for which signatures from the Laity had really not been sought, that protest having been signed simply to meet a particular feature that arose in the question.

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

QUESTION.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTION.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE asked what would be the order of Business to-morrow; whether, considering the "accident" of last evening, the Mutiny Bill or the adjourned Resolutions upon their mode of procedure would be the first Order on Thursday?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that the Government proposed to postpone the consideration of the Mutiny Bill until to-morrow week, so that the first Order to-morrow would be the adjourned debate on the Business of the House.

MOTIONS.

EAST INDIA (PUBLIC WORKS).

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report as to the expediency of constructing Public Works in India with money raised on loan, both as regards financial results and the prevention of famine:—That the Committee do consist of Seventeen Members:—Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Mr. FAWCETT, Mr. BALFOUR, Mr. CHILDERS, Mr. ASHBURY, Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL, Mr. ONSLOW, Mr. JOHN CROSS, Mr. PEASE, Mr. HARDCASTLE, Sir JOSEPH M'KENNA, Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD, Mr. GRANT DUFF, Mr. MULHOLLAND, Mr. ERNEST NOEL, Mr. AGNEW, and Mr. EDWARD STANHOPE:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

Mr. Grantham

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING.

Ordered, That the Select Committee of last Session on Parliamentary Reporting be re-appointed:—That Mr. WILLIAM EDWARD FORSTER, Viscount CRICHTON, Dr. LYON PLAYFAIR, Sir ALEXANDER GORDON, Mr. WALTER, Lord FRANCIS HERVEY, Mr. HALL, Mr. MITCHELL HENRY, Mr. JAMES BARCLAY, Mr. MILLS, Sir HENRY HOLLAND, Mr. HUTCHINSON, Mr. JOSEPH COWEN, Major ARBUTHNOT, and Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SMITH be Members of the Committee:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

Ordered, That the Evidence taken before the Select Committee on Parliamentary Reporting, of Session 1878, be referred to the Select Committee on Parliamentary Reporting. — (Mr. William Henry Smith.)

JURORS' REMUNERATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. H. B. SHERIDAN, Bill for the payment of Jurors in Criminal Cases and on Coroners Inquests, and for the better payment of Jurors in Civil Actions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. H. B. SHERIDAN, Sir HENRY JACKSON, Mr. JOSEPH COWEN, Mr. WHITWELL, Mr. BURT, Mr. WHEELHOUSE, and Mr. O'CONNOR POWER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 81.]

LICENSING BOARDS (SCOTLAND) (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. FORTESCUE HARRISON, Bill for the election of Licensing Boards in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. FORTESCUE HARRISON, Sir GEORGE BALFOUR, and Dr. CAMERON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 82.]

ASSIZES BILL.

On Motion of Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY, Bill to amend the Law respecting the holding of Assizes, ordered to be brought in by Sir MATTHEW RIDLEY and Mr. Secretary CROSS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 83.]

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Thursday, 20th February, 1879.*MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Tramways, *appointed and nominated.*SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR.
QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: May I ask the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government can confirm the news which has appeared in the second editions of to-day's papers in relation to the war in Zululand?

EARL CADOGAN: My Lords, Her Majesty's Government have received no official confirmation of the news which appeared in the second editions of this morning's papers. That news, which is from Madeira, has been brought by the Asiatic, an extra steamer of the Union Company's Line, which left Cape Town on the 29th ultimo, two days later than the Dunrobin Castle, which brought the first news of the disaster of the 22nd January. The Asiatic took between 21 and 22 days to reach Madeira. The next regular steamer was to have left Cape Town on the 4th instant. If she had called at St. Vincent, we ought to have had telegrams from thence on the 17th, or, at latest, the 19th instant. As, however, no telegrams have come to hand, she has probably gone direct to Madeira, and we may expect to hear from there about Saturday.

TRAMWAYS.

SELECT COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE moved the appointment of a Select Committee on Tramways, in accordance with the promise he gave to the House last year. He would remind their Lordships that hitherto the question had been mainly confined to tramways in streets and towns; but there were now several schemes for tramways carried along roads in the country. The matter, therefore, now required careful re-consideration, and it was very desirable there should be full inquiry.

Moved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the regulations which it may be desirable to impose in relation to the construction and use of Tramways.—(The Earl of Redesdale.)

LORD HOUGHTON presented a Petition, signed by several persons on behalf of certain Railway Companies, for inquiry respecting steam tramways in connection with the passenger duty; and said that, in order to give effect to the prayer of that Petition, he would move an addition to the terms of the Motion.

Moved after the word ("Tramways") to add ("and the relation of Tramways on which carriages are conveyed by steam to the present imposition of the passenger duty.")—(The Lord Houghton.)

THE EARL OF REDESDALE objected to the proposed addition.

On Question, That the words proposed to be added stand part of the Motion?
Resolved in the Negative.

Then the Original Motion agreed to.

The Lords following were named of the Committee:—

|               |                         |
|---------------|-------------------------|
| M. Ripon.     | L. Colville of Culross. |
| E. Derby.     | L. Silchester.          |
| E. Devon.     | L. Hartismere.          |
| E. Cowper.    | L. Carlingford.         |
| E. Redesdale. | L. Norton.              |
| V. Cardwell.  |                         |

The Committee to meet on Monday next at Four o'clock, and to appoint their own Chairman.

SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND—IMPOR-TATION OF ARMS AND MUNITIONS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH, in asking the Question of which he had given Notice relative to the supply of arms to the Native tribes of South Africa, said, that the disaster which had befallen our troops on January 21 had created a profound impression in the country; and it was a matter of astonishment that the Zulus should have been so well armed in the manner and to the extent they were found to be. The able despatch from the High Commissioner must have prepared the public to find that the Zulus were in strong force; but they had been taken by surprise to learn that the savages were supplied not only with muskets and rifles, but with breech-loaders and all the appliances of modern warfare. Looking at the situation of Zululand, it was obvious that those arms and appliances could only have reached the country in one of two ways—either by the Portuguese frontier or through our own Colonies. If the former method had been resorted to, he hoped Her Majesty's Government had made representations to the Portuguese Government, with the view of putting an end to the traffic. If, as had been reported, the Portuguese Government were powerless to interfere, he saw nothing to prevent an agreement being arrived at to enable our Government themselves to take action in the matter. But there was reason to believe that, in many instances, the arms had been manufactured in this country. If so, that was very serious indeed; and he was sure their Lordships would agree with him in denouncing such a traffic as most nefarious and unpatriotic. He scarcely knew what could be done; but he trusted that the Government would devise some mode of action. Certain it was that many of our brave soldiers would have been spared had the Zulus not been armed so efficiently with British weapons; and thus it was that he ventured to trouble the Government with his Question. He had to ask, Whether any steps have been taken to prevent the importation of arms and warlike stores into Zululand?

EARL CADOGAN: I can assure your Lordships that the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to this important and intricate question. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies and my noble Friend the late Secretary have been in constant correspondence with the local authorities on the subject. With regard to the export of arms from this country, that, I believe, has never been prohibited except in cases of great national emergency. With respect to the importation of arms into the Colonies of South Africa, those Colonies have their own laws and regulations, which, in the opinion of the Government, would, if strictly enforced, suffice to prevent this traffic. I need hardly state that under present circumstances it would be in the interest of Natal, as well as that of Her Majesty's Government, to do all that is possible to prevent the importation of arms to the Zulus. Perhaps I may be allowed to state the chief local regulations existing on this subject. There is no restriction on the importation of arms and ammunition to the Cape; but when imported they cannot be removed from the Queen's stores inwards without a licence. In Natal application must be made to an authority named the Arms Board in respect to the removal of arms; that body reports to the Attorney General, who accedes to or refuses the application in accordance with the instructions of the Lieutenant Governor. The importation of ammunition by private persons is forbidden. They can only be imported by the Lieutenant Governor or by an officer of the Government appointed by him in that behalf. The provisions as regards gunpowder are almost, if not quite, as stringent. In Natal and the Orange Free State the trade in ammunition is in the hands of the Government, and powder may be sold only from the Government magazines. In the Cape no great distinction is made between the trade in arms and ammunition, and gunpowder may be kept in private magazines if licensed, or, where the quantity does not exceed 100 lbs., in a place other than a licensed magazine approved by a magistrate. As to ports and harbours, the principal harbour on that coast where warlike stores can be landed is Delagoa Bay, which is in Portuguese territory: but Her Majesty's ships, which in time of war cruise in those waters, will take every care to prevent it. A correspondence has taken place between the Foreign Office and the Portuguese Government upon this subject. That Government, it is fair to say, has met us in the most friendly spirit, and has promised that its best efforts shall be directed to suppress the traffic wherever they have the power. I may give an instance to show the difficulties they have to contend with. My noble Friend says he believed Delagoa Bay was the only place where arms could be imported on those coasts; but when the Portuguese prohibited the importation at that harbour, they found that at a place north of their territory a large importation was taking place. Care will be taken to prevent it in future. I think it right to say that the arms of the Zulus have been largely obtained from Kimberley and the Diamond District, where Native labour can only be obtained by payment in guns and rifles. The Zulus will come any distance to work if they can only take away with them a gun or a rifle. I cannot help expressing my conviction that one of the most important results of Confederation, if it is ever attained, would be the establishment of a uniform system of controlling the sale of arms and ammunition in the Provinces of South Africa. I can assure the noble Viscount that every precaution has been taken and will be taken by Her Majesty's Government, and that all due vigilance will be exercised with a view of remedying the evil of which he so justly complains.

Viscount Sidmouth

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I quite feel with my noble Friend that in connection with South African affairs there cannot be a more important question than this. It is quite true, as my noble Friend says, that when I was at the Colonial Office I gave my best attention to this matter, and I am glad to hear that the present Head of the Colonial Office is doing the same. It was one of the first points to which my attention was directed, because I received from all quarters information as to the enormous quantity of arms and ammunition gradually being imported into South Africa, and over which we exercised no control. Arms in South Africa are the great object of ambition of every Zulu or Kaffir. They are, so to speak, the current coin in which the wages of labour are paid; and it has been, as we have reason to know, the policy of Cetewayo, the Zulu King, to insist on every man of his tribe somehow or other providing himself with a gun. The result has been that a very large amount of arms has been accumulated. Two years ago, while I was at the Colonial Office, I was led to believe there were not less than 500,000 arms of one sort or another in the Southern part of Africa. I am bound to say I think my noble Friend touched very lightly indeed on the conduct of the Portuguese Government in this respect; for it is my opinion that a very large portion indeed of the supply finds its way through Delagoa Bay—in fact, I believe the importation formed a large part of the revenue of that port. I am glad to hear that the Portuguese Government have promised, at all events, to exercise restrictions; but I should have been more pleased to hear that they had suppressed the trade altogether—for nothing short of that will have the desired effect. The question of Confederation has an important bearing on this matter. It was one of the great objects I had in view, when I urged the Confederation of the South African Colonies, that uniform laws as to the sale and regulation of arms should be adopted. In August 1875, I was able, after a good deal of correspondence and negotiation, to bring together a Conference here in London. At that Conference were represented the Colony of Natal, the Province of Griqualand West, and the Orange Free State. One Colony was wanting—namely, the Cape—and the Transvaal. The Transvaal had mixed itself up with Native hostilities, and the Cape was so very jealous of anything that approached a mere suspicion of Confederation that although Mr. Molteno, the Minister of the Colony, came to England at the time, he did not attend the Conference. That Conference met and discussed various matters—the sale of spirits, the education and apprenticeship of Kaffir children, and finally the introduction and regulation of arms. There was perfect unanimity as to the course which ought to be adopted on this latter point; and the Conference came to the conclusion—very sensibly—that in order to do anything effective it was necessary to secure the co-operation of all the European Settlements in South Africa. It is perfectly obvious that it must be so, because if you left one side open for the introduction of arms, it would be utterly useless for the others to pass restrictive laws. I endeavoured to get Mr. Molteno to give his support; but he could not see the matter in the same light. Consequently, the conclusions arrived at by the Conference were of no avail. That is a circumstance I have never ceased to regret, for it lies very much at the root of our present difficulty, and is the real cause of the loss of so many valuable lives. I understand that the Portuguese Government have now undertaken to impose restrictions on the sale of arms in Delagoa Bay. That will be a very great advantage if they carry out their engagement. And I am glad to find my noble Friend has laid on the Table documents which show that the Cape Government is disposed to view the matter in a very different spirit from that which it showed a few years ago; but it appears to me that the enactments my noble Friend quoted tonight require tightening up a good deal. There can be no doubt that arms have come through Delagoa Bay, and I regret to say through English merchants. There have also been rough manufactories in the interior beyond our Border where weapons are produced, which, although of a very inferior order, are capable of being used with deadly effect. There is an important despatch of Sir Garnet Wolseley's in existence upon the question of the importation of arms, and if there is no objection, I would suggest to the Government that its publication at this period would be interesting and useful.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH asked if the second port which the noble Earl alluded to was in Portuguese territory?

EARL CADOGAN said it was.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 20th February, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—
Prosecution of Offences * [68].
Second Reading—Referred to Select Committee—
Coroners * [67].

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPHIC DEPARTMENT)—CONTINENTAL TELEGRAPH CHARGES.—QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is true that in the re-arrangement of the telegraphic charges between Great Britain and Germany and Holland, which came into operation on the 1st of January last, the additional shilling formerly charged on messages from provincial offices has been done away with; and, if so, whether he contemplates, in the case of telegrams to other foreign countries, the abolition of the differential rate at present charged on messages from the provinces?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said, that the new tariff with regard to telegraphic messages between Great Britain and Germany and Holland came into operation on the 1st of January. Under its operation, the additional charges made upon provincial messages over London messages had been abolished; and it was intended, as opportunity occurred, to do away with the differential rate which still prevailed in the case of provincial messages to other foreign countries.

The Earl of Carnarvon

ECCLESIASTICAL SALARIES (INDIA).

QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Why the Return relating to Ecclesiastical Salaries in India, ordered by this House so long ago as the 5th July 1877, has not yet been presented?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I am sorry to say that the Return has not yet been received; but it has been a very difficult one to prepare. After I observed the hon. Member's Question, in December last, I caused a letter to be written to India on the subject; but we have not at present received any reply.

ARMY—ARMY RESERVES—MILITIA.

QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Secretary of State for War, How many recruits were obtained for the Militia in 1878; and, what was the number of the First Class Army Reserve on the 1st January 1879?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said, that the number of recruits to the first-named body in 1878 was 39,395; while the number of the latter branch on the 1st of January, 1879, was 15,085.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTIONS.

MR. BENTINCK asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, any measure for the better preventing of accidents on Railways?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, we have not lost sight of the subject, but have been considering during the Recess the serious and difficult questions which are raised by the Report and recommendations of the Royal Commission on Railway Accidents. I would beg my hon. Friend to excuse me from stating the opinion of the Government on the subject until I bring in the Bill respecting the Railway Commission of which we have already given Notice.

MR. BRIGGS asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been drawn to the case of a child five years old named Charles Richard Hindle, who was killed on Saturday last by a passing train at Harrison's Level Crossing on the London and Tilbury Railway; whether he is aware that within the last ten years six persons have been killed and several others seriously injured at the same place; if it is true that the Railway Company propose laying down two more lines of rails, thus adding considerably to the danger; and, whether, looking at all the circumstances of the case, he will take steps to compel the Railway Company to prevent this destruction of human life?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I have heard with regret of the accident to which the hon. Gentleman alludes, a return of which has been received from the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, and not from the London and Tilbury Company, as is stated in the Question. I fear it is too true that within the last 10 years six persons have been killed and several others seriously injured at the same place. I have no information as to whether the Company propose to lay down more lines of rail, nor have I any power to make inquiry from a Railway Company on the subject. On referring to a Paper which was laid before Parliament the year before last, I find that the Railway Company stated that they were prepared to take steps for the erection of a bridge at this dangerous spot, if the expense was shared with them by the Corporation of Blackburn; but that the apportionment of the expense between the two parties was the obstacle to carrying out the work. I would again remind the hon. Member that I have no power to insist upon any action in a matter of this kind; but whatever steps I can take to guard against the destruction of human life I will take.

URBAN AND RURAL SANITARY DISTRICTS.—COUNTY MAPS—QUESTION.

MR. STANSFELD asked the President of the Local Government Board,

Whether there is in his Department information which would enable him to lay upon the Table of the House the following Return, viz.—Return in respect of each county in England and Wales, in the shape of a map, showing the boundaries of the urban and rural sanitary districts, or parts thereof within the county; also showing the boundaries of all unions being wholly or partly within the county; together with an index for each county of all such districts and parts of districts and unions, referring to numbers on the map, with the population thereof respectively as near as can be ascertained; and, whether he can provide the Return before the day on which the County Boards Bill may be set down for Second Reading?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, there is, no doubt, much information in the Department which would be available for the preparation of such a Return and map; but it would be a work of considerable time, labour, and expense, that I cannot at present promise it shall be undertaken. I have, however, recently given instructions for a revised list of unions and constituent parishes, and will see if it is possible to add any further information such as would meet, to some extent, the wish expressed by the right hon. Gentleman; but I could not undertake that it shall be available before the second reading of the County Boards Bill.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU KING—NEGOTIATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. JAMES asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is the case that an interview between Sir Theophilus Shepstone and the Envoys of Cetewayo took place on the Zulu frontier on the 19th of October 1877; if so, whether any despatches are in the possession of Her Majesty's Government stating the substance of the proceedings between Sir Theophilus and the Envoys on that occasion, and whether they can be laid before Parliament?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, the despatches relating to the interview alluded to by the hon. Member arrived last spring, I think, and were marked "Confidential." I did not think it desirable to produce them at the time, because they related to a question then still pending before the Boundary Commission appointed by the Natal Government; and it seemed better that the production of the Papers on the subject should be delayed until after the award had been pronounced by the High Commissioner. That objection does not now exist; and the despatches will be presented among the forthcoming Papers.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT—BACK-TO-BACK HOUSES.—QUESTION.

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether that Board has, after communication with the local authorities, conceded the principle of erecting back-to-back houses; and, whether he would object to lay upon the Table of the House, a Report upon the subject prepared by Mr. Netten Radcliffe, of the Medical Department of the Board, and Mr. P. Gordon Smith, the Board's Architect, after local inquiry in the district where the concession of the principle was granted?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, it would not be correct to say that the principle of erecting back-to-back houses has been conceded by the Local Government Board; but it is true that in the case of Idle, in the North Brierly Union, the Board have stated that, owing to the exceptional circumstances of the locality, they considered that this form of construction might be recognized, provided certain conditions could be complied with, and the regulation brought within the operation of bye-laws under the Public Health Act. But no bye-laws have as yet been submitted by the local authority, so that none have as yet been sanctioned by the Board. I should mention that one of the peculiar circumstances is that Parliament has sanctioned back-to-back houses in the neighbouring towns of Leeds and Bradford. There is no objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Report of Mr. Netten Radcliffe and Mr. Gordon Smith on this case.

THE METROPOLITAN FIRE BRIGADE —LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce during the present Session any measure dealing with the subjects reported on by the Select Committee on the Metropolitan Fire Brigade?

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, this is an important subject, no doubt, and one to which the attention of the Government has been called; but I do not know whether, under the present pressure of Business, we are able to promise the introduction of a measure this Session. Attention is being particularly called to the matter owing to the fire which occurred at the Colonial Office in Downing Street the other day.

BOARD OF WORKS (IRELAND)—CLARE CASTLE PIER AND HARBOUR.

QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his Department will recommend the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland to advance, on the security of the dues received by that body from the local authorities of the Clare Castle Pier and Harbour, county Clare, since 1843-4, the sum reported by the Board of Works engineer to be necessary for improving the pier and harbour, so that the existing obstruction to navigation may be minimized, if not altogether removed?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, the subject mentioned by the hon. Member for Ennis has not yet been laid before the Treasury, and I understand from the Chairman of the Board of Works in Ireland it is not likely to be so, unless a satisfactory answer is given to the inquiries which were made in the letter addressed to the hon. Member by that Board on the 15th November last. Should the Board of Works recommend a loan, such as that mentioned by the hon. Member, the matter will receive the best attention of the Treasury. I think, however, he will see it would be quite inconsistent with the position of the Treasury to take the initiative in making a loan without first being consulted by the local authorities.

ARMY (INDIA)—OFFICERS ON SICK LEAVE.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to a statement that the Government of India has never required officers coming from India to England on sick leave to appear before a Medical Board on arrival, If he will state whether orders issued by His Excellency the Commander in Chief of the Bombay Presidency are recognized by the Secretary of State for India in Council; and, if he will explain why the travelling expenses in England of the Paymaster of the 3rd Hussars have been disallowed by the Secretary of State for India in Council, that officer having received an order, dated Bombay, 4th April 1878, directing him to appear before a Medical Board in England?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I am informed that the paymaster referred to was refused his travelling expenses in accordance with the invariable rule of the Government of India, which has never admitted as a charge against Indian Revenues the cost occasioned by an officer's appearing before a Medical Board in London under orders originating solely with the War Office. The Order of the Commander-in-Chief in Bombay was in pursuance of the existing regulation of the War Office, which has since been withdrawn.

WATER COMPANIES BILLS -- PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS.—QUESTION.

MR. A. H. BROWN asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, having regard to the numerous Private Bills which have for their object the supply of water, and which Parliament every Session has to deal with, he proposes to take any steps to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee which sat last year upon the Public Health Act (1875) Amendment Act, and especially that one which says that when a Water Company or a Sanitary Authority go to a rural district for water, or when their mains pass through a rural district which is in want of water, they shall be compelled to supply such district on proper terms; and, whether, to carry out the views of the Committee, the officers of the Local Government Board will be instructed to present to Parliament Reports to guide the various Committees which will be appointed to consider these Water Bills as to the wants of the districts from which the water is taken, or through which the water mains will pass?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH: Sir, whenever I have the opportunity of introducing a Bill to amend the Public Health Act (1875) Amendment Act, I will not fail to give careful consideration to the recommendations of the Committee, and especially to the one referred to in the Question. As to the suggested Reports, they would necessitate careful local inquiry in every locality to which Water Bills refer, and there is no staff at my disposal adequate to such a duty. In their Reports to the Committee on Water Bills, however, the Local Government Board are this year drawing attention to the difficulties in which sanitary authorities may be placed by the inclusion of their districts in the limits of supply of a company unless the company bond fide intend to afford the district a proper supply, and we suggest that if this intention is not proved the district should not be included in the Bill. We further point out that if the district is not supplied by the company within a prescribed time the prior right of the company to supply should cease.

ARMY—THE 24TH REGIMENT.

QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to allow the vacancies occasioned by the death of the officers of the 24th Regiment, who lately fell in the performance of their duty in South Africa, to be filled up by the survivors of both battalions of that Regiment, or whether it is intended to allow half-pay officers to intrude?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, in answer to the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford, I have to say that until we know in strict accuracy what vacancies have unfortunately occurred, I am not able to speak positively on the matter; and I would, therefore, be glad if he would kindly repeat his Question at some later date. At the same time, I am bound to say, as far as my own opinion goes, that it would only be a proper tribute to the gallantry with which the 24th have fought that, as far as possible, the vacancies should be filled up by the surviving officers.

THE TICHBORNE CASE—SIR ROGER D. TICHBORNE.—QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: Although the Question is not on the Paper in the form in which I gave Notice, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention to recommend the release of Sir Roger D. Tichborne, or, at least, the reduction of his punishment?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: No, Sir, I have no intention of interfering.

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS.

ALTERATION OF QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN, in whose name the following Notice stood on the Paper:—

"To ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any, and, if so, what notice of the conduct of the Constabulary authorities in ordering the men of the Constabulary to attend the Catholic Churches in Galway County for the sole purpose of taking down the words uttered by the priest from the altar," said: Sir, the Question on the Paper is not my Question, and I shall not put it. I do not see why it should be altered in the way it is. It is not my Question at all. Mine, Sir, was to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government — [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is not in Order. The Question put on the Paper by him was revised under my authority, as not being consistent with the Rules and Orders of the House.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: Well, Sir, I wish to ask you, whether I have the privilege of asking the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take, and, if so, what, notice of the conduct of the Duke of Marlborough, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in any case?

No reply being given,

MAJOR O'GORMAN: Then, Sir, I shall repeat my Question on another day.

HIGHWAY ACT, 1878—CLAUSE 16.

QUESTION.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE asked the President of the Local Government Board, If it is true that the Law Officers of the Crown have decided that an application under Clause 16 of the Highway Act of last Session to dismain

Major O'Gorman

a road must apply to the whole of the trust, and may not apply to any part of a trust unless such part shall have been specially described in the Local Act constituting the trust; if it is the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown that the second paragraph of Clause 16, beginning "Subject as aforesaid," applies only to main roads which have been disturnpiked since the passing of the Act or have been adopted under Clause 15 and not to roads which have been disturnpiked between the 31st of December 1870 and the passing of the Act; and, if it is his intention to introduce a Bill amending the Act in these and other particulars?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, the Law Officers have given their opinion that a Provisional Order can only deal with an entire disturnpiked road, or a road separately described in the Local Act. They have not been consulted on the second point, as to which no doubt has been entertained by the Department—namely, that the paragraph in question applies only to roads disturnpiked since the passing of the Act, or to such as have been adopted under Section 15. I have no intention, as at present advised, to amend the law in these particulars. Although it might have been convenient in some cases to have power to deal with parts of the disturnpiked roads mentioned in Section 13, it must be remembered that these roads have been exceptionally treated in their entirety since the year 1870. No doubt, it may be needful to amend the Act of last Session when we have had more experience of its working, and I have in contemplation a consolidation of the Highway Acts generally which may afford the opportunity.

NOXIOUS VAPOURS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT NEWPORT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure, during the present Session, to deal with the great and growing nuisance in certain districts arising from smoke and other noxious vapours?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he had a measure prepared on the subject and hoped to be able before long to submit it to the House.

TURKEY—PAPERS AND CORRESPONDENCE.—QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government is in possession of any Reports or Papers on the subject of the transactions relating to the suppression of the insurrection in Macedonia; and, if so, when such Reports or Papers will be presented to the House; and, whether it is intended to present any further Papers relating to Turkey down to a later date than those recently published, and the latest of which bears date September 30th 1878?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, in reply to both interrogatories of the hon. and learned Member for Oxford, I have to state that further Papers relating to Turkey, which will include reports on the Macedonian insurrection, are being prepared as rapidly as possible, and will be distributed shortly.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE REINFORCEMENTS—CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has already arranged that Catholic Chaplains should accompany the reinforcements for the Cape; if not, whether he will take the necessary steps in order that the Catholic officers and soldiers shall not be left without the assistance of ministers of their religion?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, we are sending out one Roman Catholic chaplain to the Forces, and Lord Chelmsford has already engaged the services of a priest who is at the Cape at the present time.

ARMY—LONGFORD BARRACKS.

QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the detachment of Infantry which he promised last year should be sent to occupy Longford Barracks after the drill season was over, has ever been sent; if not, whether he has any objection now to take the necessary steps to have it sent?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, when the promise was given by my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, on the part of the War Office, that a detachment should be sent to occupy Longford Barracks, the qualification was given "that if it were possible." At the time the distribution of troops being rather low in Ireland, and still continuing so, it has been found impossible to comply with the wish of the hon. Gentleman; but I must add that the Government has not lost sight of the application.

TURKEY—FINANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether "the gentleman well versed in accounts," whom Her Majesty's Government has deputed "to make inquiries into the real condition of Turkish Finance," has made any Report to Her Majesty's Government; whether, if so, there will be any objection to lay the Report upon the Table; and, whether the statement made by Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, that no "financial engagements" in respect to loans to Turkey "will be entered into without the previous sanction of Parliament," may be understood to involve that, without such previous sanction, there shall be no engagement taken for the appointment by Her Majesty's Government of any Commissioner to be entrusted with the collection of or control over Duties or Taxes to serve as a guarantee in respect of moneys to be advanced to the Turkish Government, such as appear to be contemplated in the financial scheme of the Marquis de Tocqueville?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, despatches have been received from Mr. Harrison, the gentleman to whom I referred, which treat of the financial accounts of Turkey; but he has not yet been able to forward the complete Report which he was sent out specially to make. With regard to the second part of the hon. Member's Question, the answers which I gave before the adjournment for the Christmas holidays with respect to financial engagements do not refer to such a case as that which he now mentions. They refer to questions of possible engagements with regard to loans to be made to Turkey. As to the scheme to which the hon. Gentleman alludes, the Question is one which has only just arisen, and the Government has not yet had time to consider it.

CRIMINAL LAW — CASE OF JOHN NOLAN.—QUESTION.

DR. KENEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Commission appointed by him to inquire into the case of John Nolan, who died in Clerkenwell Prison, and on whom an inquest was held, in which the jury returned the following verdict,

"That the said John Nolan died of congestion of the lungs, and that death was accelerated by excessive and repeated punishments, on bread and water, ordered by the governor and sanctioned by the medical officer. The jury are further of opinion that it is impossible for the medical officer to attend to his duties at the Prison without being resident. The jury are also of opinion that all kinds of repeated punishment should only be administered under the supervision of the visiting committee," has yet made a report; and, if not, how soon it may be expected, and whether he will lay it upon the Table of the House, and have it printed and circulated among Members?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Report of the inquiry instituted into the case of that man, who died in Clerkenwell Prison, was received a week or 10 days ago, and if the hon. Member moved for it, it would be given as an unopposed Return.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY inquired whether the evidence was included?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: No.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — THE EDUCATION CODE.—QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether the Government will consider the expediency of redrafting the Education Code, which under the various titles of "Revised Code" and "New Code" has now existed for eighteen years, during which time a large number of Articles have been wholly or partially cancelled or modified, by which process the Code had been rendered rather complicated and incomprehensible?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the Code is no doubt complicated; but this is due more, I think, to the somewhat complex contingencies under which deductions are made from the annual grants, rather than to want of arrangement or clearness of expression. No doubt, it could, however, be put, if we started entirely afresh, in a more succinct form. On the other hand, the school managers and teachers are well acquainted with the present form of the Code, although the conditions embodied in it are not sufficiently stereotyped to enable them to instantaneously recognize them if presented in an entirely new shape. All the printed Returns now in use both by the managers as well as the Department would have to be altered. On the whole, I think inconvenience rather than advantage would result from the sudden adoption of my hon. Friend's suggestion, though, in the annual revision of the Code, no opportunity will be lost by the Education Department in improving both its form and phraseology.

TRAFFIC REGULATIONS ON THE THAMES—THE OFFICIAL COMMITTEE. QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, When he anticipates being able to place upon the Table of the House the final Evidence and Report of the departmental Committee of the Board of Trade relative to the Rule of the Road in the navigation of the River Thames?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, the official Committee which I appointed to consider the traffic regulations of the River Thames have been constantly engaged upon the subject for the last four months. They have found it absolutely necessary, owing to the importance and difficulty of the subject, both to seek and to accept a large amount of evidence. All due despatch has been used, but I fear it will be impossible for the Report and additional evidence to be presented for some weeks without materially interfering with the advantage which I hope we shall derive from the investigations of this able Committee. I can, however, assure the hon. Gentleman that no time has been, or will be, lost in the matter.

RIVERS CONSERVANCY BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the proposed Rivers Conservancy Bill is to apply to Scotland?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH: Sir, the Bill prepared under instructions from the Local Government Office has been designed as applicable to England and Wales only. I am unable to say, without consulting the Lord Advocate, whether its provisions can be made applicable to Scotland.

EGYPT—DISTURBANCES AT CAIRO.

QUESTION.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government had received any official communication with regard to the statement in the newspapers of to-day that disturbances had occurred at Cairo, that Nubar Pasha had been compelled to resign, and that Mr. Rivers Wilson had sent in his resignation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Government have received a communication on this subject, which is substantially the same as that which has already appeared in the newspapers, with regard both to the disturbances at Cairo and the resignation or dismissal of Nubar Pasha. We have, however, received no information to show that Mr. Rivers Wilson has tendered his resignation.

VACCINATION ACTS—CASE OF JOSEPH ABEL.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that Joseph Abel of Faringdon, Berks, after being convicted twenty-five times, and subjected to costs and fines amounting to £35 17s. 6d. for refusing to have his children vaccinated, has been served with fresh summonses for the same offence; and, whether he will apply to Parliament for power to control such proceedings?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH: Sir, I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the figures given by the hon. and learned Gentleman's Question, and I have heard recently from Mr. Abel that a fresh summons has been issued against him. My opinion, speaking generally, of the impolicy of too frequent prosecutions has been often stated, and I need not repeat it; but I must say that the guardians, in the course which they pursue, are exercising a discretion with which the law intrusts them. I have no intention of proposing to ask Parliament for powers to enable me to interfere in such cases, nor, were I otherwise minded, does the experience of the debate and division of last Session lead me to suppose that the House would be willing to concede any such powers.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any further information from Natal since last week in confirmation or otherwise of the statements which have appeared in the newspapers this afternoon?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I understand that the intelligence which has appeared in the newspapers this evening was telegraphed from Madeira, to which place it had been brought by the steamer Asiatic, which was timed to leave the Cape the day after the Dunrobin Castle, which brought the first news of the disaster. We have as yet received no telegram from the Asiatic at the Colonial Office; but, of course, it is possible that one may arrive this evening; and I need scarcely say that I shall at the earliest possible moment communicate to the House that or any other intelligence I may receive.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER OF BUSINESS—THE ARMY AND NAVY ESTIMATES.

QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I think, Sir, it would be for the convenience of the House if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would state what Business will be taken on Monday next, because it is at present doubtful whether the Navy or Army Estimates will be taken on that day? I may also observe that the Navy Estimates are not yet in the hands of hon. Members.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, we propose to take the Army Estimates on Monday.

MR. GOSCHEN: It would also be for the convenience of hon. Members if the First Lord of the Admiralty would state when the Navy Estimates will be laid upon the Table?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, I expect that they will be laid upon the Table this week.

LONDON BANKRUPTCY COURT—EXCLUSION OF REPORTERS.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is true that during the examination in the London Bankruptcy Court of James Morton, the largest debtor to the City of Glasgow Bank, reporters were excluded; and, if he can explain why that portion of the investigation of a great public scandal, being conducted in England, is withheld from the public?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR JOHN HOLKER): Sir, during the examination of Mr. James Morton, reporters can hardly be said to have been excluded, for no reporters applied for admission. If representatives of the Press had, however, asked to be allowed to be present at the proceedings, their request would not have been granted. Mr. Morton was before the Bankruptcy Court as a bankrupt, and not in his character of debtor to the Glasgow Bank. The examination was not the public examination which takes place after the bankrupt's statement of affairs has been filed, but a private examination, appointed by the Court upon the application of the trustee, and resorted to for the purpose of interrogating the bankrupt as to the disposal of his estate and effects. At such an examination no reporters are allowed to be present, except the authorized shorthand writer, who takes notes for use in the bankruptcy proceedings and not for publication. I may point out to the hon. Gentleman that if the evidence taken at such private examinations were allowed to be published, the whole object of the examination would frequently be frustrated.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

RESOLUTION. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to the First Resolution, as amended [17th February],

"That, whenever the Committee of Supply appointed for the consideration of the ordinary Army, Navy, and Civil Service Estimates stands as the first Order of the Day on a Monday, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question."

And which Amendment was,

After the word "Monday," to insert the words "and the Motion be made, That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Debate resumed.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that he proposed to withdraw his Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in view of the numerous Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions, of which Notice had been given, suggested that time would be saved if some agreement were entered into with respect to them. He supported the proposal of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), that greater latitude of discussion should be allowed on the Report of Supply. In 1864 a Question was put to the Speaker on the subject of the limit of discussion to be allowed on the Report of Supply. According to the ruling of the Speaker, the right of discussion was as large and as open on Report of Supply as it was on going into Committee of Supply. If this really were so, it was plain that any Member could bring forward any subject of debate on the stage of the Report of Supply. Again, in 1857, his right hon. Friend who now represented Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) intended to bring forward on the Navy Estimates a Resolution relating to the general Expenditure of the Government; but when his right hon. Friend was engaged in conversation with Lord John Russell, the First Lord of the Admiralty was adroit enough to slip into Committee of Supply, and the opportunity was lost. The consequence was that his right hon. Friend brought forward his Motion on the Report of Supply, notwithstanding the fact that it was not confined to the particular Votes. If, by the general assent of the House or otherwise, a general Rule was laid down on this point, no doubt a great part of the difficulty might be removed, inasmuch as no Member would be deprived of the Constitutional right of bringing on grievances before Supply was voted. If there was a tendency on the part of the Government to draw the strings tighter, that was all the more reason why Members should not relinquish the privileges they now possessed. If the Rule proposed by the Government were adopted without modifications, what would happen? The Government would have got Mondays, when no grievances could be brought forward at all, and there would be nothing to prevent the practice growing up of passing all the Estimates on Mondays. Thus all the money might be voted without grievances being brought forward. Certainly that was not an arrangement which the House could contemplate with satisfaction. He was one of those old-fashioned persons who thought it was not a good thing to part with Constitutional principles in order to get rid of small inconveniences. It was like a man burning his house down to warm his hands. What was the object held forth in order to induce the House to adopt this change? It was said that if the House went into Committee of the House at once it would have more time to discuss the details of the Estimates. He believed that this was a very great delusion. The time most uselessly spent in this House was that which was devoted to the discussion of the details of the Estimates. In the time of Joseph Hume, when the old system of jobbery and sinecures prevailed, good might be effected by attacking the Estimates in detail; but at the present day the only successful way to reduce the Estimates was by raising questions of principle, which were usually brought forward on the Question "That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair." It was frequently objected out-of-doors that Parliament talked too much; but, as Lord Beaconsfield once observed, "Parliament" meant an Assembly that was engaged in talk; and it was the discussion of matters of this kind which ripened public opinion, and which prepared the mind of the Government for carrying into effect the objects pointed at in those discussions. The privilege of bringing on grievances before Supply had been a valuable safeguard in former times, and he thought it was so now; and he knew of no circumstances which could induce him to think that the House of Commons would do well to enlarge the powers of the Executive Government at the expense of the authority of Parliament. No doubt the House found itself confronted with many difficulties. The Government, as far as he could see, had offered no solution of one of these. At present the state of the Notice Paper was such that when a subject of great importance arose there was no means of bringing it before the House, except by the irregular method of a Motion for adjournment. This was a matter to which he thought the attention of the Government might well have been directed. If this Resolution were carried in its present form, and if the Government endeavoured to force on their Estimates on successive Mondays, there would probably be great delay in the discussion of them for the purpose of compelling the Government to propose the Estimates on those days on which general discussions could be raised on the Motion for going into Committee. Thus the Government would not save time, but waste time. Moreover, it was quite certain that many questions would be brought forward irregularly on Motions for adjournment. The immediate effect of shutting one door to discussion would be to open another. This was not a Party question, nor was he at all concerned in supporting the precedent of 1872. It was not a very binding precedent, for it was seven years since it was established, and it had been followed only in three. That did not look as if the House considered it a very good precedent in itself. But once a step of this kind was taken, it was made a precedent for taking another. Thus the precedent of 1872 was made use of for the present purpose. The power to state grievances was said to involve a great Constitutional principle. For his own part, he could not understand a great Constitutional principle which was to apply on Thursday, but not on Monday. This was a question which affected both Parties alike; it was a question of majorities and minorities. A minority ought so to act as if it would one day become a majority, and a majority as if it would one day become a minority. But if they threw all the power into the hands of the Government they would deprive the minority of its legitimate right of discussion. The Government had a very powerful arm in their majority. The minority had also a very powerful arm in their right to object to the policy of the Government; but that was a power which the Government sought very seriously to limit. The course of a river was according to the nature of the country through which it flowed; and if it were sought to dam it up, one never knew the amount of mischief which might result. A friend of his bought an estate in Scotland, and there was a stream upon it which he endeavoured to control. He dammed it up, but it overflowed its banks and caused a good deal of mischief, so that at last his friend said, in the bitterness of his heart, that there were only two things he had never been able to manage, and they were a Highland stream and a woman. He (Sir William Harcourt) ventured to suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there was another thing as difficult to bank up, and that was the House of Commons. The Government, he held, would have done better if it had left this alone. It was quite impossible that a matter of this kind could be satisfactorily settled merely by a majority. They could depart from the ancient Rules of the House only by general consent. The proposition of his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) that Members should be allowed to discuss grievances on Report of Supply would go far to reconcile the House to the alterations proposed by the Government. But if there were to be no statement of grievances, either on going into Committee of Supply or on the Report, they would be embarking on a very dangerous course.

MR. GORST complained that the Resolution was intended to put down, not obstruction, but criticism. Nothing was more salutary for Public Departments than to have their acts freely criticized; and to make Motions on going into Committee of Supply was the only way by which private Members could secure the opportunity of criticizing the proceedings of any Administration. If the Government were afraid of discussion of a grievance introduced by a private Member, they had recourse to the expedient of a "count out;" and now they made an attempt, by taking advantage of the outcry raised against obstruction, to pass a Resolution which would put down criticism. We were going through exactly the same phase as they were going through at Berlin. The disease in London was in a milder form. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not bring in a gagging Act and play the part of Prince Bismarck on a large scale, so he was playing it on a minor scale, and had brought in a gagging Resolution. It had been said that Ministers in charge of the Estimates found it impossible to make their Statements except at very late and inconvenient hours, owing to the multitude of questions brought forward on going into Committee of Supply. But last year the First Lord of the Admiralty made his Statement at half-past 5, while the Speaker was in the Chair, and other Ministers could do the same if they chose. He was quite aware that the privilege of bringing forward grievances on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply might be abused; but he thought the House might rely upon the influence of public opinion and a man's regard for his own reputation to prevent the discussion of grievances of a frivolous nature. If this Resolution were passed it would lower the character of the House.

MR. J. COWEN said, he was one of those Members who had been taken somewhat by surprise at the precipitate manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had submitted those Resolutions. He was not a Member of the Select Committee that sat last Session, and he had not an opportunity of seeing the Motion that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put on the Paper until Saturday morning. Since then, however, he had closely followed the discussion on Monday night, had studied the Report of the Committee, and looked through the evidence they took. He gave it as his opinion that the Government would not succeed in accomplishing what they wanted by the changes that were now proposed. Of course, it was only an opinion; but his deliberate judgment was that the Ministers would lose as much time in discussing the Resolutions as they would gain during the Session, even if they were eventually carried and put in force. It behoved Members of Parliament to guard with incessant watchfulness and constant jealousy the Rules under which their proceedings were conducted. These Parliamentary laws were conceived in the interests of free discussion, and framed for the purpose of securing the right of minorities. Many of them were memorials of interesting and important historical struggles. They formed a register of successful encounters between representative and arbitrary authority. The House of Commons, therefore, would do wisely in opposing the slightest encroachment upon hardly fought for and dearly cherished privileges. With this general declaration he was willing to admit—as all men familiar with the House of Commons must admit—that great changes had taken place in the conditions under which the legislation of this country was carried on. The work of Parliament had not only increased, but its character had altogether altered. Formerly their debates were limited to discussing the best means by which the Revenue could be levied and expended, settling the relations that had to exist between England and foreign States, and considering occasionally important Constitutional problems. Then talking was confined to these topics. Now their legislation was far-reaching. It entered into the minute ramifications of commercial, civil, and social life. They had taken under their inspection schools and ships, factories and mines. They had covered the country with a network of intricate sanitary regulations. These duties entailed a great increase of administration, and an increase of administration brought a larger amount of legislation. The administrative work of the Government in England had quadrupled during the last quarter of a century. In addition to that, the number of men who took part in the discussions had gradually enlarged. Only 30 or 40 Members in a Session spoke some years ago, now nine or 10 times that number engaged in their debates. All these circumstances pointed to the necessity of some change from time to time in the forms by which their work was guided. Another and more subtle, but still a potent influence was at work, which affected their doings. A few years ago the Members of the House of Commons consisted of sons and relatives of the aristocracy, country gentlemen, professional men, barristers, officers of the Army and Navy, and old and retired men of business. They might not have a uniformity of opinion; but there existed amongst them a uniformity of manners, of feeling, and of custom. They were all drawn from the same social strata. They had now a more extended suffrage—enfranchising not only the trading but the artizan classes—and this had slightly so far, but ultimately would largely, affect the composition of the House. The new Members representing a more democratic section of the State had sentiments and feelings not altogether in common with other classes, and a great deal of the friction—political and personal—that they had experienced in recent Sessions had unquestionably been produced by the imperfect mingling of these new elements. He admitted all this, and any reasonable proposal on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to adapt the Rules of the House to the constantly shifting phases of Parliamentary life he had no objection to; but he would resist, stoutly and strenuously, any attempt to infringe upon the sacred privileges of English Parliamentary existence—the redress of grievances before the granting of Supplies. The Resolution proposed struck at the foundation of this principle. It was not a large concession that was asked, it was true. It only affected one day of the week; but if it were granted, other and further demands would follow. The only course for the independent Members was to meet the proposition with uncompromising resistance at the start. It was no use their concealing from themselves the reason why these Rules were proposed. The Government thought the progress of Business had been interfered with by the active criticism of the Irish Members. What was called the obstruction of the Gentlemen who sat below the Gangway had disconcerted the Ministerial arrangements. These new Rules were framed for the purpose of weakening the power of resistance of the Gentlemen who sat around him. He begged to point out, however, that they aimed at a matter that really they had no grounds of complaint with. The obstruction—if such was to be the word used—applied to Votes in Committee; but there was no attempt to alter the power of resistance there. What the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to do was to prevent Members raising discussions on principles of policy before the money was granted. So far as he was concerned, he would say that whatever might be the result, he would never vote for any infringement of that law. He thought the very moderate Amendment that had been suggested by the noble Lord the Leader of the Oppo-

Sir William Harcourt

but as the result of many Parliamentary Committees. No fewer than three Speakers of the House, as well as many other eminent personages, had agreed in stating that of late years the enormous increase in the number of irrelevant Amendments moved on the House going into Supply, not by one individual or one body of individuals alone, but by all sections of the House, was such as greatly to impede the Public Business and to necessitate alteration. He hoped the House would in some form or other pass the Rule, because he believed it would tend not to impair, but to preserve, the privileges of the House. His noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) had made the offer of a concession; and he thought it would be well for all parties if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could see his way to its acceptance. But, in any case, it was not creditable to waste time in discussing a matter so easily understood; and he hoped they would show that they were really a business House, by permitting in some shape or another a settlement of this question.

MR. NEWDEGATE: The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) rests his hopes of regulating the Business of the House upon the support of public opinion; but he must be aware that there is a section who have upon this subject openly defied the public opinion of the House during the last three Sessions. The Committee upstairs was bound to take that fact into its consideration, because it was appointed with reference to the continuance of that system of obstruction. I wish to recall to the attention of the House that this is not a new subject. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) adverted to the precedent of 1857; but he must remember that in 1861 there was a Committee of Public Business, presided over by Sir James Graham, because the discussions of the House had become frivolous, multifarious, and irrelevant. He has totally omitted to mention that the effect of the recommendations of that Committee was that Friday was appointed for such discussions as he desires to promote, and that the Government were enjoined to place Supply for Friday, in order that hon. Members of this House might have an opportunity of bringing forward for its consideration whatever subjects they wished. That arrangement was made subsequent to the precedent of 1857, to which the hon. and learned Member has referred. The real fact of the case is—as anyone who will read the Evidence may see—that the House of Commons felt that its character, its weight in the country, its position as an Estate of the Realm, was being imperilled by the introduction of these multifarious subjects of debate. Another opportunity had been given to hon. Members for obtaining information when the whole system of Questions, with which our Sittings commence, was inaugurated in 1861. The whole tendency of the arrangements in this House has been in favour of giving increased opportunities for discussion to the non-official Members of this House; until we have come to such an abuse of that privilege—we have seen these facilities so much taken advantage of—that the character of this House as a Legislative Assembly is again endangered. When the Committee of the last Session made a recommendation that the Government should have Monday evening for Supply without any discussion or your, Sir, leaving the Chair, they proposed that the same restriction should be placed against discussion on the House going into Committee on Ways and Means. The right hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) thought, and I agreed with him, that that would be placing Monday at the disposal of the Government to too great an extent; and I am glad that Her Majesty's Government have given up the proposal to bar general discussion before going into Committee of Ways and Means on Mondays. My own belief is that this House is endangering its position in the eyes of the country by undue discussion upon minor and multifarious subjects. I have heard from persons out-of-doors, over and over again, that unless the House of Commons succeeds in putting down the system of obstruction, to which it was subject for three successive Sessions, it would fall in the estimation of the country, and that the other Estates of the Realm would be invested with undue power. I ask Members of this House, do they wish to hand over their real power of legislation to the House of Lords, or do they wish to see it monopolized by the Crown? If the House of Commons intends to retain its position as the most powerful element in the Constitution, it must convince public opinion by regulating, limiting, controlling, and elevating its debates—that it merits the great trust which has hitherto been reposed in it.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY submitted that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire's (Mr. Newdegate's) argument was not consistent with the facts of the case. The Resolution did not touch anything in the shape of obstruction, such as had been alleged against hon. Members on that side of the House; and he thought it unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman should have entered upon an irritating topic, which was better kept out of the way until the time came when it must be discussed, which would be when the second Resolution was placed before them. He ventured to assert that no peculiar obstruction had been offered by Irish Members on Motions for going into Committee of Supply. This Resolution was directed to that; and, as the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had stated, it had been under the consideration of the House for years before several of his hon. Friends around him, and against whom the charge of obstruction was levelled, entered the House at all. The matter was one which, in his opinion, ought to be approached very quietly and very seriously. There were few hon. Members who would not admit that there was great inconvenience caused by a Minister being kept waiting night after night to introduce the subject of Supply. And when he did obtain an opportunity of bringing forward the subject, his statements were frequently made to very small and dead Houses in consequence of the discussions that had preceded them. Could not that evil be met without abrogating the real privileges of the House of Commons? He believed that it could well be done. The proposition, moreover, before the House was not the original proposition of the Government. The Government asked much more than it was prepared now to take; and, while looking at that which they insisted on, they could not forget that what they did originally ask would seriously, in the opinion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, have crippled the privileges of the House. For his own part, speaking as an individual Member, he thought that if the Government would accept the proposal to permit discussion on the Report of Supply, it would go a long way to meet the objections felt by many Members to the Resolution. But if that concession were made, it must be done thoroughly, and the Report must not be taken, as it was taken now, at a very late hour of the night. It must be taken as part of the Business of the House, and as regularly as possible. He was far from believing that hon. Members should give up any of their privileges with respect to the introduction of all manner of personal questions and grievances of the people in going into Supply. On the contrary, he thought that there never was a time in the history of this country when it was so necessary for the House of Commons to preserve that power. Centralization was going on in every direction, and year by year the House was giving up its privileges to right hon. Gentlemen, the Representatives of Departments. Only last Session they gave up the management of prisons to the Home Secretary. That right hon. Gentleman knew very well that throughout the country there had been very disagreeable and painful discussions as to what had taken place in that direction. Having deprived the country of that important part of the administration, were they going to shut the mouth of the House of Commons and prevent hon. Members from bringing forward grievances in connection with that subject? At the present moment, if anyone went into the prisons of the country, he would see an army of warders bearing the effigy of the Royal Crown. This was something perfectly new in the country, and being so, it was not wholesome to make such a change. It was not desirable that the Crown should be brought into direct connection with the administration of prisons and every other part of the usual system of the country. But that was the policy of the Government, and he would ask hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House to consider that when they came to give their votes on this question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had been making use of some of his leisure time in reading Burke on the French Revolution, and had given the House an admirable resumé of the principles of liberty and licence contrasted with each other. But the question before them was neither that of liberty nor of licence; it was simply a practical question as to how the Business of the House should be carried on. And such a question should be debated quietly, and in a business-like manner. Suppose the Government obtained what it desired, and the House went into Committee of Supply on Monday, they would, he trusted, obtain from the Minister bringing forward the Estimate a more full account of the finances connected with his Department than they had been in the habit of receiving. But would they obtain a fuller discussion of the Estimates themselves by the adoption of this Resolution? Suppose Supply was moved by a Minister at half-past 5 o'clock, and at 7 o'clock, when the discussion of the Estimates came on, where would the House of Commons be? Would 10 Members remain in the House during the time they were in the habit of taking for dinner? If Supply were brought on at 5 o'clock, he believed there would be a smaller discussion of the Estimates than under the present system, so that he was not clear in his own mind that the professed object of the Government—namely, to obtain a fuller discussion of individual matters of Supply—would be obtained by this measure. Moreover, if the privileges of hon. Members were curtailed, those who felt themselves aggrieved would avail themselves of every opportunity left to them to the uttermost. For his own part, he could wish some compromise were made by the Government, such as that proposed by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, accompanied by a promise to take the Report of Supply at an early period of the evening. If that were not done, he should feel it his duty to move the adjournment of the House on frequent occasions when not prohibited by the Rules of debate. There was another consideration deserving attention. The very fact that grievances could be brought forward on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply frequently obtained their redress. He had seen grievances redressed without even their being brought forward at all. One noticeable case was that of a very cruel grievance perpetrated by a right hon. Gentleman on this side of the House. His Colleagues disapproved of the action of the particular Minister in question, and a Motion was put on the Paper to call the attention of the House to the subject before going into Committee of Supply. The Motion was postponed several times while negotiations were going on, but was not removed until such pressure was brought to bear by the Prime Minister himself that the grievance was redressed. The Motion was, therefore, never brought forward at all. If private Members were deprived of the opportunity of bringing forward grievances of the people, subjects of the Crown would be deprived of the opportunity of redress from the fear of Ministers when they were in the wrong. The House was gradually giving up everything to the Government of this country, and was gradually abrogating, as it seemed to him, that Constitution by means of which they had grown into a great and free people. He had read the other day that in Burmah the Constitution was abrogated by the King, who was stated to be an amiable young man, only at times he had a disagreeable habit of pricking with his spear anybody he disliked. He feared that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was like the King of Burmah, for he wished to prick some of his (Mr. Mitchell Henry's) own Friends with his spear; but, in doing so, he forgot that he was abrogating the Constitution of this country. The subject would certainly not be easily disposed of, unless the Government would give hon. Members some compensation for depriving them of the privilege of bringing on grievances before Supply. Surely, if the object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were merely to get his Supply taken in a proper and orderly manner, without interfering with the privileges of the House of Commons, he should yield to the proposal of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman could not be placed in a worse position by so doing, and would besides obtain the sympathy of many of those who might otherwise feel it their duty to oppose to the utmost a loss which they could not repair. The Rule could be tried during the present Session; and as all these matters were tentative and experimental, he trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see the wisdom of accepting the proposal made by the noble Lord and acquiesced in by a strong minority on both sides of the House.

Mr. Newdegate

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT said, although he had a Notice of Motion on going into Supply on the Army Estimates, which would take precedence of all others, he was one of those who attached so much importance to the Estimates coming on and being explained at a time when there was a full attendance that, even to his own loss, he should feel inclined to support the proposal of the Government. No doubt some assurance would be given that Supply would not be put down for every Monday night in the Session. A further assurance might be given that the Government would not take more than one evening in the week for each class of Estimates. He hoped they would not agree to the proposal to have free discussion on the Appropriation Bill, which came on in the middle of August.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he could corroborate what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), and from the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), with respect to the inutility of discussing in the House the details of the Army Estimates; for he could assure the House that by no class of persons were these discussions regarded with more indifference—he might almost say with more ridicule—than by the officers of the Army. The part the officers looked upon with interest was the opening Statement of the Secretary of State for War, in which his military policy was stated. There they learnt all that it was important for them to know. Any subsequent discussion was generally maintained by a small class of crotchety persons, and was of no great interest to the Army. The carrying out of the suggestion that a printed paper explanatory of the Estimates should be supplied would be a great facility. He hoped some steps would be taken which would prevent waste of time.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, they had had several Committees on this subject, and he recollected especially that the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) was Chairman of the Committee of 1872. The right hon. Gentleman began by proposing to that Committee that when Supply stood as the first Order of the Day, not only on Monday but also on Thursday, the House should go at once into Committee of Supply without any discussion whatever. What happened? Another right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) immediately said—"No, that will not do. What we will do is this—we will give you Monday, and not Thursday." The reply of the Committee to that was this—"No; we are not going to be ruled by the two front Benches." The Committee then proceeded to discuss the subject, and the outcome of the whole was that the House adopted the Rule which gave power to Members to move grievances upon subjects relevant to the Estimates proposed upon Monday, and Monday only. He entirely disagreed with the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), when he said that that was a bad Rule—that it did not work well. The hon. and learned Member had quoted strong authorities; but he had given none so strong as the Speaker's. When the Speaker was asked whether the Rule of 1872-3 had worked well, he replied—

"I am bound to say that the balance of my opinion is in favour of adopting the Resolution of the House of 1872, and mainly upon the ground that that is a Resolution which has been tried and approved."

Now, the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not successfully deal with this question unless he obtained a consensus of opinion; and what he ventured to suggest was—let the right hon. Gentleman try a solution in that direction. There were many proposals down on the Paper, and there were several pointed in this quarter; and he believed if the Chancellor of the Exchequer reverted to that which had been tried with success he would be able to carry his point. No doubt, there was the objection that a Minister would not be able to make his Statement when he came down to the House; but that was a minor consideration when the privileges of the House were concerned. He thought the House would maintain those privileges by adopting the Rule of 1872.

MR. RYLANDS wished, in the first place, to tell the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) that he could not treat this question as one between the present Government and the last. It was a most unreasonable argument to advance that because a particular Committee in former years had recommended a Resolution which infringed the privileges of private Members, that was a sufficient authority for giving something up on the present occasion. What were Parliamentary Committees in former years? They were so constituted that Members of the Government then existing, or right hon. Gentlemen who had been in the previous Government, or hon. Gentlemen who expected to be in the next Government, formed or controlled the majority of the Committee; and, of course, right hon. Gentlemen, under those circumstances, were very ready indeed to recommend Resolutions which they must have felt would be very convenient to them in the administration of the affairs of the Government. He was delighted to hear his hon. and learned Friend (Sir William Harcourt) enforce the same views as he himself endeavoured to state on Monday—that this was not a time when the House should give up its power of controlling the Executive. He (Mr. Rylands) said that when they were in the position of having sprung upon them new lines of policy, when they found the Government taking steps which involved the expenditure of large and almost untold sums of money, when they undertook to bind the country to serious responsibilities without first giving Parliament an opportunity of being consulted, he said that this was a period when, of all others, hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House should resist every infringement of the rights of Parliament. But he might remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that the time might come when a Government might be seated upon that Bench who might exercise the power of the Executive in another direction, and in a manner which would be equally disagreeable to the Conservative Party, as the part the Government had taken was distasteful to the Liberals. Hon. Gentlemen opposite must not suppose that the present Conservative Government was going to last for ever, because it might not last for many years; and, at all events, it was certain the time would come when, under the change which had taken place in the Constitution of this Kingdom, they would have a very strong element of democracy represented upon the Government Bench. They would, perhaps, have Members of the Government who would be disposed to make use of the Executive power in a manner which would be disastrous to the country; but now, at the bidding of the present Government, in which they had confidence, the House was asked to give up one of the most powerful weapons which, perhaps, the Conservatives might then wish to use. He thought it was the most dangerous thing in the world to trifle with the rights of Parliament, simply because there had been circumstances in the House which were described as obstruction. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had, he thought, without any justification, alluded to the circumstances of the last and previous Sessions as a reason for the proceedings in connection with this Resolution. He (Mr. Rylands) disputed entirely that these circumstances had anything to do with the Resolution they were discussing at the present moment, because it was a Resolution which had been brought forward by previous Governments, and discussed by previous Parliaments, before obstruction ever took place. But even if it were so, he warned the House not to allow a temporary circumstance, which was probably not a lasting state of things, to induce them to change so materially the position in which private Members were placed in this House. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) said the way to preserve these privileges was to make proper use of them; but he did not show how they were to make a proper use of their privileges by giving them up. If he properly interpreted the right hon. Member's language, he meant to convey that novel idea. That was the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, and he entered into an elaborate argument to show how they were to preserve the privileges of the House; and the conclusion of that argument was that he would consent that these privileges should be withdrawn from them. He (Mr. Rylands) did not hesitate to say that if they accepted this Resolution as it stood, the result would be eminently unsatisfactory. He was not prepared to say that the power of proposing Motions on the Report of Supply would be a satisfactory solution; but he would prefer that concession to having nothing at all. But he did not want to move from the present position of things, and he did hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, although he had a majority vernment sought very seriously to limit. The course of a river was according to the nature of the country through which it flowed; and if it were sought to dam it up, one never knew the amount of mischief which might result. A friend of his bought an estate in Scotland, and there was a stream upon it which he endeavoured to control. He dammed it up, but it overflowed its banks and caused a good deal of mischief, so that at last his friend said, in the bitterness of his heart, that there were only two things he had never been able to manage, and they were a Highland stream and a woman. He (Sir William Harcourt) ventured to suggest to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that there was another thing as difficult to bank up, and that was the House of Commons. The Government, he held, would have done better if it had left this alone. It was quite impossible that a matter of this kind could be satisfactorily settled merely by a majority. They could depart from the ancient Rules of the House only by general consent. The proposition of his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) that Members should be allowed to discuss grievances on Report of Supply would go far to reconcile the House to the alterations proposed by the Government. But if there were to be no statement of grievances, either on going into Committee of Supply or on the Report, they would be embarking on a very dangerous course.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

MR. GORST complained that the Resolution was intended to put down, not obstruction, but criticism. Nothing was more salutary for Public Departments than to have their acts freely criticized; and to make Motions on going into Committee of Supply was the only way by which private Members could secure the opportunity of criticizing the proceedings of any Administration. If the Government were afraid of discussion of a grievance introduced by a private Member, they had recourse to the expedient of a "count out;" and now they made an attempt, by taking advantage of the outcry raised against obstruction, to pass a Resolution which would put down criticism. We were going through exactly the same phase as they were going through at Berlin. The disease in London was in a milder form. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could not bring in a gagging Act and play the part of Prince Bismarck on a large scale, so he was playing it on a minor scale, and had brought in a gagging Resolution. It had been said that Ministers in charge of the Estimates found it impossible to make their Statements except at very late and inconvenient hours, owing to the multitude of questions brought forward on going into Committee of Supply. But last year the First Lord of the Admiralty made his Statement at half-past 5, while the Speaker was in the Chair, and other Ministers could do the same if they chose. He was quite aware that the privilege of bringing forward grievances on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply might be abused; but he thought the House might rely upon the influence of public opinion and a man's regard for his own reputation to prevent the discussion of grievances of a frivolous nature. If this Resolution were passed it would lower the character of the House.

MR. J. COWEN said, he was one of those Members who had been taken somewhat by surprise at the precipitate manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had submitted those Resolutions. He was not a Member of the Select Committee that sat last Session, and he had not an opportunity of seeing the Motion that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had put on the Paper until Saturday morning. Since then, however, he had closely followed the discussion on Monday night, had studied the Report of the Committee, and looked through the evidence they took. He gave it as his opinion that the Government would not succeed in accomplishing what they wanted by the changes that were now proposed. Of course, it was only an opinion; but his deliberate judgment was that the Ministers would lose as much time in discussing the Resolutions as they would gain during the Session, even if they were eventually carried and put in force. It behoved Members of Parliament to guard with incessant watchfulness and constant jealousy the Rules under which their proceedings were conducted. These Parliamentary laws were conceived in the interests of free discussion, and framed for the purpose of securing the right of minorities. Many of them were memorials of interesting and important historical struggles. They formed a register of successful encounters between representative and arbitrary authority. The House of Commons, therefore, would do wisely in opposing the slightest encroachment upon hardly fought for and dearly cherished privileges. With this general declaration he was willing to admit—as all men familiar with the House of Commons must admit—that great changes had taken place in the conditions under which the legislation of this country was carried on. The work of Parliament had not only increased, but its character had altogether altered. Formerly their debates were limited to discussing the best means by which the Revenue could be levied and expended, settling the relations that had to exist between England and foreign States, and considering occasionally important Constitutional problems. Then talking was confined to these topics. Now their legislation was far-reaching. It entered into the minute ramifications of commercial, civil, and social life. They had taken under their inspection schools and ships, factories and mines. They had covered the country with a network of intricate sanitary regulations. These duties entailed a great increase of administration, and an increase of administration brought a larger amount of legislation. The administrative work of the Government in England had quadrupled during the last quarter of a century. In addition to that, the number of men who took part in the discussions had gradually enlarged. Only 30 or 40 Members in a Session spoke some years ago, now nine or 10 times that number engaged in their debates. All these circumstances pointed to the necessity of some change from time to time in the forms by which their work was guided. Another and more subtle, but still a potent influence was at work, which affected their doings. A few years ago the Members of the House of Commons consisted of sons and relatives of the aristocracy, country gentlemen, professional men, barristers, officers of the Army and Navy, and old and retired men of business. They might not have a uniformity of opinion; but there existed amongst them a uniformity of manners, of feeling, and of custom. They were all drawn from the same social strata. They had now a more extended suffrage—enfranchising not only the trading but the artizan classes—and this had slightly so far, but ultimately would largely, affect the composition of the House. The new Members representing a more democratic section of the State had sentiments and feelings not altogether in common with other classes, and a great deal of the friction—political and personal—that they had experienced in recent Sessions had unquestionably been produced by the imperfect mingling of these new elements. He admitted all this, and any reasonable proposal on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to adapt the Rules of the House to the constantly shifting phases of Parliamentary life he had no objection to; but he would resist, stoutly and strenuously, any attempt to infringe upon the sacred privileges of English Parliamentary existence—the redress of grievances before the granting of Supplies. The Resolution proposed struck at the foundation of this principle. It was not a large concession that was asked, it was true. It only affected one day of the week; but if it were granted, other and further demands would follow. The only course for the independent Members was to meet the proposition with uncompromising resistance at the start. It was no use their concealing from themselves the reason why these Rules were proposed. The Government thought the progress of Business had been interfered with by the active criticism of the Irish Members. What was called the obstruction of the Gentlemen who sat below the Gangway had disconcerted the Ministerial arrangements. These new Rules were framed for the purpose of weakening the power of resistance of the Gentlemen who sat around him. He begged to point out, however, that they aimed at a matter that really they had no grounds of complaint with. The obstruction—if such was to be the word used—applied to Votes in Committee; but there was no attempt to alter the power of resistance there. What the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to do was to prevent Members raising discussions on principles of policy before the money was granted. So far as he was concerned, he would say that whatever might be the result, he would never vote for any infringement of that law. He thought the very moderate Amendment that had been suggested by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition might be accepted, and with that the Government ought to be content.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, there was one view of the subject which had not, he thought, been fairly laid before the House. The point at issue was not, as had been put by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen), whether there should or should not be free discussion, but whether discussion should be controlled by legitimate Rules; because, if the argument of his hon. Friend who had just spoken were carried to its logical conclusion, the House must go back to the time when on the presentation of every Petition a speech might be made. If they were not to have Rules, their discussions would not be free but simply unruly and disorderly. Why was a Committee appointed last year? Why, because a revision of the Rules was felt to be necessary. In supporting some change, he did not do so in order that the Government might have more power, but in order that their discussions might be properly regulated. He had listened, he might add, with the greatest respect and attention to the observations which had fallen from his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), who seemed to argue that on the Report of Supply there should be some such latitude of discussion as in the case of the Appropriation Act. There was much, he thought, to be said in favour of that proposition, and it might be made the basis of a compromise with general consent. But when his hon. and learned Friend went on to speak of the undesirability of altering Constitutional principles in order to get rid of certain inconveniences, he appeared to regard those inconveniences hardly in the light in which they were viewed by public opinion. Hon. Members did not possess those privileges with which they seemed so loth to part in order that they might be individually exalted, but as trustees for the people who sent them to Parliament, in order that they might be protected in the discharge of their duties, and in the due transaction of the business of the people. The moment, therefore, that they began to look upon them from a merely personal point of view and availed themselves of them to obstruct the progress of Business, then they became really not in the true sense of the word sticklers for privilege, but men whose action tended to imperil it, because they would make "privilege" unpopular in the country, and people out-of-doors would begin to ask themselves the natural and pertinent question, for what reason was it that these privileges had been given to Members of the House of Commons? There were many good things in the world, excellent in their use, but which became most mischievous in their abuse. For instance, Constitutional liberty was a thing of priceless value; but when it degenerated into unfettered licence, it might come to work as much evil against the welfare of a community as the worst form of despotism. So it was with the privileges of the House of Commons, with regard to which, if they were made use of for the purpose of impeding the Public Business, the question would be asked why hon. Members possessed them, or whether they ought to possess them in the same degree as at present? His hon. and learned Friend had pointed out that if the Rule under discussion were adopted the Government might run through all the Estimates on a Monday, and that that might turn out to be a great evil. In that case, said his hon. and learned Friend, Members would resort to all kinds of expedients to bring forward their grievances, and would harass the Government in order to oblige them to place Estimates on the Paper on other days than Monday in order to effect this object. But did not this argument of his hon. and learned Friend answer itself? The moment the Government sought to take undue advantage of this Rule, the consequences pointed out might ensue. But knowing that this would be the case, the Government, he felt sure, would take very good care not to abuse this Rule, and only to employ it for its legitimate purpose of facilitating the due transaction of the Business of the House. If ever they attempted to take any advantage of the House, they would find the public opinion too strong for them. He would not go into the question as to whether the custom of moving Amendments on going into Supply was an old one or not, though his hon. and learned Friend had no doubt been correct in stating that the custom began about the year 1811. The present proposed alteration was brought forward not on the mere Motion of the Government, but as the result of many Parliamentary Committees. No fewer than three Speakers of the House, as well as many other eminent personages, had agreed in stating that of late years the enormous increase in the number of irrelevant Amendments moved on the House going into Supply, not by one individual or one body of individuals alone, but by all sections of the House, was such as greatly to impede the Public Business and to necessitate alteration. He hoped the House would in some form or other pass the Rule, because he believed it would tend not to impair, but to preserve, the privileges of the House. His noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) had made the offer of a concession; and he thought it would be well for all parties if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could see his way to its acceptance. But, in any case, it was not creditable to waste time in discussing a matter so easily understood; and he hoped they would show that they were really a business House, by permitting in some shape or another a settlement of this question.

Mr. J. Cowen

MR. NEWDEGATE: The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) rests his hopes of regulating the Business of the House upon the support of public opinion; but he must be aware that there is a section who have upon this subject openly defied the public opinion of the House during the last three Sessions. The Committee upstairs was bound to take that fact into its consideration, because it was appointed with reference to the continuance of that system of obstruction. I wish to recall to the attention of the House that this is not a new subject. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) adverted to the precedent of 1857; but he must remember that in 1861 there was a Committee of Public Business, presided over by Sir James Graham, because the discussions of the House had become frivolous, multifarious, and irrelevant. He has totally omitted to mention that the effect of the recommendations of that Committee was that Friday was appointed for such discussions as he desires to promote, and that the Government were enjoined to place Supply for Friday, in order that hon. Members of this House might have an opportunity of bringing forward for its consideration whatever subjects they wished. That arrangement was made subsequent to the precedent of 1857, to which the hon. and learned Member has referred. The real fact of the case is—as anyone who will read the Evidence may see—that the House of Commons felt that its character, its weight in the country, its position as an Estate of the Realm, was being imperilled by the introduction of these multifarious subjects of debate. Another opportunity had been given to hon. Members for obtaining information when the whole system of Questions, with which our Sittings commence, was inaugurated in 1861. The whole tendency of the arrangements in this House has been in favour of giving increased opportunities for discussion to the non-official Members of this House; until we have come to such an abuse of that privilege—we have seen these facilities so much taken advantage of—that the character of this House as a Legislative Assembly is again endangered. When the Committee of the last Session made a recommendation that the Government should have Monday evening for Supply without any discussion or your, Sir, leaving the Chair, they proposed that the same restriction should be placed against discussion on the House going into Committee on Ways and Means. The right hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson) thought, and I agreed with him, that that would be placing Monday at the disposal of the Government to too great an extent; and I am glad that Her Majesty's Government have given up the proposal to bar general discussion before going into Committee of Ways and Means on Mondays. My own belief is that this House is endangering its position in the eyes of the country by undue discussion upon minor and multifarious subjects. I have heard from persons out-of-doors, over and over again, that unless the House of Commons succeeds in putting down the system of obstruction, to which it was subject for three successive Sessions, it would fall in the estimation of the country, and that the other Estates of the Realm would be invested with undue power. I ask Members of this House, do they wish to hand over their real power of legislation to the House of Lords, or do they wish to see it monopolized by the Crown? If the House of Commons intends to retain its position as the most powerful element in the Constitution, it must convince public opinion by regulating, limiting, controlling, and elevating its debates—that it merits the great trust which has hitherto been reposed in it.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY submitted that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire's (Mr. Newdegate's) argument was not consistent with the facts of the case. The Resolution did not touch anything in the shape of obstruction, such as had been alleged against hon. Members on that side of the House; and he thought it unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman should have entered upon an irritating topic, which was better kept out of the way until the time came when it must be discussed, which would be when the second Resolution was placed before them. He ventured to assert that no peculiar obstruction had been offered by Irish Members on Motions for going into Committee of Supply. This Resolution was directed to that; and, as the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had stated, it had been under the consideration of the House for years before several of his hon. Friends around him, and against whom the charge of obstruction was levelled, entered the House at all. The matter was one which, in his opinion, ought to be approached very quietly and very seriously. There were few hon. Members who would not admit that there was great inconvenience caused by a Minister being kept waiting night after night to introduce the subject of Supply. And when he did obtain an opportunity of bringing forward the subject, his statements were frequently made to very small and dead Houses in consequence of the discussions that had preceded them. Could not that evil be met without abrogating the real privileges of the House of Commons? He believed that it could well be done. The proposition, moreover, before the House was not the original proposition of the Government. The Government asked much more than it was prepared now to take; and, while looking at that which they insisted on, they could not forget that what they did originally ask would seriously, in the opinion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, have crippled the privileges of the House. For his own part, speaking as an individual Member, he thought that if the Government would accept the proposal to permit discussion on the Report of Supply, it would go a long way to meet the objections felt by many Members to the Resolution. But if that concession were made, it must be done thoroughly and the Report must not be taken, as it was taken now, at a very late hour of the night. It must be taken as part of the Business of the House, and as regularly as possible. He was far from believing that hon. Members should give up any of their privileges with respect to the introduction of all manner of personal questions and grievances of the people in going into Supply. On the contrary, he thought that there never was a time in the history of this country when it was so necessary for the House of Commons to preserve that power. Centralization was going on in every direction and year by year the House was giving up its privileges to right hon. Gentlemen, the Representatives of Departments. Only last Session they gave up the management of prisons to the Home Secretary. That right hon. Gentleman knew very well that throughout the country there had been very disagreeable and painful discussions as to what had taken place in that direction. Having deprived the country of that important part of the administration were they going to shut the mouth of the House of Commons and prevent hon. Members from bringing forward grievances in connection with that subject? At the present moment, if anyone went into the prisons of the country, he would see an army of warders bearing the effigy of the Royal Crown. This was something perfectly new in the country, and being so, it was not wholesome to make such a change. It was not desirable that the Crown should be brought into direct connection with the administration of prisons and every other part of the usual system of the country. But that was the policy of the Government, and he would ask hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House to consider that when they came to give their votes on this question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had been making use of some of his leisure time in reading Burke on the French Revolution, and had given the House an admirable résumé of the principles of liberty and licence contrasted with each other. But the question before them

Mr. Newdegate

was neither that of liberty nor of licence; it was simply a practical question as to how the Business of the House should be carried on. And such a question should be debated quietly, and in a business-like manner. Suppose the Government obtained what it desired, and the House went into Committee of Supply on Monday, they would, he trusted, obtain from the Minister bringing forward the Estimate a more full account of the finances connected with his Department than they had been in the habit of receiving. But would they obtain a fuller discussion of the Estimates themselves by the adoption of this Resolution? Suppose Supply was moved by a Minister at half-past 5 o'clock, and at 7 o'clock, when the discussion of the Estimates came on, where would the House of Commons be? Would 10 Members remain in the House during the time they were in the habit of taking for dinner? If Supply were brought on at 5 o'clock, he believed there would be a smaller discussion of the Estimates than under the present system, so that he was not clear in his own mind that the professed object of the Government—namely, to obtain a fuller discussion of individual matters of Supply—would be obtained by this measure. Moreover, if the privileges of hon. Members were curtailed, those who felt themselves aggrieved would avail themselves of every opportunity left to them to the uttermost. For his own part, he could wish some compromise were made by the Government, such as that proposed by the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, accompanied by a promise to take the Report of Supply at an early period of the evening. If that were not done, he should feel it his duty to move the adjournment of the House on frequent occasions when not prohibited by the Rules of debate. There was another consideration deserving attention. The very fact that grievances could be brought forward on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply frequently obtained their redress. He had seen grievances redressed without even their being brought forward at all. One noticeable case was that of a very cruel grievance perpetrated by a right hon. Gentleman on this side of the House. His Colleagues disapproved of the action of the particular Minister in question, and a Motion was put on the Paper to call the attention of the House to the subject before going into Committee of Supply. The Motion was postponed several times while negotiations were going on, but was not removed until such pressure was brought to bear by the Prime Minister himself that the grievance was redressed. The Motion was, therefore, never brought forward at all. If private Members were deprived of the opportunity of bringing forward grievances of the people, subjects of the Crown would be deprived of the opportunity of redress from the fear of Ministers when they were in the wrong. The House was gradually giving up everything to the Government of this country, and was gradually abrogating, as it seemed to him, that Constitution by means of which they had grown into a great and free people. He had read the other day that in Burmah the Constitution was abrogated by the King, who was stated to be an amiable young man, only at times he had a disagreeable habit of pricking with his spear anybody he disliked. He feared that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was like the King of Burmah, for he wished to prick some of his (Mr. Mitchell Henry's) own Friends with his spear; but, in doing so, he forgot that he was abrogating the Constitution of this country. The subject would certainly not be easily disposed of, unless the Government would give hon. Members some compensation for depriving them of the privilege of bringing on grievances before Supply. Surely, if the object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were merely to get his Supply taken in a proper and orderly manner, without interfering with the privileges of the House of Commons, he should yield to the proposal of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman could not be placed in a worse position by so doing, and would besides obtain the sympathy of many of those who might otherwise feel it their duty to oppose to the utmost a loss which they could not repair. The Rule could be tried during the present Session; and as all these matters were tentative and experimental, he trusted the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see the wisdom of accepting the proposal made by the noble Lord and acquiesced in by a opinion by regulating, limiting, controlling, and elevating its debates—that it merits the great trust which has hitherto been reposed in it.

Mr. MITCHELL HENRY submitted that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire's (Mr. Newdegate's) argument was not consistent with the facts of the case. The Resolution did not touch anything in the shape of obstruction, such as had been alleged against hon. Members on that side of the House; and he thought it unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman should have entered upon an irritating topic, which was better kept out of the way until the time came when it must be discussed, which would be when the second Resolution was placed before them. He ventured to assert that no peculiar obstruction had been offered by Irish Members on Motions for going into Committee of Supply. This Resolution was directed to that; and, as the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had stated, it had been under the consideration of the House for years before several of his hon. Friends around him, and against whom the charge of obstruction was levelled, entered the House at all. The matter was one which, in his opinion, ought to be approached very quietly and very seriously. There were few hon. Members who would not admit that there was great inconvenience caused by a Minister being kept waiting night after night to introduce the subject of Supply. And when he did obtain an opportunity of bringing forward the subject, his statements were frequently made to very small and dead Houses in consequence of the discussions that had preceded them. Could not that evil be met without abrogating the real privileges of the House of Commons? He believed that it could well be done. The proposition, moreover, before the House was not the original proposition of the Government. The Government asked much more than it was prepared now to take; and, while looking at that which they insisted on, they could not forget that what they did originally ask would seriously, in the opinion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, have crippled the privileges of the House. For his own part, speaking as an individual Member, he thought that if the Government would accept the proposal

Mr. Newdegate

to permit discussion on the Report of Supply, it would go a long way to meet the objections felt by many Members to the Resolution. But if that concession were made, it must be done thoroughly, and the Report must not be taken, as it was taken now, at a very late hour of the night. It must be taken as part of the Business of the House, and as regularly as possible. He was far from believing that hon. Members should give up any of their privileges with respect to the introduction of all manner of personal questions and grievances of the people in going into Supply. On the contrary, he thought that there never was a time in the history of this country when it was so necessary for the House of Commons to preserve that power. Centralization was going on in every direction, and year by year the House was giving up its privileges to right hon. Gentlemen, the Representatives of Departments. Only last Session they gave up the management of prisons to the Home Secretary. That right hon. Gentleman knew very well that throughout the country there had been very disagreeable and painful discussions as to what had taken place in that direction. Having deprived the country of that important part of the administration, were they going to shut the mouth of the House of Commons and prevent hon. Members from bringing forward grievances in connection with that subject? At the present moment, if anyone went into the prisons of the country, he would see an army of warders bearing the effigy of the Royal Crown. This was something perfectly new in the country, and being so, it was not wholesome to make such a change. It was not desirable that the Crown should be brought into direct connection with the administration of prisons and every other part of the usual system of the country. But that was the policy of the Government, and he would ask hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House to consider that when they came to give their votes on this question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had been making use of some of his leisure time in reading Burke on the French Revolution, and had given the House an admirable résumé of the principles of liberty and licence contrasted with each other. But the question before them

former years had recommended a Resolution which infringed the privileges of private Members, that was a sufficient authority for giving something up on the present occasion. What were Parliamentary Committees in former years? They were so constituted that Members of the Government then existing, or right hon. Gentlemen who had been in the previous Government, or hon. Gentlemen who expected to be in the next Government, formed or controlled the majority of the Committee; and, of course, right hon. Gentlemen, under those circumstances, were very ready indeed to recommend Resolutions which they must have felt would be very convenient to them in the administration of the affairs of the Government. He was delighted to hear his hon. and learned Friend (Sir William Harcourt) enforce the same views as he himself endeavoured to state on Monday—that this was not a time when the House should give up its power of controlling the Executive. He (Mr. Rylands) said that when they were in the position of having sprung upon them new lines of policy, when they found the Government taking steps which involved the expenditure of large and almost untold sums of money, when they undertook to bind the country to serious responsibilities without first giving Parliament an opportunity of being consulted, he said that this was a period when, of all others, hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House should resist every infringement of the rights of Parliament. But he might remind hon. Gentlemen opposite that the time might come when a Government might be seated upon that Bench who might exercise the power of the Executive in another direction, and in a manner which would be equally disagreeable to the Conservative Party, as the part the Government had taken was distasteful to the Liberals. Hon. Gentlemen opposite must not suppose that the present Conservative Government was going to last for ever, because it might not last for many years; and, at all events, it was certain the time would come when, under the change which had taken place in the Constitution of this Kingdom, they would have a very strong element of democracy represented upon the Government Bench. They would, perhaps, have Members of the Government who would be disposed to make use of the Executive power in a manner which would be disastrous to the country; but now, at the bidding of the present Government, in which they had confidence, the House was asked to give up one of the most powerful weapons which, perhaps, the Conservatives might then wish to use. He thought it was the most dangerous thing in the world to trifle with the rights of Parliament, simply because there had been circumstances in the House which were described as obstruction. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had, he thought, without any justification, alluded to the circumstances of the last and previous Sessions as a reason for the proceedings in connection with this Resolution. He (Mr. Rylands) disputed entirely that these circumstances had anything to do with the Resolution they were discussing at the present moment, because it was a Resolution which had been brought forward by previous Governments, and discussed by previous Parliaments, before obstruction ever took place. But even if it were so, he warned the House not to allow a temporary circumstance, which was probably not a lasting state of things, to induce them to change so materially the position in which private Members were placed in this House. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) said the way to preserve these privileges was to make proper use of them; but he did not show how they were to make a proper use of their privileges by giving them up. If he properly interpreted the right hon. Member's language, he meant to convey that novel idea. That was the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, and he entered into an elaborate argument to show how they were to preserve the privileges of the House; and the conclusion of that argument was that he would consent that these privileges should be withdrawn from them. He (Mr. Rylands) did not hesitate to say that if they accepted this Resolution as it stood, the result would be eminently unsatisfactory. He was not prepared to say that the power of proposing Motions on the Report of Supply would be a satisfactory solution; but he would prefer that concession to having nothing at all. But he did not want to move from the present position of things, and he did hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, although he had a majority strong minority on both sides of the House.

COLONEL ARBUTHNOT said, although he had a Notice of Motion on going into Supply on the Army Estimates, which would take precedence of all others, he was one of those who attached so much importance to the Estimates coming on and being explained at a time when there was a full attendance that, even to his own loss, he should feel inclined to support the proposal of the Government. No doubt some assurance would be given that Supply would not be put down for every Monday night in the Session. A further assurance might be given that the Government would not take more than one evening in the week for each class of Estimates. He hoped they would not agree to the proposal to have free discussion on the Appropriation Bill, which came on in the middle of August.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he could corroborate what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), and from the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), with respect to the inutility of discussing in the House the details of the Army Estimates; for he could assure the House that by no class of persons were these discussions regarded with more indifference—he might almost say with more ridicule—than by the officers of the Army. The part the officers looked upon with interest was the opening Statement of the Secretary of State for War, in which his military policy was stated. There they learnt all that it was important for them to know. Any subsequent discussion was generally maintained by a small class of crotchety persons, and was of no great interest to the Army. The carrying out of the suggestion that a printed paper explanatory of the Estimates should be supplied would be a great facility. He hoped some steps would be taken which would prevent waste of time.

SIR WALTER B. BARTHELOT said, they had had several Committees on this subject, and he recollected especially that the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) was Chairman of the Committee of 1872. The right hon. Gentleman began by proposing to that Committee that when Supply stood as the first Order of the Day, not only on Monday but also on Thursday, the House should go at once into Committee of Supply without any discussion whatever. What happened? Another right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) immediately said—"No, that will not do. What we will do is this—we will give you Monday, and not Thursday." The reply of the Committee to that was this—"No; we are not going to be ruled by the two front Benches." The Committee then proceeded to discuss the subject, and the outcome of the whole was that the House adopted the Rule which gave power to Members to move grievances upon subjects relevant to the Estimates proposed upon Monday, and Monday only. He entirely disagreed with the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), when he said that that was a bad Rule—that it did not work well. The hon. and learned Member had quoted strong authorities; but he had given none so strong as the Speaker's. When the Speaker was asked whether the Rule of 1872-3 had worked well, he replied—

"I am bound to say that the balance of my opinion is in favour of adopting the Resolution of the House of 1872, and mainly upon the ground that that is a Resolution which has been tried and approved."

Now, the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not successfully deal with this question unless he obtained a consensus of opinion; and what he ventured to suggest was—let the right hon. Gentleman try a solution in that direction. There were many proposals down on the Paper, and there were several pointed in this quarter; and he believed if the Chancellor of the Exchequer reverted to that which had been tried with success he would be able to carry his point. No doubt, there was the objection that a Minister would not be able to make his Statement when he came down to the House; but that was a minor consideration when the privileges of the House were concerned. He thought the House would maintain those privileges by adopting the Rule of 1872.

MR. RYLANDS wished, in the first place, to tell the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Bartelot) that he could not treat this question as one between the present Government and the last. It was a most unreasonable argument to advance that because a particular Committee in Supply on a Government night, any question he chose, and to make as long a speech as if he were himself introducing a Bill on the subject. This was an entirely novel practice as far as his experience was concerned; and while he would deprecate any attempt to curtail the privileges of the House as far as the discussion of real grievances was concerned, he thought there was great force in all that had been urged on the part of the Government in favour of preventing the time of Parliament being occupied and Public Business delayed by the ventilation of alleged grievances which were, in fact, no grievances at all.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the proposal to withdraw the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) had given occasion for a general discussion, which was not, he thought, an inconvenient one, on the whole principle of the Resolutions to be proposed. It was, in his opinion, well that they had had an opportunity of taking, in the way they had been doing, the general sense of the House upon the first Resolution, and in a general sense upon the principle of all the Resolutions, inasmuch as it must tend to shorten the discussion upon them. He desired to repeat that the Resolution which he had brought forward was not a proposal which was made by the Government in support of encroachment, or of an attempt to take away the privileges of the general body of the House. It was a proposal which emanated not from the Government alone, but from a Committee of 17 Members appointed last Session, and comprising a very decided majority of Gentlemen who neither had been nor were in Office. The Resolutions which he had put upon the Paper, in their original form, were exactly in the language in which they were approved of by the Committee as it concluded its labours. A great deal of misapprehension appeared to prevail as to the circumstances which led to the appointment of that Committee, and as to the motives with which it had been nominated. Some hon. Members seemed to think that it had been appointed for the purpose of dealing with what was called obstruction. That, however, was not the case; and if hon. Gentlemen would bear in mind the line which he had himself taken on the subject, they would see that that could not be so. The object with which that particular Committee was appointed was to consider recommendations which had been made by Committees in former years—many of them three or four times over—as well as any other recommendations which might be offered, and to say which it was really desirable to bring to the test of a vote in the House. It did certainly happen that in the course of the proceedings of the Committee, after it had been appointed, circumstances led to its Members turning their attention much more to the question of obstruction than it was originally intended to do. But with regard to the original purpose with which the Committee was appointed, that was not the meaning of its nomination. The Government desired to see how and in what way the conduct of Business in the House could be improved. They had heard a great deal of the proper privileges of Parliament and of the great functions it had to discharge. He should like hon. Members to make up their minds as to what these were, and whether the House was a place for indefinite talk, to be no more kept within bounds than was a river which was not to be banked up. Was that to be the case, or were they to conduct the Public Business according to Rules which would be likely to enable them to get through it with reasonable facility? The House of Commons had a not inconsiderable amount of Business to deal with, and that Business could only be carried through in accordance with regulations. No doubt, where there was only a small amount of work, they could dispense with Rules more easily than under other circumstances; no doubt, where there were only a small number of Gentlemen who took part in debates, it would be much more easy to get on. But the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen)—though he was sorry for the conclusion at which that hon. Gentleman had arrived—hit the nail on the head, when he said that matters in the House of Commons were not now as they were at the beginning of the century. That was so for two reasons—first, they had a wider range of subjects to deal with; and, next, 10 times the number of Members took part in debate as compared with the former period. If the House made no change which would enable the Minister to get into Committee at once and make his Statement, they were placed in the difficulty both of keeping the Minister for a great length of time and of bringing about an irregular discussion of points which perhaps it would be found unnecessary to raise, or to raise in the same way, if his Statement had not been delayed. Several fallacies had been mentioned in the course of the conversation which had taken place. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gorst) had stated that last year his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty has made his annual Statement before the Speaker left the Chair. That he would, on reference, find not to have been the case. Other hon. Members, again, appeared to think that if the power of moving Amendments on going into Committee of Supply were done away with, they would lose the very valuable privilege which enabled them, on an emergency suddenly arising, to challenge the policy of the Government. In that view he could not concur. If an hon. Member desired to challenge the conduct of the Government on an occasion of importance and urgency, and to do so on going into Committee of Supply, he might, on coming down to the House, find 20 Notices having precedence of his. But if an appeal were made to the Government to give facilities for the bringing forward of such a question, if it were really one of interest which attracted the notice of the Whole House, the necessary facilities would, no doubt, be granted. There were other modes besides in which such a matter could be brought forward. The power and the ingenuity of the House were quite sufficient to make a way for the discussion of any question that required immediate consideration. What the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had said was perfectly true. They were there to consider the practical question of how the Business of the House was to be carried on; and he would ask him and other Members to consider whether the Resolutions that had been proposed would not assist the House in conducting its Business, for they would largely economise time. The Government were not in a position of antagonism with the House in this matter. They were on the same side with the House. Their sole object was to get through the Business of the House, and to do so with the greatest economy of time and labour. The Resolutions of the Committee of last Session had been modified by taking out the words "Committee of Ways and Means"—an alteration which left a considerable opening of which Members might avail themselves. They had made another alteration on the suggestion of the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington), excluding special or Supplementary Votes from the operation of the Rule; and so it would be seen that the opportunities of hon. Members to bring forward Motions would not be unduly restricted. The House might be perfectly sure the Government, for their own sake, would not abuse the Rule. If they did, the House would have the remedy in its own hands. The Rule, he might point out, would have the incidental advantage of rendering less frequent the necessity for Votes on Account; and, by making certain the days on which Supply would be taken, would probably tend to diminish the number of Amendments now put down on the Motion to go into Committee of Supply, and which, in many instances, were put down there instead of on particular Votes, merely because of the uncertainty as to when those Votes would be taken. The Government was most anxious to adopt anything which appeared to be consistent with the general feeling of the House. They quite felt that in these matters, unless they had the great majority of the House with them, their objects would not be attained. He had been especially anxious to meet the views of the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington), and had done so the other day to some extent with perfect goodwill; but he did not quite see his way to accept the suggestion which the noble Lord had just thrown out. He quite understood that his object was that greater latitude should be taken for the discussion of grievances on the Report of Supply; but it was not necessary to formulate any Resolution on the subject, and it would perhaps be sufficient to point out that discussions might be taken on the Report, which would supply the place of debates when going into Committee. It was difficult to say what was the nature of the discussions which might take place in that case; but if a new Resolution were necessary on the point, it would be for the House to say whether it ought to be brought in.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. W. E. FORSTER suggested that it would be for the convenience of the House if the Speaker would state what the Rule really was in regard to the Report of Supply.

MR. SPEAKER: In answer to the question of the right hon. Gentleman, I have to state that the established Rule of debate is that the observations of hon. Members should be relevant to the Question put from the Chair. There is one exception to that Rule, and that is when a Motion is made that this House resolve itself into Committee of Supply. Upon that occasion irrelevance of debate—that is to say, debate not relevant to the subject matter proposed to be discussed in Committee—is allowed; but I am not aware of irrelevant matter, generally speaking, being allowed upon any other occasion. No doubt, considerable latitude of discussion has been allowed occasionally on the Report of Supply; but I know of no instance where an irrelevant Amendment has been allowed on the Motion that Resolutions adopted in Committee of Supply be read a second time.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said that, while he was perfectly willing to acknowledge the readiness with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had accepted so much of the suggestions made on a former occasion as he thought would be for the advantage and convenience of the House, he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not been able to take a favourable view of the proposal as to the moving of Amendments on the Report of Supply. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that, in practice, there would be no risk of matters of urgent importance failing to obtain discussion, and that the Government would offer facilities for the purpose. It was perfectly true that the Government were always ready to offer facilities for the discussion of any Motion which impugned their conduct and which seemed to have the support of a considerable section of the House; what he thought the right hon. Gentleman did not perceive was that there might be various occasions upon which it might be extremely desirable that a discussion should take place and explanations given without any Motion being upon the Paper. He did not know that the Government would on all occasions be so ready to offer facilities for such discussions—discussions which, nevertheless, might be alike necessary and important; and it was to meet such cases that his suggestion was thrown out. What he wished to point out was that on such an occasion as that to which he referred, weeks might elapse before a Member obtained an opportunity of raising a question or making a Motion. He had now that opportunity. A Member knew that the Government could not get their Supply until he had an opportunity of bringing forward his question. If the Resolution of the Government should be sanctioned, the Government might put off Supply on Thursdays for some time with a view of preventing a discussion of a disagreeable topic. As to his own proposal, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said he was not quite sure what it was; but if it were put in the form of a Resolution, it would take the same form as his suggestion to the Committee—

“Provided that any question may be raised or Amendment moved on the second reading of a Resolution on the Report of the Committee of Supply.”

He had not proposed this in the form of an Amendment or an extension of the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he thought the House should be consulted, and that it was probable that the Government might have some proposition of its own to offer. His proposal, in effect, was that the Speaker should not on Mondays alone, but on all occasions of going into Supply, leave the Chair without putting any Question. This would secure in all cases a certain consideration of the Estimates in Committee, and any discussion in the form of Amendments which were now moved would come up on Report. The principle of bringing grievances before Supply would be maintained, and the House would have the great advantage of knowing for a certainty when the Estimates would come on. It might be said that this would only postpone the general discussions till the Report; but he thought, in practice, that would not be found the case, as many of the grievances would be disposed of in the discussion in Committee. There would, no doubt, be an occasional block on the Report; but the Government had stated that they could not hope to put down these discussions altogether. The Government were, he knew, under the idea that they would gain nothing by his proposal; but he knew, on the contrary, that they would gain a great deal. In any case, the Government must understand that there were very many questions which they could not exclude under any system of Business; and if a proper opportunity were not allowed for their consideration, he very much feared that objectionable ones would be found.

MR. RAIKES said, he regretted that the noble Lord who had just sat down had not put his propositions on the Paper in a definite form. He said, when he first heard them, that they seemed to him the most logical and the most effective way of dealing with the question aimed at in the Resolution. After having heard the more definite statement which the noble Lord had just made, he certainly wished to repeat that opinion in a still more unqualified manner. At the same time, it must be with all Members of the House a matter of regret that this proposition had not been put on the Paper in a definite form, and that they had not learnt definitely what were the proposals of the noble Lord till the second day of this discussion, and only then at a time when the House was by no means so full as it had been earlier in the evening. Though this proposal of the noble Lord would effect very many changes in the procedure, it was entirely consonant with the principles which governed their proceedings; and though it seemed to be a change of great importance, it need not, if sufficiently guarded, be an infringement of the liberties and privileges of any Member. He thought it would be necessary, if this proposition were adopted, that it should be accompanied with a Proviso that the Report of Supply should always when it was on the Paper be the first Order of the Day, in order to place hon. Members in the same position as if they were bringing forward Resolutions on Committee of Supply. By this proposal they would not merely carry out the object of the Government and the propositions of the Committee, but they would facilitate Business and secure the order, comfort, and convenience of independent Members. They would, in the first place, get the result on every day of the week that the Chancellor of the Exchequer now said would follow from making his Resolution apply to a Monday. They would be sure whenever Supply was down that it would come on, hon. Members would be perfectly certain what items in the Estimates would be under consideration, and they would be able to transact their Business with an ease and a certainty and, he ventured to think, with a celerity also, which would be most advantageous to the Public Business. They would have the Estimates discussed in the full face of the House, early in the evening, when Members were cool, collected, and perfectly prepared to conduct Business in a satisfactory manner, and so they would avoid those wrangles and acrimonious discussions which resulted from the late discussion of Supply. They would, in fact, get the whole of their Business carried on more speedily and certainly more creditably. Advantage might be taken of the opportunity, if the noble Lord did put his proposition on the Paper, to attempt to define the meaning of the word "grievance" as applied to Motions having precedence of Votes of Supply. Everybody would agree, if the House was to discuss grievances, that they should be, at all events, if not strictly relevant, at any rate, partaking of the form of grievances. Now, to give an example, last Session they had three discussions before Supply which were none of them in any sense grievances. For his part, he should define a grievance either as a misuse of power, or a neglect of administrative authority on the part of persons who by law were authorized to exercise it. The questions he referred to were the Burials Question, a question of International rights, and the question of the extension of the control of the Corporation of London to the whole of the Metropolis. All these cases, however desirable it was that they should be brought forward, were none of them grievances. They were complaints of the law as it stood, not complaints of maladministration; and, in his opinion, it was very necessary that they should be relegated, with similar questions, to the particular nights on which such Motions were usually brought forward. Another difficulty about this mode of procedure was that in Motions of that sort they had to deal with an abstract Motion without the possibility of moving an Amendment. The hon. Member, in fact, who brought forward any question, put the House in the position into which no Member had a right to put it, for he forced the House to say "Aye" or "No" to a particular definite proposition, and prevented any Member from moving an Amendment. Thus Members were compelled to come to a conclusion which very imperfectly expressed the opinion of the House, and he thought it would be far better that such Motions should be discussed at a time when they might be so amended as really to express the feelings of the House. He had merely glanced at this question by the way. He did not think that it would be well to adopt the proposition of the noble Lord in the imperfect form of confining it to the Monday, because then extraordinary difficulties would arise. They would have a Vote passed on Monday; therefore, when it came up for Report, there would be a general debate. But a Vote taken on Thursday would not be open for discussion on Report, and thus they would have confusion worse confounded. Red ink, or asterisks, or something of that sort would have to be used to indicate the difference. When, also, they got well into the Session, they would have three or four different Reports of Supply on the Paper, and enormous difficulty in getting them through because of these very complications. Therefore, he maintained that if they were to accept the suggestions of the noble Marquess they should extend them to the whole of the week. He did appeal to the House whether this was not a good opportunity for settling the Business of the House on the Rules as suggested by the noble Lord, and for making a real, practical, and efficient improvement in the Business?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE observed, that the three questions to which the Chairman of Committees referred had all been brought forward on a Friday, and not on Supply nights. He was sorry to see the "No-surrender" tone of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, though he could not wonder that he had not accepted the noble Lord's proposal. It was quite true that this Resolution came recommended by the Committee; but the right hon. Gentleman forgot to mention that the Committee were against the Resolution as it stood, and without the Amendments which would be proposed to-night. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was mistaken when he said that the Speaker had given it as his opinion that a Minister ought not to make his Statement with the Speaker in the Chair. The fact was otherwise. The Speaker, in his evidence, had distinctly stated that it was desirable that the Minister in charge of Estimates should make his Statement with the Speaker in the Chair.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not referring to the evidence of the Speaker, but to his ruling in the House as the matter now stood, and as proof that his right hon. Friend had made his Statement with the Speaker in the Chair.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not think a Resolution of this kind was the proper remedy for the evil complained of. If independent Members were pressed too much they would retaliate, not by obstruction, but by bringing forward their Motions on other and more inconvenient occasions. It would be within their competence to bring forward Motions on the Budget night; but he did not say they would resort to that course. They would not, however, surrender their nights on appeal from the Government, as before, and in this way the Government would lose more nights in a Session than they would gain by the Resolution.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he would not charge the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Government with any dark design against the liberties of the House or the country; but, whenever in any part of the world—from the Neva to the Tiber, or from the Golden Horn to Westminster—he heard of a Minister approaching Parliament to induce it to surrender some of its liberties, he was reminded of the picture of Richard III. tempting his nephews out of the safety of their sanctuary to confide in their tender-hearted uncle. He would trust no Government or Minister with the liberties of the people. The Prince Consort had once said that Parliamentary institutions in this country were on their trial, and what an outcry the remark called forth! The Government were certainly putting them on their trial now. The Government had no case to-day unless it was that Parliament had no right to be trusted with the liberties it had hitherto enjoyed. For the last 30 years, unfortunately, altogether. The Government were, he knew, under the idea that they would gain nothing by his proposal; but he knew, on the contrary, that they would gain a great deal. In any case, the Government must understand that there were very many questions which they could not exclude under any system of Business; and if a proper opportunity were not allowed for their consideration, he very much feared that objectionable ones would be found.

MR. RAIKES said, he regretted that the noble Lord who had just sat down had not put his propositions on the Paper in a definite form. He said, when he first heard them, that they seemed to him the most logical and the most effective way of dealing with the question aimed at in the Resolution. After having heard the more definite statement which the noble Lord had just made, he certainly wished to repeat that opinion in a still more unqualified manner. At the same time, it must be with all Members of the House a matter of regret that this proposition had not been put on the Paper in a definite form, and that they had not learnt definitely what were the proposals of the noble Lord till the second day of this discussion, and only then at a time when the House was by no means so full as it had been earlier in the evening. Though this proposal of the noble Lord would effect very many changes in the procedure, it was entirely consonant with the principles which governed their proceedings; and though it seemed to be a change of great importance, it need not, if sufficiently guarded, be an infringement of the liberties and privileges of any Member. He thought it would be necessary, if this proposition were adopted, that it should be accompanied with a Proviso that the Report of Supply should always when it was on the Paper be the first Order of the Day, in order to place hon. Members in the same position as if they were bringing forward Resolutions on Committee of Supply. By this proposal they would not merely carry out the object of the Government and the propositions of the Committee, but they would facilitate Business and secure the order, comfort, and convenience of independent Members. They would, in the first place, get the result on every day of the week that the Chancellor of the Exchequer now said would follow from making his Resolution apply to a Monday. They would be sure whenever Supply was down that it would come on, hon. Members would be perfectly certain what items in the Estimates would be under consideration, and they would be able to transact their Business with an ease and a certainty and, he ventured to think, with a celerity also, which would be most advantageous to the Public Business. They would have the Estimates discussed in the full face of the House, early in the evening, when Members were cool, collected, and perfectly prepared to conduct Business in a satisfactory manner, and so they would avoid those wrangles and acrimonious discussions which resulted from the late discussion of Supply. They would, in fact, get the whole of their Business carried on more speedily and certainly more creditably. Advantage might be taken of the opportunity, if the noble Lord did put his proposition on the Paper, to attempt to define the meaning of the word "grievance" as applied to Motions having precedence of Votes of Supply. Everybody would agree, if the House was to discuss grievances, that they should be, at all events, if not strictly relevant, at any rate, partaking of the form of grievances. Now, to give an example, last Session they had three discussions before Supply which were none of them in any sense grievances. For his part, he should define a grievance either as a misuse of power, or a neglect of administrative authority on the part of persons who by law were authorized to exercise it. The questions he referred to were the Burials Question, a question of International rights, and the question of the extension of the control of the Corporation of London to the whole of the Metropolis. All these cases, however desirable it was that they should be brought forward, were none of them grievances. They were complaints of the law as it stood, not complaints of maladministration; and, in his opinion, it was very necessary that they should be relegated, with similar questions, to the particular nights on which such Motions were usually brought forward. Another difficulty about this mode of procedure was that in Motions of that sort they had to deal with an abstract Motion without the possibility of moving an Amendment. The hon. Member, in fact, who brought forward any question, put the House in the position into which no Member had a right to put it, for he forced the House to say "Aye" or "No" to a particular definite proposition, and prevented any Member from moving an Amendment. Thus Members were compelled to come to a conclusion which very imperfectly expressed the opinion of the House, and he thought it would be far better that such Motions should be discussed at a time when they might be so amended as really to express the feelings of the House. He had merely glanced at this question by the way. He did not think that it would be well to adopt the proposition of the noble Lord in the imperfect form of confining it to the Monday, because then extraordinary difficulties would arise. They would have a Vote passed on Monday; therefore, when it came up for Report, there would be a general debate. But a Vote taken on Thursday would not be open for discussion on Report, and thus they would have confusion worse confounded. Red ink, or asterisks, or something of that sort would have to be used to indicate the difference. When, also, they got well into the Session, they would have three or four different Reports of Supply on the Paper, and enormous difficulty in getting them through because of these very complications. Therefore, he maintained that if they were to accept the suggestions of the noble Marquess they should extend them to the whole of the week. He did appeal to the House whether this was not a good opportunity for settling the Business of the House on the Rules as suggested by the noble Lord, and for making a real, practical, and efficient improvement in the Business?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE observed, that the three questions to which the Chairman of Committees referred had all been brought forward on a Friday, and not on Supply nights. He was sorry to see the "No-surrender" tone of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, though he could not wonder that he had not accepted the noble Lord's proposal. It was quite true that this Resolution came recommended by the Committee; but the right hon. Gentleman forgot to mention that the Committee were against the Resolution as it stood, and without the Amendments which would be proposed to-night. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was mistaken when he said that the Speaker had given it as his opinion that a Minister ought not to make his Statement with the Speaker in the Chair. The fact was otherwise. The Speaker, in his evidence, had distinctly stated that it was desirable that the Minister in charge of Estimates should make his Statement with the Speaker in the Chair.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not referring to the evidence of the Speaker, but to his ruling in the House as the matter now stood, and as proof that his right hon. Friend had made his Statement with the Speaker in the Chair.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he did not think a Resolution of this kind was the proper remedy for the evil complained of. If independent Members were pressed too much they would retaliate, not by obstruction, but by bringing forward their Motions on other and more inconvenient occasions. It would be within their competence to bring forward Motions on the Budget night; but he did not say they would resort to that course. They would not, however, surrender their nights on appeal from the Government, as before, and in this way the Government would lose more nights in a Session than they would gain by the Resolution.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he would not charge the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Government with any dark design against the liberties of the House or the country; but, whenever in any part of the world—from the Neva to the Tiber, or from the Golden Horn to Westminster—he heard of a Minister approaching Parliament to induce it to surrender some of its liberties, he was reminded of the picture of Richard III. tempting his nephews out of the safety of their sanctuary to confide in their tender-hearted uncle. He would trust no Government or Minister with the liberties of the people. The Prince Consort had once said that Parliamentary institutions in this country were on their trial, and what an outcry the remark called forth! The Government were certainly putting them on their trial now. The Government had no case to-day unless it was that Parliament had no right to be trusted with the liberties it had hitherto enjoyed. For the last 30 years, unfortunately, attempts had been successfully made by Governments to trench on the liberties of Parliament and to narrow the limits of debate. He was sorry the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) should have given his influence in favour of this strange encroachment on the liberties of the House. The hon. Member had complained that there were no real grievances brought forward now; but he did not define what grievances were. He inferred from his speech, however, that he thought a complaint as to the Irish land system would be no legitimate grievance; but that a grievance would be found in a complaint that Colonel Lord Fitznuddy had been deprived of his commission without having his case investigated. If that was the view taken by the Government as to what constituted a grievance, he should at once contest it. He contended that a grievance in the sense of the Constitution meant any complaint or demand on the concession of which the grant of money to the Crown depended. If they went back to history, they would find Bills had originated in the practice of the Commons tacking on to the grants made to the Crown certain Petitions demanding remedies for their grievances. It was in that practice that the whole freedom of the House and its rights to pass laws had originated. But to-night they found it suggested that Parliament performed no function in the political economy of this country, save as a mere law-making machine. He denied such a statement. It was a low and ignoble view to take of that House, which was no Chamber for registering the decrees of a Ministry or of any number of wise men, but a place where the voice of the country should be heard discussing as well as enacting. They could have no enacting without preceding discussion. No doubt, Ministers did not like discussion. Lord Eldon, 50 years ago, would, doubtless, have told them that the discussions on Reform were a nuisance, a waste of the time of Parliament, and an irritation to the King's conscience. Were they to be told to-night that the liberties enjoyed by Parliament 40 years ago must be clipped now for the convenience of a Ministry who wanted Votes more rapidly for their accumulating wars? Of course, in any Parliament there would be a great deal of talk; there was always chaff with the grain; but the spirit of the Constitution was that the voice of the country should be heard in order that our rulers might know what evils were irritating the mind of the nation, wisely or unwisely, for the time being. Suppress that, and they would share the fate of the despots of the Continent, to whom these ebullitions of popular feeling were exceedingly disagreeable. It was useful to the safety of the country that every feeling should have an outlet in Parliament. If they wanted to economize public time at the sacrifice of their most cherished institutions, there was a shorter and better mode of doing it. Let them elect some 21 of its wise men to do all the Business. They would have little talk then, and they would provide a greater number of Bills in accordance with the taste of the Government than they got now. It was really in that direction that they were being asked to travel to-night, and he should resist it by all the means in his power. In his short experience of the House he had seen the Prerogatives of Parliament substantially encroached upon; and he regretted that the Prime Minister, who rose into prominence by moving Motions on going into Committee of Supply, should lend his name to such a proposition as was now before the House, in order that, at the close of his first Parliament, he might retire on his laurels able to say—"I am that Minister who, during five or six Sessions, by measures not known for 100 years, introduced personal government, extended the Prerogatives of the Crown, and curtailed the liberties of Parliament."

Mr. Sullivan

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE was not surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should have repudiated the proposition of the noble Lord; for, however much it might be for the convenience of the House, it would not facilitate the passing of the Government measures. Unless, however, the right hon. Gentleman would offer some further compromise than he had done, he would have very great difficulty in carrying his first Resolution.

DR. KENEALY: Mr. Speaker, when I came down to the House I did not intend to take any part in this debate; I was anxious to hear both sides, and to form my opinion. What I have heard to-night has satisfied me that I ought to support the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his first Resolution. I shall state in a few words the way in which the question presents itself to my mind. This House votes countless millions every year in Committee of Supply. The National Expenditure is rapidly increasing; the general ability to endure that Expenditure is growing less and less every day. It behoves us all, therefore, if we desire to do our duty to our constituents, to watch the growth of that Expenditure with the most wary eyes, and to do all we can that may make it less. How is this to be effected? By having better means than we now possess of checking these extensive money Votes. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), and other hon. Gentlemen of the same school of politics, have ridiculed the idea of any good being effected by attacking money Votes in Committee of Supply. I dissent from him and them, because I know that the late Mr. Joseph Hume, by his persistent criticisms of Supply, saved the country millions every year. Under our present system, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer strives to improve, what happens? Supply is set down for a certain evening; 20 or 30 hon. Members at once give Notice of Motions on almost every possible subject, and these Motions have all to be discussed and decided upon before we get into Committee of Supply. Thus the whole night is often wasted, and we are called upon to debate the question of expending millions of the public money at 1, or 2, and often 3 o'clock in the morning, when hon. Members are broken down and utterly exhausted by the previous Sitting. The result is that there is no criticism, there is no real discussion, and Ministers get these millions often in a House consisting of a dozen Members, almost for the asking. I have seen Votes of the worst kind for many millions of money passed sub silentio, and almost as a matter of course, when day was dawning, in this way, because hon. Members were both physically and mentally incapable, by reason of their previous labours, to carry on the war any longer. I have come down here myself, over and over again, early in the evening, prepared to challenge items in Supply. I have waited during long and dreary hours, hoping that the previous Motions would come to an end; and at last, finding that they were likely to go on and on, I have been compelled, long past midnight, from sheer faintness and exhaustion, to leave the House without having had a chance of moving for retrenchment, or expressing my dissent from extravagant claims made. Now, I know that there are many hon. Members, anxious reformers, like myself, of Public Expenditure, retrenchers of the extravagance that exists, who have been forced out of the House "in the small hours of the morning" by the same reasons that have so frequently operated in my own case. Hence it is that we have no means of resisting the wanton waste, or restraining the torrents of money which we see poured around us. And I regard it as a good measure, on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he offers to put an end to this abuse on one evening at least—Monday—in the course of the week. By this means, as we go into Supply at once, we shall—all of us who are economical reformers—be able to attack these items in the Estimates which we deem to be objectionable. I am constrained, therefore, by a sense of duty to support this Resolution, which I believe will prove itself to be one highly beneficial to the public, and which may save the country many millions every year. I lament the course taken by hon. Members on these Benches, and I think the general public will eventually disapprove of that course, and will derive great benefit from the change proposed. With reference to the wild and almost lunatic fears expressed that we are abandoning "wonderful rights and privileges," I am in no way alarmed at such high-flown nonsense. It may suit some ignorant platforms, and may probably delude the unthinking; but it is wholly unworthy of this House. I have not seen yet on the part of Ministers any real proof that they have entered into a conspiracy to destroy the just rights and privileges of Members. When they do so I, for one, shall be ready to resist them to the utmost. Nay, I may add that the whole House would rise in rebellion against them. For this reason I treat with scorn and disbelief those empty, sounding, and trumpery phrases by which only the most dull, foolish, or thoughtless could be misled. This House is well able, and I think is always willing, to guard its "rights and privileges" against all attacks; against all interference and encroachment. And by passing this Resolution, it will really regain one of its most priceless of all rights—that of criticizing and reducing the Public Expenditure. This right has practically been lost since the days of Joseph Hume. Hence the increase of Expenditure by £30,000,000 a-year; hence the fearful addition to taxation. In Mr. Hume's day the whole public annual Expenditure was less than £50,000,000; it is now £80,000,000. Why should I, then, resist a Resolution which will enable many of us to do now what Mr. Hume then did? Under 40 years of a "Liberal" Government, we have lost this most precious "right and privilege." I support the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who endeavours to restore it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that as the suggestion made on the subject before the House by the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington) could not be ignored, he thought the better course to be pursued would be to adjourn the debate upon the Resolution, in order that it might be considered how the noble Lord's proposal could be shaped so as to meet the views of the hon. Members generally. Meanwhile, there was plenty of other Business to which they could apply themselves. He regarded these Resolutions as more nibbling at a great question, and as not in the least likely to effect the object in view—the improvement of the machinery by which the Business of the House was conducted. These Resolutions would not enable the House to get rid of the Irish Question, which stood in the way of English and Scotch Business. He had been studying the working of one of the United States Provincial Legislatures lately. In 40 or 50 days it got through more work than the House of Commons did in a whole Session, and the reason was that most of the work was done in Committee, and the House merely confirmed the Committee's operations. He was disposed to support the division of the House into Grand Committees for the purpose of carrying on contemporaneously the Business of the several Departments of the State. He confessed that it would be impossible to carry out this proposal without a considerable change in the character of the House; but the proposal was one that would deal comprehensively with the difficulty before them. It would be better to postpone the consideration of the Resolution then before the House, in order that they might have the proposal of the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition also before them and consider them together.

MR. PARNELL said, he had always thought the proceedings of the Committee on Public Business last Session very imperfect, because they were only directed to one portion of the subject. Of late years they had got into the habit of thinking that the Government of the day was the House, and that, in fact, Government Business was the only portion of the Business of Parliament that was worthy of any consideration whatever. It appeared to him that that view was allowed to prevail very largely in the Select Committee on Public Business. History would show how dangerous it was to strengthen the hands of the Government as against the House. In years gone by, when that House was struggling for its liberties, Ministers were only admitted there on sufferance. Instead of the Government claiming two days a-week, as they did now, all the days should belong to private Members, who—and not the Government—really constituted the House. However, he supposed it had been found convenient to give the Government a day or two each week, not so much as the Representatives of the Crown in that House, but as the Representatives of the opinion of the majority of the people of this country, in order that they might bring forward those measures which the majority were in favour of. Parliament, however, in giving Mondays and Thursdays to the Government made the exception that when Supply stood for those days, any hon. Member might move Amendments, with the view of bringing up discussion on any grievance. Now, the Government wanted to go a step further, and convert Parliament into a mere machine for voting money for the purposes of the Government—whether good or bad. The whole of last Session was practically devoted to that purpose. The profession of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he wanted to give more time for the discussion of the Estimates was all very well; but they all knew that no Minister really wanted his Estimates to be discussed at all. He did not believe the passing of these Resolutions would lead to any saving of time; and the House did not think so, for in regard to argument and moral support the Government really found themselves deserted. There were many considerations involved in a question like the present. There was the consideration as to whether, after they had done everything, they would really be a gainer thereby. The suggestion that grievances should be taken on the Report of Supply was condemned by the evidence of Sir Erskine May; and if as much latitude were allowed on Report as on the Motion to go into Committee, the loss of time would be equal to the saving. The evidence of Sir Erskine May and of the Speaker was opposed to the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; they doubted whether it would meet with the support of the House, and their doubts were confirmed by the debate. The Speaker supported the revival of the Resolution of 1872 and 1873, which provided for the discussion, on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair, of Amendments relating to any of the Votes proposed to be taken in Committee. He freely admitted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when moving for the appointment of the Committee on Public Business, said he did not do so for the purpose of dealing with the question of obstruction, but of facilitating the general Business of the House; but the Committee had not proceeded very far in its labours before the Chancellor of the Exchequer, without Notice, introduced the question of obstruction by the horns, and thus the Committee was entirely turned aside from its original object to the very barren question of obstruction. No doubt, great questions could be brought forward on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply; but he would appeal to the recollection of hon. Members of the House whether that had been done—whether it had not been the practice for hon. Members who had charge of a question to ballot for a night? Unless under very special circumstances, no such subject as the Irish Land Question or the Irish University Education Question could be brought forward on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply on Monday or Thursday. Private Members had not an opportunity of knowing the intention of the Government as to Supply, and they could not tell sufficiently in advance whether there would be an opportunity of stopping Supply by bringing forward such questions. Originally the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that Friday should be made a Motion night for private Members as an equivalent or compensation for the loss of Monday; but after a time the right hon. Gentleman dropped that idea, and it was not brought forward again. He (Mr. Parnell) thought they ought to have Friday made a Motion night, in order that grievances might be brought forward. With regard to the question of Count-outs, the difficulty of keeping a House on Fridays was well known. It was comparatively easy for a powerful Party like the Home Rule Party to keep a House; but what of private Members? He would appeal to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), whether there was not considerable difficulty in keeping a House even on such an important question as that of the Monastic and Conventual Institutions? If, however, they turned Friday into a Motion night, every hon. Member who had a Motion down on the Paper would be desirous of keeping a House on that night, because his Motion would be discussed. He made a proposition in the Committee on Public Business that questions relating to England, Ireland, and Scotland should be referred to Select Committees, consisting respectively of Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen; and he thought that might also be carried out with regard to Estimates. English Estimates might be referred to a Committee consisting of Englishmen, Scotch Estimates to a Committee consisting of Scotchmen, and Irish Estimates to a Committee consisting of Irishmen, with power to the House to direct that they should then be referred to a Committee of the Whole House if necessary. If a Rule similar to that were adopted with regard to Bills, Public Business would be greatly expedited. He did not believe the propositions of the Government, directed as they were against the rest of the Constitution, would in the slightest degree effect the objects for which they were brought forward. They were brought in ostensibly to promote Public Business, and to enable the Government to get Supply with as little discussion as possible. The origin of all this was said to have arisen out of the proceedings of certain Irish Members; but was it not a foolish thing for Englishmen to set to work to injure their own Constitution in the attempt to devise a remedy for that evil? Surely they could discover some better means of dealing with that matter than by adopting measures which would have the effect of impairing their legislative proceedings. He ventured to think that the common sense of the House would see that the proceedings of the Government were of an unconstitutional nature, and ought not to be sanctioned by it.

MR. MUNTZ regretted that the Government had not thought fit to entertain the proposition of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington), nor even the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) to adopt the old Rule of 1872, of which the House had had practical experience and which had worked so well. They might by an immense majority carry this Resolution; but they had other people besides the Members of that House to deal with—they had to deal with the opinion of the country. Did they think that they would put down Irish obstruction by these Resolutions? Nothing could be more absurd, because, whatever the form of those Resolutions, hon. Members would be able to drive a coach-and-six through them. They must trust to the feeling of forbearance among the hon. Gentlemen who formed that House. He was always anxious to facilitate the Business of the House, and always made it a point of supporting every means likely for promoting that end, and if he thought that the Resolutions would facilitate Business, he would be the last to object to them; but he maintained that their influence, if adopted, would be quite the reverse, and in addition they would be an interference with the Constitutional liberties of the country. The Resolutions would debar hon. Members from opening a discussion in a way which hon. Gentlemen would not tolerate, and instead of avoiding obstruction would really increase it. It was for these reasons that he objected to each and all of the Resolutions.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON observed that the contention of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz) was that this was a Resolution which had taken the House almost by surprise, and was intended to destroy the liberties of individual Members, and was aimed at obstruction. The hon. Member must have forgotten that the first introduction of the present system of bringing forward grievances on going into Committee of Supply dated no further back than 1811, and that from that time until 1821 only three Motions were made on Supply. From 1821, with rare exceptions, the practice was not pursued for many years. The notion that the custom dated back from time immemorial was therefore a delusion. The hon. Member also appeared to have forgotten that a Resolution similar to that now proposed, intended to facilitate the progress of the Business of the country, was adopted in 1872, and, being found to work well, was continued with some little difference in 1873. There were no complaints during those two Sessions from the Liberal Benches; no denunciations that private Members were being deprived of their rights; no charge against the Government of attempting to take the entire control of Business, and almost violating the Constitution. That fact at once disposed of the terrible statements of the hon. Member, who seemed to have forgotten the whole of the events in his distinguished career in the hope of putting another nail into what he believed was the coffin of this Resolution. He wished that the House would believe Her Majesty's Government, when they stated that they had proposed this Resolution honestly and in good faith, with the view to facilitate the transaction of the Business of the country, and especially Supply. Grievances and legislation were doubtless important enough in themselves; but the transaction of the necessary Business of the country was of at least equal importance, and indeed there were many statesmen of high authority who were of opinion that it was the most important of all. The object of the Government was to endeavour, on the lines that were successful before, to bring about some certainty in the conduct of Business, to insure the necessary consideration of the Votes, to prevent them coming on at the end of the Session, when they could not be properly considered, and to prevent what was certainly not a proper way of conducting financial business—the necessity of taking Votes on Account. When he was asked to withdraw the Resolution in order to consider the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition, he could not help asking if there was any prospect of agreement upon that Amendment? With regard to the fear which had been expressed that this Resolution would provoke criticism of a more minute character than had before been bestowed on the details of the Estimates, and that more time would be wasted, he replied that the same opportunity had existed up to the present moment, and no additional facility would be given after the passing of this Resolution. It could not fairly be said that the Resolution was one which pointed at an obstructive policy; it simply aimed at the proper conduct of Business, and as such he asked the House to consider it.

Mr. Parnell

MR. MUNTZ, in explanation, said, he had been misunderstood by the hon. Baronet who had just addressed the House. What he said was that he regretted the fact that Her Majesty's Government had not adopted the same Rule.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that he was strongly opposed to the Resolutions as an interference with the liberty of the people and the privileges of the House of Commons. They were meant to gag independent Members, who ought to resist to the utmost the curtailment of their rights. The rights of the people were far superior to the necessity for voting Supplies; and if those privileges and rights could not be enjoyed and vindicated, together with the necessary Supplies being voted in a Session of six months, why, then let them sit for eight or even ten months in each year.

MR. BENTINCK said, the great evil of the day was the disproportionate power of the House of Commons, and he would have cordially endorsed the Resolutions if he believed they would diminish that power; but he did not consider that they would. He thought that the most striking feature of the debate was that those who had taken part in it had not arrived at an understanding of what was the real question. The right hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) said it was the personal privilege of private Members; but it was nothing of the sort. He admitted that that was an important matter; but the rights and privileges of constituencies were far more important.

The real question was, whether the people of this country should be deprived of the only legitimate way in which they could bring their grievances before the House. He had been surprised to hear the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate)—who was a high authority on these subjects—say that the arrangement for enabling private Members to state grievances on Friday evenings by setting up Committee of Supply as an Order of the Day ought to satisfy those Members; for, as a matter of fact, the House was counted out on nine out of ten Friday nights.

MR. NEWDEGATE, in explanation, said, he had only referred to the practice of setting up Supply on Friday evenings as one of recent origin; and that at the time of its institution it was intended and believed that the Government would keep a House on those evenings.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the explanation of his hon. Friend fully corroborated his remarks; and in providing this panacea the Government of that day bound itself, as a point of honour, to keep a House on Friday night. That was done for some years; but Government succeeded Government, and did not feel themselves bound by the professions of their predecessors. His hon. Friend had warned the House that if they did not pass Rules regulating their proceedings they would increase the power of the House of Lords. Well, it had been said that one reason of the delay of Public Business in the House of Commons was the increased power of that House; and he, for one, would not object to an increase of the power of the House of Lords, as he believed they ought to maintain a balance of power as between the Estates of the Realm. He could not but think, however, that if they passed this Resolution, they would be sacrificing the rights of their constituents to have their grievances brought, at the earliest possible period, before this House. He therefore asked whether, for the mere purpose of putting down obstruction which could not be put down, the House was prepared to vitiate a great Constitutional principle and say that the people of England should no longer have the opportunity of placing their grievances before the House of Commons?

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that the principle of putting grievances before Supply did not date from 1821, but from 1642. He should have expected the right hon. Gentleman, when he proposed to interfere with the privileges of Members, to show in what respect those privileges had been abused. What the Government were going to do was to provide for themselves an easy day for doing Business which they had never taken on that day before. The time of the House would be much better occupied in carefully examining the Estimates than in discussions as to what some policeman should have done at Clapham, as to what the master of a workhouse had done in Tralee, or as to some question connected with the arrival of an emigrant ship at Queenstown—a question which, generally speaking, was soon explained away. A great Constitutional question was involved in the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he felt himself compelled to vote against them. He did join in the view that the Irish Members ought to be exasperated; it took a great deal to exasperate some of them, and others did not entertain a desire to be exasperated; but they intended to do the duty which they had been sent to the House by their constituents to perform, and they would somehow or other discharge that duty, even if the Government succeeded in carrying its Resolutions. In his opinion, it would be useless to pass the Rule under consideration, as the resources of Parliamentary science would enable hon. Members who were so inclined to occupy as much of the public time in the future as they had done, or could have done, in the past. These Resolutions could only advance the Business of the House if they were passed with general consent.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE remarked that the contention that the Resolutions suggested by the Government would facilitate the Business of the House was a mere pretence. The Resolutions were aimed altogether at the Irish Members, and, therefore, he opposed them. They were in no way called for. The Irish Members had frequently rendered considerable service to the House by their criticisms of the Estimates. The Mutiny Bill of last Session and the Prisons Bill were illustrations of this fact.

MR. O'CLERY said, this was not the first time that a Chancellor of the Exchequer had proposed a series of Resolutions to curtail the privileges of the Irish Members. The same course had been taken in the last Parliament by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe); but the right hon. Gentleman had been obliged to abandon his Resolutions on the third night of the debate, in face of the opposition of the whole House. That ought in itself to be a warning to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer to desist from the course which he was now pursuing of attempting to force upon the House the will of the Cabinet for the time being. Nothing would be gained by the passing of these Resolutions. On the contrary, their adoption would deprive those outside from having any fair representation made of their grievances within the Chamber, and this appeared to him to be a vital point. He objected to the country being subjected to a sort of despotism on the part of the front Ministerial Bench. He objected to this attempt on the part of the Government to dragoon the Irish Members. The Leader of the House might possibly have tried to take a leaf out of the book of Prince Bismarck, and it might even be in contemplation in certain eventualities to imprison particular Members of the House; but he ventured to think that hon. Gentlemen, no matter how they might individually disagree on some points, would combine in endeavouring to resist a Ministry, no matter how powerful, that put forward Resolutions of this description—Resolutions which were obviously introduced with the object of crushing out the rising spirit of indignation which must undoubtedly prevail at the way in which the Government had treated Ireland. Hopes had been raised that certain Irish measures would be brought forward at the beginning of the Session; but at the last moment, in obedience to a feeling of bigotry and prejudice on the part of some Members of the Cabinet, that good intention had been abandoned, and now it was proposed to stifle the voice of the Representatives of the Irish people. He hoped and believed that many Members of the Conservative, as well as of the Liberal Party, would, in a spirit of fair play, oppose these Resolutions.

MR. J. R. YORKE approved a proposal that had been made to print along with the Estimates some kind of abstract which might enable hon. Members to wade with some degree of intelligence through the masses of figures that to the unprofessional mind presented so unpromising an appearance. The want of some such guide as this usually caused the evening on which the Estimates were introduced to be almost entirely wasted. A Minister, in making a Statement, went into calculations which no one not an expert could follow. He received the congratulations of his Colleagues, while others truly said that it was impossible for them at that time to follow him in matters of detail; and practically discussion was postponed until Members had read the report of the speech in The Times. If, instead of the speech being made in the House, the substance of it were embodied in an introduction to the Estimates, they could read it and come duly prepared for an intelligent discussion of the Business of the House. That was one of the few practical suggestions that had been made in the course of the discussion. If any part of the object aimed at were the putting down of Irish Members, the Government had set about it in a tame and unintelligible manner. The first effect of the Resolution would be to prevent the legitimate discussion of grievances and to stop many quiet men who were unwilling to strain the forms of the House from bringing forward questions of importance. It would not operate for a moment to restrain Irish Members; if they chose to exhibit pertinacity and determination, they would not find the slightest difficulty in airing their grievances. In a debate which occurred in 1872, Mr. Henley said he did not think any sufficient ground could be alleged for curtailing the privileges of the House, and he could see nothing in the proposal but an intention on the part of the Liberal Government to muzzle the House of Commons. An alteration of one word would probably adapt that sentence to the present circumstances. Mr. Henley added that the proposal would not save time or facilitate the getting of money. It was against the law of nature, for it was as true in public as it was in private matters, that if you wanted to get money you must hear what people had to say.

The operation of the proposed Rule would make it worse to get money, for grievances would be ventilated, without Notice, on the Motion to report Progress, seeing that it was not proposed that Supply should go on continuously as many hours as the Government pleased. He agreed with these sentiments, and did not think any new Rules were wanted to meet obstruction. That could be dealt with by a courageous application of existing Rules. If a Member was guilty of obstruction, the Speaker could call the attention of the House to the fact that he was guilty of contempt, and on a Motion by the Leader of the House or any Member of sufficient authority, the offender having been heard in his defence, the House could inflict an adequate penalty. If that course had been taken, they might long ago have dealt with obstruction more efficiently than by new Rules, which would abridge the legitimate opportunities of bringing forward grievances and prevent hon. Members doing what it was their duty to do. The Rules would be inoperative to prevent obstruction, and mischievous so far as they affected the legitimate Business of the House.

MR. ANDERSON said, it had been alleged that this Resolution would facilitate the getting into Committee of Supply. If that were so, he might be disposed to accept it, as he thought the discussions in Committee on the Votes, so far from being a waste of time, were most valuable; because, though they seldom got a reduction of the Estimates, the knowledge that these Estimates were liable to be discussed in detail had a beneficial effect on their preparation. He did not, however, believe that these Resolutions would enable them to discuss the Estimates better. The question of grievances before Supply was one in which their constituencies were greatly interested, and the Members of the present Parliament were bound to hand down unimpaired to their successors in the next Parliament those rights which they had received in trust for the people. He liked very much the proposal suggested by the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs to substitute Report on Supply to going into Committee for the hearing of grievances, and to make the Report the First Order of the Day. He urged the Government, even at that late hour, to consent to some modification of the rigid line they had taken up.

MR. GREGORY said, he could not agree with the view taken on this subject by the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), and he believed the constituencies would take a very different view of the question before the House. The question really was how the Business of the country was to be carried on; whether the House was to be looked upon as a Legislative Assembly, or to degenerate into a mere debating society? Private Members had three nights in the week when they might discuss matters in which they and their constituencies were interested, and this might be taken as a sufficient recognition of the Constitutional principle of grievances before Supply. They were also in the habit of addressing 20 or 30 Questions, many of an argumentative character, to Ministers every night; and surely it was not too much to allow the Government to go into Supply on Monday without obstruction.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT expressed his belief that any attempt made professedly to save time of the House did not promote Public Business; but, on the contrary, was made use of to waste the time of the House. There were various kinds of obstruction. The obstruction on that side of the House was only an exceptional circumstance; but obstruction in a certain sense to many propositions that were essential to the good of the country was on the other side of the House the normal condition of affairs. He believed the Government would find it impossible to pass this Resolution, opposed as it was by so many influential Members on both sides of the House. Even the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself had admitted that it would be useless to attempt to pass such a Resolution unless he carried the House with him. He therefore hoped the Government would consent to modify it as the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition had suggested.

MR. BIGGAR remarked that if the Resolutions were adopted, the effect would be in a short time to prevent hon. Members from bringing forward their grievances. They would be at the mercy of Ministers, of Morning Sittings, and of Counts-out. He would remind Conservative Members that the day might come when they would wish to bring forward their grievances, and the law, which it was now proposed to enact against the Irish Representatives, might then be directed against themselves. There was the grievance of the Irish Land Laws, and there was the grievance of Irish University Education. Those were not second-class evils, but grievances of the first magnitude; and how were they to be brought before the House, if the Irish Members were to be precluded from introducing such questions in the only way in which they had really the power of raising them?

Amendment (Mr. Benceford Hope), by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR NOLAN moved to restrict the operation of the Rule to June, July, and August. He was sorry to say that the question, although one of gravity, was not one from which they would expect to receive any great support from the country. Very many persons, who thought a great deal of their own grievances, cared very little about the forms of the House, although what they were discussing to-night was simply the means of taking away from unfortunate electors in different parts of the Kingdom the means of getting their grievances brought forward and redressed. If they were to follow the fashion of some foreign Assemblies, where it was necessary to get the sanction of a large number of Members before any subject was discussed, it would be looked on as something startling; but that was precisely the effect of the present proposals of the Government. If the Resolutions were passed, there would only remain Tuesdays and Fridays for the ventilation of grievances, and hon. Members knew that it was necessary to get together 40 Members to keep the House, which was not always an easy matter. Of course, those who sat on the front Opposition Benches would be able to obtain sufficient aid to make and keep a House; but then they were not very fond of taking up ordinary questions, while the importance of most questions was only gradually made to dawn on the public mind. Some organized system of keeping a House ought in these circumstances, he thought, to be resorted to by the general body of Members; for if the new Rule were adopted, unless 40 Members were interested in bringing forward a subject, it would fail to obtain a hearing. His proposal would give the Government all the Mondays in the three last months of the Session for advancing Supply, and that he considered a very fair compromise.

Amendment proposed,

"After the word "Monday," to insert the words "in the months of June, July, and August."—(Major Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. PARNELL said, he was sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree to the compromise of his hon. and gallant Friend, which would give him plenty of time to get through the arrears and grant the concession of the other months to the private Members.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that although he was anxious to see the Resolutions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer modified, he could not support the Amendment, which he believed would create a congestion of Business and throw Supply into the last three months of the Session, when a sufficient examination of the Estimates would be impossible.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the object of his proposal was to get Supply at an early period of the Session, and prevent Votes on Account. The throwing of Supply into the latter part of the Session was exactly what the Government wished to avoid. He must therefore oppose the Amendment.

MR. ANDERSON asked if the Government would not give them some indication of what they intended to do when they came to the subsequent Amendments?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY also desired the Government to say whether they would accept any of the Amendments?

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 161: Majority 93.—(Div. List, No. 17.)

MR. ANDERSON then moved, as an Amendment in the Resolution, the insertion, after the word "Monday," of the words—

"Provided there be not on the Paper any Amendment relevant to the class of Estimates about to be discussed."

Amendment proposed,

After the word "Monday," to insert the words "provided there be not on the Paper any Amendment relevant to the class of Estimates about to be discussed."—(Mr. Anderson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished to remind the House of that which he had stated more than once—namely, that in proposing those Resolutions he had come forward, not on behalf of the Government peculiarly, but on behalf of the real interests of Business and the general convenience of the House, and that he had proposed them, in his capacity of Chairman of the Committee of last Session, in the form in which they were passed by that Committee. He had felt throughout that the great object which should be gained was that they should come, he would not say to an unanimous, but to something like a general agreement as to the Rules by which the House should be guided. It was impossible for any Assembly to go on without Rules of some sort, and it was extremely difficult to carry on Business with Rules against which any very large section of Members had objection. What was desirable was that they should establish a modus vivendi—a manner of transacting their Business which should be satisfactory to the great body of hon. Members. He did not think it signified half so much what the actual Rule they had to guide themselves by was, as in what spirit it was observed. He believed it was once said by Mr. Fox that nothing could be more absurd in theory, or more excellent in practice, than the British Constitution. That was very often the case with regard to many of the Rules of that House and of other assemblies of Englishmen. The Rules appeared in theory to be open to a great many comments and criticisms; but when worked in a fair and reasonable spirit, they were found to be very well suited to the purpose they had in view. He had felt it his duty to propose these Resolutions, as he had said, in the form in which they had passed the Committee of last Session, and he had endeavoured—as others had endeavoured—to impress on the House that they were proposed in that spirit, and with a wish to meet the objections which had been made to them.

hour, to consent to some modification of the rigid line they had taken up.

MR. GREGORY said, he could not agree with the view taken on this subject by the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), and he believed the constituencies would take a very different view of the question before the House. The question really was how the Business of the country was to be carried on; whether the House was to be looked upon as a Legislative Assembly, or to degenerate into a mere debating society? Private Members had three nights in the week when they might discuss matters in which they and their constituencies were interested, and this might be taken as a sufficient recognition of the Constitutional principle of grievances before Supply. They were also in the habit of addressing 20 or 30 Questions, many of an argumentative character, to Ministers every night; and surely it was not too much to allow the Government to go into Supply on Monday without obstruction.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT expressed his belief that any attempt made professedly to save time of the House did not promote Public Business; but, on the contrary, was made use of to waste the time of the House. There were various kinds of obstruction. The obstruction on that side of the House was only an exceptional circumstance; but obstruction in a certain sense to many propositions that were essential to the good of the country was on the other side of the House the normal condition of affairs. He believed the Government would find it impossible to pass this Resolution, opposed as it was by so many influential Members on both sides of the House. Even the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself had admitted that it would be useless to attempt to pass such a Resolution unless he carried the House with him. He therefore hoped the Government would consent to modify it as the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition had suggested.

MR. BIGGAR remarked that if the Resolutions were adopted, the effect would be in a short time to prevent hon. Members from bringing forward their grievances. They would be at the mercy of Ministers, of Morning Sitings, and of Counts-out. He would remind Conservative Members that the day might come when they would wish to bring forward their grievances, and the law, which it was now proposed to enact against the Irish Representatives, might then be directed against themselves. There was the grievance of the Irish Land Laws, and there was the grievance of Irish University Education. Those were not second-class evils, but grievances of the first magnitude; and how were they to be brought before the House, if the Irish Members were to be precluded from introducing such questions in the only way in which they had really the power of raising them?

Amendment (Mr. Benceford Hope), by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR NOLAN moved to restrict the operation of the Rule to June, July, and August. He was sorry to say that the question, although one of gravity, was not one from which they would expect to receive any great support from the country. Very many persons, who thought a great deal of their own grievances, cared very little about the forms of the House, although what they were discussing to-night was simply the means of taking away from unfortunate electors in different parts of the Kingdom the means of getting their grievances brought forward and redressed. If they were to follow the fashion of some foreign Assemblies, where it was necessary to get the sanction of a large number of Members before any subject was discussed, it would be looked on as something startling; but that was precisely the effect of the present proposals of the Government. If the Resolutions were passed, there would only remain Tuesdays and Fridays for the ventilation of grievances, and hon. Members knew that it was necessary to get together 40 Members to keep the House, which was not always an easy matter. Of course, those who sat on the front Opposition Benches would be able to obtain sufficient aid to make and keep a House; but then they were not very fond of taking up ordinary questions, while the importance of most questions was only gradually made to dawn on the public mind. Some organized system of keeping a House ought in these circumstances, he thought, to be resorted to by the general body of Members; for if the new Rule were adopted, unless 40 Members were interested in bringing forward a subject, it would fail to obtain a hearing. His proposal would give the Government all the Mondays in the three last months of the Session for advancing Supply, and that he considered a very fair compromise.

Amendment proposed,

"After the word "Monday," to insert the words "in the months of June, July, and August."—(Major Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. PARNELL said, he was sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree to the compromise of his hon. and gallant Friend, which would give him plenty of time to get through the arrears and grant the concession of the other months to the private Members.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that although he was anxious to see the Resolutions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer modified, he could not support the Amendment, which he believed would create a congestion of Business and throw Supply into the last three months of the Session, when a sufficient examination of the Estimates would be impossible.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the object of his proposal was to get Supply at an early period of the Session, and prevent Votes on Account. The throwing of Supply into the latter part of the Session was exactly what the Government wished to avoid. He must therefore oppose the Amendment.

MR. ANDERSON asked if the Government would not give them some indication of what they intended to do when they came to the subsequent Amendments?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY also desired the Government to say whether they would accept any of the Amendments?

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 161: Majority 93.—(Div. List, No. 17.)

MR. ANDERSON then moved, as an Amendment in the Resolution, the insertion, after the word "Monday," of the words—

"Provided there be not on the Paper any Amendment relevant to the class of Estimates about to be discussed."

Amendment proposed,

After the word "Monday," to insert the words "provided there be not on the Paper any Amendment relevant to the class of Estimates about to be discussed."—(Mr. Anderson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished to remind the House of that which he had stated more than once—namely, that in proposing those Resolutions he had come forward, not on behalf of the Government peculiarly, but on behalf of the real interests of Business and the general convenience of the House, and that he had proposed them, in his capacity of Chairman of the Committee of last Session, in the form in which they were passed by that Committee. He had felt throughout that the great object which should be gained was that they should come, he would not say to an unanimous, but to something like a general agreement as to the Rules by which the House should be guided. It was impossible for any Assembly to go on without Rules of some sort, and it was extremely difficult to carry on Business with Rules against which any very large section of Members had objection. What was desirable was that they should establish a modus vivendi—a manner of transacting their Business which should be satisfactory to the great body of hon. Members. He did not think it signified half so much what the actual Rule they had to guide themselves by was, as in what spirit it was observed. He believed it was once said by Mr. Fox that nothing could be more absurd in theory, or more excellent in practice, than the British Constitution. That was very often the case with regard to many of the Rules of that House and of other assemblies of Englishmen. The Rules appeared in theory to be open to a great many comments and criticisms; but when worked in a fair and reasonable spirit, they were found to be very well suited to the purpose they had in view. He had felt it his duty to propose these Resolutions, as he had said, in the form in which they had passed the Committee of last Session, and he had endeavoured—as others had endeavoured—to impress on the House that they were proposed in that spirit, and with a wish to meet the objections which had been made to them.

He had sought to persuade the House that the form in which they had been suggested to it was, on the whole, the best which it could adopt. He candidly admitted that in the course of the discussion more objection had been raised to the particular proposal he had made than he had been prepared to find. He could not deny that if the Resolution were to be carried by a majority against an unwilling and large minority, it was exceedingly probable that in practice it would fail. His object was distinctly a practical one, and he desired to arrive at some arrangement which would be more acceptable to the great body of the House. With regard to the suggestion of the noble Lord, to which a good deal of favour had been accorded, he, without expressing a positive opinion against the possibility of working it into shape, wished to observe that it was a novel proposal, and one to which, on further reflection, fresh objections might be raised. Therefore, he was not prepared to recommend the House to adopt so great a change in its procedure. Five or six hon. Gentlemen had given Notice of Amendments more or less in the sense of the proposal now submitted by the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson). All these Amendments might be taken together as pointing towards and centring around the Rule known as the Rule of 1872, which was in force for three years. It was discontinued at the beginning of the present Parliament, under the auspices of his noble Friend the present Prime Minister, whose desire was to endeavour to conduct the Business of the House without any limitations at all. However, the Rule worked fairly well during the time it was in force. It was proposed again in the Committee of last year, but was rejected in favour of the proposal now in his name on the Paper by a majority of 1. Yet it was rejected under circumstances which deprived the small majority even of the character which at first sight attached to it. In his opinion, the wisest course would be to endeavour to come to an arrangement upon this question, and he was prepared to accept the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), which was as follows:—To add, as an Amendment to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's first Resolution, the words—

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

“ Unless such question should be an Amendment relating to the Class of Estimates proposed to be taken on Supply, on first going into Committee on the Army, Navy, and Civil Services respectively.”

He hoped the House would see that he was making this proposal with a sincere desire to meet the wishes of the House, and that he had throughout not endeavoured to support any views of his own nor to make any Motion in the special interests of the Government; but that he only desired to consult what he believed to be the interest of the House. In conclusion, he trusted there would be a disposition to have the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex substituted for that which had just been proposed by the hon. Member for Glasgow.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that in all his Parliamentary experience he had never known such a waste of time as had been committed on this occasion. If the question were to be debated in all its details, there would be a much greater loss of time than had ever been caused by Motions on going into Committee of Supply. Her Majesty's Government had got into a mess, and did not know how to get out of it. They had much better give up the whole thing with a good grace, and be content to go on with the old Rules, which had worked extremely well. By this debate the House was wasting a great deal of public time, and was presenting a spectacle by no means favourable to the dignity of Parliament. Therefore, he moved that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. GORST seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“ That the Debate be now adjourned.”
—(Sir George Bowyer.)

MR. W. M. TORRENS remarked that the Business of the country had outgrown the old Rule, and that it was desirable to adapt the machinery of the House to new necessities. It was mere nonsense to speak of the Whole House going into Committee of Supply. The Whole House never went into Committee of Supply; the Committee was attended only by a few hon. Members who understood the particular Estimates under consideration, and the other Members stayed away. In proposing the new Rules, the Government could have had no other object than to facilitate the conduct of the Business of the House, and it was clear that they were willing to accept suggestions. But it seemed to him, and he did not say it without consideration, that sooner or later they would have to go further. They would sooner or later have to come back to the good old way which prevailed a century and a-half ago, when the House divided itself into a number of Grand Committees and gave over to them the questions with which they were best qualified to deal. He would give his assent to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex.

MR. DODSON said, they one and all were agreed in upholding the honour of Parliament and the respect in which it was held by the country. But what view was likely to be taken by the country, if they were not able to arrive at a rational conclusion after all this debate? Having long been an officer of the House, he had great respect for its forms and Rules, of which he might be regarded as very conservative. But, nevertheless, he could not but see that from time to time some modification of those Rules and forms might become necessary. He believed it was the opinion of a large portion of the people out-of-doors that the forms of the House of Commons were incredibly clumsy and cumbrous. He did not share that opinion, but it was time that the public should be disabused of the idea that they were so conservative of the forms and Rules of the House, that they would be unwilling to make any alteration where it was conceded that a change was wanted. There were three difficulties with which the House had to contend. In the first place, the great multiplicity of Business; secondly, the prolixity of debate; and, thirdly, uncertainty as to the hour or even the day when any particular piece of Business was to come on. As to the first point, the House was most unwilling to part with any of the Business now intrusted to its charge. ["No!"] An hon. Member said "No;" but he had had the honour of submitting a plan for lightening its labours, and though he received considerable support, he had reason to know that the House was very jealous of any interference on that head. As to prolixity of debate, he hoped they would never be reduced to the necessity of a gag law, or the clôture. Then there remained the uncertainty as to the time of Business, and the evils of that uncertainty culminated in the case of Supply; for this reason, as had been said from the Chair, that going into Supply was an exception to all the Rules of the House as regarded the introduction of irrelevant subjects. The use of that liberty on going into Committee of Supply was one that had grown up in comparatively recent periods. Formerly it was, like the right of moving the adjournment of the House, seldom resorted to. Twenty-five or 30 years ago there were not in a Session more than three or four Motions on going into Committee of Supply. When he first entered the House there were, perhaps, 10 or 11 Motions on going into Supply. That had increased till there were at least 30 or 40 Motions on going into Supply, besides questions on which discussion was allowed. And while that change had been going on in one direction, another change had been going on in an opposite direction—namely, an increase in the number of Votes submitted to the House, greater minuteness in the form in which Votes were presented to the House, and the removal from the Consolidated Fund of a number of charges which were formerly not submitted to the House, but which now were. The Rule which had been proposed to the House was one which had not only been recommended by two Committees of the House appointed to consider this subject, but which had been substantially adopted in the last Parliament and in the present Parliament. For himself, he preferred to accept the Rule in the manner in which it was recommended by the Committee of last year, and proposed to the House in the first instance by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, that when Supply was set down on Monday they should take Supply. This would secure certainty in regard to one of the most important Businesses the House had to transact. He was not one of those who thought that by the adoption of that Rule there would be any vital sacrifice of Constitutional privileges, nor did he believe that the individual Members of the House would find themselves to a very material extent deprived of any reasonable facility of bringing forward subjects which they now enjoyed. But, although that was his view, being anxious for the progress of Business and for the credit of the House, he was prepared, for the sake of agreement, to waive his own preference, and accept the Rule as amended on the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he was sorry that the discovery, to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer confessed, was not made a little earlier in the week, as it would probably have saved a good deal of discussion. Appreciating, however, the frank and friendly way in which the matter had been put, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman, for himself and those with whom he was now acting, that they, too, were desirous of pursuing the debate in a frank and friendly spirit. Looking at the proposed Resolutions, he observed that they divided themselves into two classes. Those of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), only went as far as the Rule of 1872, whilst the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon), as well as he himself, were in favour of the more general and further-extending Rule of 1876—a Rule which owed its birth to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was to be regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not made the concession more complete. With regard to the Amendment of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), it would go far towards removing objections, if he would consent to its amendment by the omission of the one word “first:” so modified, this Amendment would travel the whole distance along which he now proposed to take the House, and might result in general contentment. There was one thing at least on which he might congratulate the House—namely, that it had not allowed itself to be carried away by the proposition, seductive as it was, of the noble Lord the Member for the Radnor Boroughs (the Marquess of Hartington). It was surprising that a Member of his distinguished position, ability, and knowledge of the Business of the House, should have made such a proposal at all. For his own part, if he were an obstructive, he should be very glad of the opportunity which that suggestion supplied for dogging the steps of Supply. Suppose the scheme of the noble Lord to be adopted, how would the case stand on the Monday? Next Monday, let it be supposed, a certain amount of Supply might be run through; on Thursday the Report would be put down, for the Report must always follow the Supply like a shadow. On that Thursday, then, various irrelevant Amendments—irrelevant intentionally, and protected in their irrelevancy by the deliberate decision of the House—would be put down; and perhaps the House might get through these Amendments, if it was lucky, by 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning on the same Thursday. Then must come the substantive Report of the several Votes, and if the House continued in luck, and had got through the Amendments, it might dispose of those items in another week—taking Monday and Thursday. So the process of getting through a night's Supply would, by the noble Lord's plan, when times were critical, take a whole fortnight. As an enemy of obstruction, he was glad that the proposal had not been reduced to black and white and put upon the Notice Paper. He would accordingly suggest to his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex, whether he would not agree to strike out the word “first” from his Amendment?

MR. SERJEANT SIMON thought that the Motion of the hon. and learned Baronet (Sir George Bowyer), if there was any soundness in it, should have been proposed five hours earlier, and all that time would have been saved to the House. As the hon. and gallant Baronet's Motion was substantially the same as his own, he was quite ready to yield to the preference accorded to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex. A great deal had been said during the evening about the privileges of the House, and the control which it should exercise over the Estimates. His experience of two Parliaments had been that, under the plea or shelter of bringing forward grievances, that function of the House of Commons had been postponed on many occasions, to the great detriment of the public interest. Supply had been put down night after night, while the Notice Paper had been literally clogged with Motions which, under the colour of grievances, had really no other purpose than the proposal and discussion of abstract Resolutions which led to no practical results. As a consequence of this, the Estimates had been postponed to so late an hour that when at last they came on, hon. Members found themselves worn out with waiting, and the items were hurried through with little or no discussion. If hon. Members were present to transact the Business of the country, and if the control over expenditure was of the first importance, everything relating to them should be brought before the House at a time when they could be discussed with freshness and vigour. That had not been the case within his experience, and for that reason he thought there should be some modification and a recurrence to the Rule of 1872, which had been found efficient for all purposes. He was glad the Chancellor of the Exchequer had accepted a proposal made in that form.

Mr. Dodson

MR. ANDERSON said, the House had to consider whether the Rule of 1872 or that of 1876 should be revived. He was glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had conceded something; but, in his opinion, he had not conceded quite enough in accepting the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex. He thought the House should divide upon the Amendment; but he was not so wedded to that course as to press it in the face of a strong expression of opinion to the contrary.

MR. GORST thought the question which was before the House was one affecting its dignity, and ought to be decided in accordance therewith. It was not the most dignified mode of procedure that they should be obliged to make a change in their Rules before going to bed; and it was, therefore, on the whole, desirable that they should have at least one night to consider the new proposal before it was finally decided upon. One remarkable circumstance about the proposal was that it entirely did away with the whole argument by which the Government had hitherto supported the Resolution. Why was that argument dropped? Had the Government been convinced that, instead of making a speech, the Minister should produce a printed Report to the House, and that there should be no speech at all? The Chancellor of the Exchequer had twitted independent

Members with having wasted the time of the House; but that evening, at any rate, time had been wasted by the speeches of Ministers themselves. He did not speak in a spirit of hostility to Her Majesty's Government; but, having heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer over and over again that the subject of the Resolution was not one in which the Government was interested, that he made the proposition, not as a Member of the Government, but as a Member of their own Committee, he was compelled to say that the Representative of that Committee had, within the last 20 minutes, entirely changed the proposition which he was supposed to make to the House of Commons. He (Mr. Gorst) thought that the common sense and dignity of the House required that they should at least sleep over that proposition.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I quite agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson), that the Business of the House has so completely altered within the last few years that it has become perfectly evident some changes in its form of procedure are necessary. I confess I have been sometimes astonished at the spirit of Conservatism which has animated the speeches of hon. Members on this side of the House, who have held that because certain forms have been found satisfactory in times gone by, they must be altogether satisfactory now. If there is one thing inherent to this debate, it is the fact that any attempt to alter those forms is a very serious matter, and one which cannot be lightly undertaken. It is perfectly clear that if any effective change is to be made in our procedure, it must be by a measure in the carrying of which the House is prepared to expend a considerable amount of time. It is evident that the House is not prepared to accept the conclusions of the Select Committee without full discussion, and without any responsibility in the matter being taken by the Government. I expressed my opinion at a very early period on Monday evening that the original proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not one which would really effect any great saving of time. With regard to the two propositions before the House, I think the Government must see that a very great objection is felt to reverting to the Rule of 1872. They have not yet conciliated the opposition to this Rule; I have waited on purpose to see if there was any prospect of an agreement on this proposal being arrived at, and I find there is not; but I believe that the Rule of 1876 might be accepted. If this were adopted, the Government would be able to consider whether any radical change in the procedure of the House is required or not, and if so, they could come forward next Session with proposals on their own responsibility; but to revert to the Rule of 1872, which has not been enforced for many Sessions, and to which many objections were taken, will, I believe, lead to a very considerable waste of time without producing any commensurate result. As far as my experience goes, I believe the Rule worked well; but I am not aware that it produced such a saving of time to the House that it would be worth the while of the Government to spend one or two more nights about it. The reason why I suggest a compromise on the basis of the Rule of 1876 is that I have heard it might be accepted, and that we might then proceed to the consideration of the other Resolutions. Whether that is so or not I do not know; but I feel that it will be impossible for the Government to come to any arrangement to-night with regard to the Rule of 1872.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I confess I was taken by surprise at the suggestion of the noble Lord who has just spoken, which was hardly what I should have expected after the proceedings of last Monday and this evening; but we must take things, however, as we find them. We are exceedingly obliged to the noble Lord for the kind attention he has paid to the interests of the Government; but I cannot myself accede to the suggestion which he has been good enough to make, and I prefer, under these circumstances, to trust to the mercies of the House rather than to the mercies of the noble Lord. I will ask hon. Members whether they think I have allowed myself to be guided by Party or personal feelings in modifying a proposal which appeared to me to be opposed to the views of a considerable body, if not to those of the majority, of the House? I have very largely diminished the demand which we made on the time of the House in carrying into effect a Rule which the noble Lord himself voted for in the Committee of last year. But these deeds of charity are immediately forgotten by those who benefit by them. I have with regard to the Supplemental and Special Estimates, always advocated that we should adopt the Rule proposed and carried by the Government of which the noble Lord was a Member, and which was in force during two or three years under an Administration of which he was so distinguished an ornament. After two evenings of debate, I have made a proposal to the House which is one that I have reason to believe is worthy of consideration, and which we are ready to consider as the best, since two proposals have been made. It has also been proposed, in a manner I think exceedingly fair, that the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) should be taken as a basis on which we might decide the question. In this case the question arises as to the use of the word "first," and it is suggested that a division be taken as to whether that word be retained. If the majority are in favour of this proposition, there would be a decision one way or the other; but the question now at issue is one that cannot be postponed with advantage, and on which arguments have been thoroughly exhausted. It appears to me that we shall not be any the wiser if we adjourn till to-morrow or Monday, while if we are to decide the point at all, now is the time to do so. Let us take some divisions on the subject—as many divisions as you please—but let us come to a decision one way or another.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he was sure that hon. Members were very anxious to appreciate in a proper way the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman had conducted his Resolutions. He was glad to learn that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not speak as a Minister, but only as Chairman of the Committee which sat last year, and which, he believed, was very much divided on the points under consideration. The right hon. Gentleman had himself told them that he had made many concessions. That was perfectly true; but with what object had they been made? As he said, in order to conciliate the opinions of a number of hon. Members who, although in a minority, were, nevertheless, an important minority. He (Mr. Chamberlain) begged to point out that however anxious he had been to conciliate that important minority, he had up to that time utterly failed to do so, and altogether misunderstood the feeling which actuated hon. Members on his side of the House. They were not acting in hostility to the Government, but simply wished to cherish the privileges of which they were possessed. In their opinion, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) made the utmost concession possible, while that proposed as a substitute by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was altogether inadequate to remove their objection to the Resolution. They knew just as well as the right hon. Gentleman what would be the result of taking divisions on the subject, as he had proposed—namely, a large majority against them; but, at the same time, that would not prevent them discussing the matter to the very utmost, and calling upon all legitimate forms of the House in order to secure that an Amendment of such importance should not be made without the fullest possible consideration. He ventured to suggest that the adjournment should be taken then, and to assure the right hon. Gentleman that there were many hon. Members perfectly willing to take up his challenge and proceed to as many divisions as he could wish.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 143: Majority 86.—(Div. List, No. 18.)

Original Question again proposed.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I shall be glad if the House will allow me to say one word. I regret that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be of opinion that he had any reason to complain of the course taken by myself in this matter. As far as I am aware, it has not been my desire to throw any obstacles in the way of the Government in the adoption of Resolutions recommended by the Committee of which I was a Member. The Chancellor of the Exchequer very truly said that I voted for the Resolution which has been proposed on the Motion for the Amendment proposed by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex. I am also quite willing to admit that it was one proposed and adopted on the recommendation of the Government of which I was a Member. I, indeed, saw some objections to that course; but it is true that in Committee I gave it my support, and if the Government think it worth while to devote time to pass this Resolution, I am still ready to do so. But it is not possible that they should pass the Resolution of 1872 without a further considerable expenditure of time, while that of 1876 might be accepted at once. It is entirely a question for the consideration of the Government whether the subject is one of sufficient importance to justify them in devoting more time to its settlement. I am ready to support the Resolution which I supported in Committee; but it would be deceiving the Government and the House if I said that I thought that Resolution could be carried to-night. As far as I am able to judge of the temper of the House, that will not be the case.

MR. RYLANDS: I have to express in the fullest manner my appreciation of the extreme courtesy and consideration which have been manifested by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am quite sure that in dealing with this question he has met those who are most strongly opposed to this Resolution in the fairest possible spirit; and I think it only right that this House should understand that the Resolutions which the right hon. Gentleman has proposed are not in any way Government Resolutions, but Resolutions adopted by a majority of a Select Committee of this House appointed to consider the subject. I wish to point out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the great object, as I have understood, of these Resolutions being proposed by Government, has been that there should be some certainty concerning the introduction of the Estimates; in other words, that when a Minister of the Crown comes down to this House, with a view of laying the annual Financial Statement of his Department before the House, he should have the opportunity of doing so, and of securing proper attention without being interrupted by the introduction of irrelevant Motions. But, Sir, I wish to point out that the Resolution of 1872 does not meet this requirement in any way whatever, because it is on the first occasion, on the

Monday that the House goes into Committee of Supply on the Estimates, that it is competent for an hon. Gentleman to give Notice of Motion relative to Army or Navy matters. Until these Notices are disposed of, the Secretary of State, or First Lord, cannot make his Statement; and inasmuch as every hon. Member who wishes to raise a question on going into Committee of Supply knows perfectly well that the only chance he has of doing so would be on the occasion when the House first went into Committee of Supply, he would take care to put his Notice on the Paper at the earliest opportunity. The result would be that when the House first went into Committee on the Army or Navy Estimates, there would be such an accumulation of Motions that a certain number of Amendments would be carried over to the next Monday, and introduced on the same Motion. That was the case last year, when the Navy Estimates were to be brought forward. The Amendments were so numerous that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty waited two nights without an opportunity being afforded him of making his Financial Statement. What happened on the third night? On an appeal from the Leader of the House, a number of hon. Gentlemen who had Notices of Amendment withdrew them, in order that the First Lord should make his Statement at an early period of the evening—hon. Gentlemen relinquished their right. What I would suggest as a fair and reasonable compromise would be this. That in return for the understanding that the First Lord of the Admiralty, or the Secretary of State for War, or a Minister in charge of Departments, should be allowed to make their Statements on the Motion that Mr. Speaker should leave the Chair, the Government might accept the Resolution of 1876. We should then have the certainty of the Ministers in charge of the Estimates bringing forward their Estimates on the first Monday; and on subsequent Mondays Amendments on going into Committee would be restricted to matter relevant to the question. I venture to make this suggestion as a means of a compromise. Before I sit down, I propose to move the adjournment of the House, but hope that we shall not be bound to go to a division. I trust that the Government will see their way to come to an arrangement such as I have ventured to suggest. I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. Rylands

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Rylands.)

MR. J. R. YORKE said, the adoption by the Government of the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex was no concession at all; but was, on the contrary, illusory in its character.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the Resolution originally proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was one that had received the support of the majority of the Committee appointed to consider the question. He trusted the House would not be guilty of such an exaggerated piece of Conservatism as to turn round suddenly and say, after their Committee had reported certain changes to be necessary—"We made a mistake in appointing the Committee," and to every change, however small, to cry non possumus.

MR. BIGGAR said, that in view of the lateness of the hour he thought it desirable that the House should adjourn, the Government not having shown any inclination to make any bond fide concession.

MR. FAWCETT said, he had listened with very great attention to the remarks which had been made by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). It appeared to him that the subject had been discussed in every possible way. If he had thought that any unfair advantage had been taken of the House he would have been the very first to protest against it, and support the Motion for the adjournment; but, on the contrary, it appeared to him that the minority had been a little too hard upon the Government. Because, what had taken place on Thursday night? The Chancellor of the Exchequer had given Notice that he should bring on these Resolutions on Monday; they were down upon the Paper on Friday, and not one single word of objection was urged against their being taken, either on Thursday or Friday; but when they came down on Monday a very considerable objection was urged against the order of proceeding. It, therefore, seemed to him that the Government had in no way attempted to deal unfairly with the House. He was also of opinion that in discussing this subject many independent Members were apt to fall into the mistake of thinking that the Government were interested in passing the Resolutions then proposed, whereas it appeared to him that those most interested were the independent Members themselves. They were sincerely anxious to proceed to the early consideration of the Estimates, because, owing to the present practice, there was really no Vote of Supply taken except towards the end of the Session, in June or July, when the House was often wearied out and exhausted. The House ought to insist upon having Supply brought on at a period when they were certain that discussion could take place. He was bound to point out that in 1872, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) was Prime Minister, he made a proposal identical with that now brought forward by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot). At that time, many independent Members below the Gangway voted in favour of that proposal. He thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), should have pointed out in what respect they considered that the Resolution had worked badly. Looking back to 1872, and comparing what took place at that time with what took place last year and the year previous, it seemed to him that the vote given by them in 1872 was justified, and that they had a much better chance of getting control over expenditure when they could come down to the House knowing distinctly that at some particular hour the Vote which they wanted to criticize would come on. But during the last two Sessions the case had been very different, for then they came down night after night, not knowing whether any particular Vote would be reached, while their patience became exhausted, and the feeling came over the House that the criticism of Parliamentary Estimates was altogether useless. It therefore appeared clear that some such proposition as that either of the hon. Member for Glasgow or of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex ought to be carried. As far as he could see, the Government appeared to have acted with perfect frankness and fairness, and he hoped, in consequence, that the House would that evening come to some decision.

DR. O'LEARY remarked that, although he was no politician, he had always considered that consistency of Party was one of the great principles of the House. Looking at the Division List which he held in his hand, he was much perplexed to find that amongst those who voted on the 26th February, 1872, in favour of Motions in almost every respect similar to those now objected to, were the names of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) and the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands). The name of the latter hon. Gentleman had been so conspicuous in the present debate, and his energies so thoroughly marked, that he was sure the House would forgive him for only citing the name of the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands).

MR. M'LAREN considered the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow as much preferable to that of the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), and he should, therefore, vote for the former. The limitation of Amendments to three days practically appeared to him a perfect mockery.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he rose to express his opinion that the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), in his anxiety for economy, had forgotten that beside the useful work of keeping down expenditure, the House had also the function to discharge, of explaining, exposing, and, as far as possible, redressing the grievances of the subject. He thought that if they were to support the refusal of the Government to allow Notices strictly relevant to be proceeded with they would be abrogating their most useful function. With regard to the facilitation of Public Business, he would express his opinion that the obstruction complained of would be in no way prevented by any such Resolution as that proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was only calculated to obstruct the ventilation of public grievances in that House. His own view on the subject of obstruction, after having studied it, was that when any obstruction arose it should be dealt with summarily. He thought that both Governments and individual Members should have the courage of their opinions, and that there was no poorer way of trying to deal with the question than by denying to the whole people the right of having their grievances ventilated. With regard to a concession on which the Government laid stress—namely, the concession of being allowed to raise a Motion on going into Committee of Ways and Means, were they to understand that to be bond fide? Was it possible that Notices on going into Committee of Ways and Means could be fully and fairly discussed if, as had been too frequently the case, the Committee of Ways and Means only made its appearance at the very end of the evening? It was only too clear that the proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be a purely illusory concession, for it was not at 12 or 1 o'clock in the morning that they could go fresh into the consideration of Motions preceding Ways and Means; therefore, if the Government would not assure them and place in the Resolution an engagement that the Committee of Ways and Means should be taken at a time which would allow a full discussion and investigation of grievances, that so-called concession was illusory to the last degree. He was very happy on that occasion not to be speaking as a Party man; but he was utterly unable to see in the arguments advanced, especially in those of hon. Members on the front Opposition Bench, any justification for the course they had pursued. Their argument was that for many years the Business of the House had been increasing, and the conclusion they drew was that instead of maintaining the liberty of the subject in proportion to the increase of Business, the facilities for control should be diminished. He thought that according as the necessity for taking up more and more subjects, and for dealing with larger and larger portions of Public Business presented itself, so the right of exposing the grievances of the subject in that increasing sphere of Parliamentary action should be carefully guarded. He thought that recourse even to those foreign methods of not permitting the interpellation of Ministers, except after due form and with the control and permission of semi-official bodies, would be less objectionable than the proposals of the Government. He felt that three months in the year would be utterly inadequate to discussing fairly and temperately the grievances that by right should be laid before Parliament. If the Government would accept the Amendment that only Motions relevant to the Estimates should be considered on Mondays, he believed that the House would be satisfied. How many objections had been taken to his (Mr. O'Donnell's) action on various points! Yet it happened that on Monday he had never taken any Motion to which objection had been raised, although that had never made the Government more resigned to his action on other days. It had been hinted that greater liberty in Committee would be the reward of surrendering the discussion of grievances previous to Supply; but if that suggestion were acted upon, he would altogether refuse to accept it as any reason for admitting the Government proposal. They should, by all means, discuss grievances at the proper time, and then deal with the Estimates from a purely business point of view. He did not know on what grounds the Liberal front Opposition Bench had acted; but if they were actuated by any kind of desire to enjoy greater freedom when they should be a Government again—greater freedom of neglecting the liberty of the subject—by backing up another Cabinet, he would only remind them that in their hurry to throw overboard the proper consideration of the rights of independent Members, they might jeopardise their chances of ever seeing themselves a Government again.

MR. CALLAN pointed out that amongst the opponents to the Rule of 1872, the Division List contained the names of Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Secretary to the Treasury; George Cavenish Bentinck; the Secretary of State for the Colonies; the right hon. the Home Secretary, Sir William Hart Dyke, Rowland Winn, Lord George Hamilton, James Lowther, and W. H. Smith. He asked that the proposition of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) should be accepted by the Government, and he urged this particularly on the ground that they would only be endorsing their own action in 1872.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that as far as consistency was concerned, they had voted on the occasion referred to upon the ground that the question had not up to that time been sufficiently considered, and that a further Committee should be appointed. Their object, however, had been attained by the appointment of last year's Committee, and their position was therefore not quite that represented by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan).

Mr. O'Donnell

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he had no doubt that the hon. Baronet himself had distinctly stated his reasons for the vote; but he would remember that he walked out of the House when the second Division occurred.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there was a far more important question than that of consistency to be considered—namely, the question between the Rules of 1872 and 1876. The former had been adopted, rightly or wrongly, in the last Parliament, and Her Majesty's Government, having had experience of that Rule, deliberately came to the conclusion that it was not necessary or proper for the conduct of Public Business. The former Leader of the House (the Earl of Beaconsfield) had come to the conclusion that the more this question was left alone the better. In 1876 a different policy was adopted. What was the Rule introduced by Her Majesty's Government? Was it the Rule of 1872? No. Acting upon their experience, they deliberately rejected that, and adopted the Rule of 1876, which they now asked the House to reject in favour of the one they themselves rejected. Of all the plans which had been proposed, that of 1872 was the worst. The House required that when Supply came on the Minister should make his Statement; but the Rule of 1872 made that impossible, inasmuch as the preliminary Motions could not, and would not, give way; for if they did, they would never get another opportunity. On many occasions these Motions had been waived out of courtesy; but the proposal of the Government made it absolutely certain that these Motions would not be withdrawn, while it did not secure to independent Members of the House those opportunities for discussion which they desired, and which he thought they had a right to have. It seemed to him a most futile and most extraordinary result to a discussion of two nights that they should not take the recommendations of the Committee and of Her Majesty's Government in 1876, but an old Rule which had been tried and abandoned. If they were to do anything, they should do something efficient. He believed that the recommendation of his noble Friend, made on the first night of discussion, was a substantial reform in the proceedings of the House, while he was quite sure that the Rule of 1872 was no practical reform at all. It had been condemned by Her Majesty's Government during the whole of the present Parliament, and rather than adopt such an ineffectual plan as that, he (Sir William Harcourt) thought it better to leave the matter alone.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not want to go on with this controversy, but would suggest to hon. Members the desirability of coming to some decision upon the question before them with as little delay as possible, instead of repeating the same arguments over and over again. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down now says that the Rule of 1872 will be of no use at all. I admit that it leaves us still open to the difficulty with reference to the Army, Navy, and Civil Service Estimates; but we gain the grand point at which we aim.

MAJOR NOLAN thought that the most sensible thing would be the adjournment of the House.

MR. STACPOOLE considered that in the event of an adjournment some day ought to be fixed for the settlement of the question.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 121: Majority 78.—(Div. List, No. 19.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. DILLWYN moved that the debate be adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I shall, of course, not resist the Motion at this late hour—1.50. With reference to the continuance of the debate, we shall propose to take it as the first Order on Monday next before the Army Estimates.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

EAST INDIA (PUBLIC WORKS).

Ordered, That the Minutes of the Evidence taken before the Select Committee on East India (Public Works), in the last Session of Parliament, be referred to the Select Committee on East India (Public Works).—(Mr. Edward Stanhope.)

M O T I O N.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS.

INSTRUCTION TO THE COMMITTEE.

MR. MONK, in rising to move—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee of Public Accounts, That they have power to consider whether any alteration in the Law is desirable, providing that a statement in each case in which the Naval and Military Departments have obtained the sanction of the Commissioners of Her Majesty’s Treasury to any expenditure not provided for in the sums appropriated to such services in the Votes contained in the Appropriation Act, setting forth the representation made to them by the respective Department, shall be laid upon the Table of the House within a limited period after such sanction shall have been given,” merely wished to remark that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated, when he (Mr. Monk) brought forward the matter at the end of last Session, his intention that the subject should be taken up by the Committee of Public Accounts, and only urged in excuse of the oversight which had occurred that by some accident it had not been brought before that Committee. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury had also said he would take care that it should be in future referred to the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee of Public Accounts, That they have power to consider whether any alteration in the Law is desirable, providing that a statement in each case in which the Naval and Military Departments have obtained the sanction of the Commissioners of Her Majesty’s Treasury to any expenditure not provided for in the sums appropriated to such services in the Votes contained in the Appropriation Act, setting forth the representation made to them by the respective Department, shall be laid upon the Table of the House within a limited period after such sanction shall have been given.”—(Mr Monk.)

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH replied, that it was the duty of the Committee of Public Accounts to examine the Appropriation Accounts, and to report to the House on all points which arose in connection with them. Those were important duties, and the Committee, which had now sat during many years, had pointed out evils, from time to time, whenever they were shown by the Accounts before them to have occurred; but it had not stated the manner in which those evils were to be prevented. The responsibility of supplying the remedy should rest upon the Executive. The Committee had not the practical knowledge to enable it to make important recommendations with respect to the mode in which the Estimates were to be framed. Suppose that the Committee, acting on their instructions, recommended a change of importance to be made in the Navy and Army Estimates. In the course of a year or two it might be found that this recommendation would have to be given up. Would not the authority of the Committee be much diminished by having made a recommendation afterwards found to be impracticable?

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at Two o’clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 21st February, 1879.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Ordered, That this House will not receive any petition for a Private Bill after Friday the 14th day of March next, unless such Private Bill shall have been approved by the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice; nor any petition for a Private Bill approved by the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice after Friday the 2nd day of May next:

That this House will not receive any report from the Judges upon petitions presented to this House for Private Bills after Friday the 2nd day of May next.

CRIMINAL LAW—BAIL IN CHARGES OF FRAUD.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE asked, Whether Her Majesty’s Government intend to propose any measure for the amendment of the law in respect of the admission to bail of persons who may be committed for trial on charges of fraud? He thought there was some occasion to consider this subject, as within the last few years frauds on a great scale had been brought under the notice of a Committee of the other House of Parliament, which was appointed to inquire into the subject of foreign loans. The Question which stood in his name did not refer to steps that should be taken to prevent frauds, but only to the mode of dealing with persons accused of fraudulent practices. In the great majority of cases the law with regard to bail worked satisfactorily; but in cases of persons charged with great commercial frauds there was this anomaly—that if the person who was charged with the offence was really guilty, the greater the scale on which operations were conducted, the easier it was for him to escape trial. If a person had succeeded in fraudulently transferring hundreds of thousands of pounds from other people's pockets into his own, it was a matter of very little moment to him that he should forfeit a few thousands by way of bail. A case occurred some two years since which excited a great deal of attention—that of Alexander Collie, who failed for some millions of money. He was arrested on a charge of fraud, and was admitted to bail. He, however, disappeared, and has never been heard of since. It would not be right to say that Alexander Collie was a fraudulent bankrupt, for, as he was never tried, he was never convicted; but his escape from trial involved a very serious miscarriage of justice. But if the law in England was unsatisfactory, in Scotland it was a great deal worse. There, everyone who was committed for trial, except for a capital offence, might demand to be admitted to bail on giving security to the amount of £300. As an illustration, he would allude to the trial of the City of Glasgow Bank directors. The bank failed about the beginning of October. The Crown acted with great promptitude. The directors were arrested immediately, and they were tried and convicted during the last month. He desired to guard himself against being supposed to criticize the conduct of anyone engaged in conducting that trial. He wished only to point out what appeared to him to be an unsatisfactory state of the law. The indictment against the directors was a very long one; but the only charge which made it possible to refuse bail to the directors was the charge of theft. They claimed, except Mr. Inglis, to be liberated on bail; but the Crown refused. The case was brought before the Court of Session, which held that the offence with which the directors were charged was an offence within the meaning of the statute for which bail might be refused. The Court was not unanimous. Lord Young, a very eminent authority, dissented on the ground that the offence with which the directors were charged could not be looked upon as theft, the offence charged being that bills intrusted to them for collection were discounted by them before they arrived at maturity. The directors were kept in prison for about three months till the trial came on. The Lord Advocate opened the case; witnesses were examined for the prosecution, and, on the second or third day, no witness having been called to speak to the charge of theft, the Lord Advocate said he withdrew the charge, as it was one he should have great difficulty in establishing. Great use—and he thought very legitimately—was made of that by the counsel for the defence. Suppose the directors had been innocent, and had been acquitted of the other charges, they would have had great reason to complain that they had been imprisoned on a charge of which they were not only innocent, but which had never been pressed against them. Although they were convicted of a most grave offence, still it was not a satisfactory state of things that in order to make sure of having men put on trial for a crime, however serious it might be, it should be necessary to commit them on a charge which no attempt was made to sustain. On the other hand, it could not be right that men charged with such frauds as those of which the Glasgow Bank directors had been convicted should be entitled to bail in finding security for the extremely small sum of £300 each.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Question of the noble Earl as it now appeared upon the Paper had assumed a different shape to that which it presented when he gave Notice of it. The Question brought to his notice a few days ago was, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to propose any measure for the amendment of the Criminal Law in respect of persons who may be charged with or convicted of fraudulent offences?—and in answer to that Question he was prepared to say that a general measure had been introduced proposing the codification of the Criminal Law, making considerable changes in the distinctions which had hitherto prevailed between felonies and misdemeanours. That measure would, he hoped, in process of time, come before their Lordships, and any question which the noble Earl might wish to raise on it could be raised then. But since he came into the House, he found that the Question had been changed. The noble Earl called attention to the subject of the recent criminal trials in the Courts of Scotland, and now asked the Question in its present form. It would appear from the noble Earl's speech that his Question had reference to that recent criminal trial in the Courts of Scotland, and he (the Lord Chancellor) was not prepared to answer that Question as it was then put. He was not acquainted with the particulars of the case to which the noble Earl referred, except from general information; but he would make inquiry as to whether the law of Scotland with regard to bail was unsatisfactory in its working. He must, however, take leave to say one thing. He could not admit the suggestion of the noble Earl that the Lord Advocate of Scotland introduced into the indictment a charge of theft against the persons arrested, in order that they might be unable to obtain bail. He felt perfectly convinced that when that charge was introduced the Law Officers considered that they had evidence, or would have evidence, to substantiate that charge. It was introduced for that purpose, and in no wise with the view of debarring from the right of having bail. He did not know whether the noble Earl considered that any undue measure of justice had been meted out to them—he could only say that the general impression seemed to be that it was not so.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, the noble and learned Earl had misunderstood what he said. He said that he did not wish to criticize the conduct of anyone who was engaged in the conduct of that trial, and that, no doubt, when the Lord Advocate put that charge in the indictment, he believed that there was a reasonable probability of his being able to prove it; but he said, notwithstanding that, but for the circumstance of the inclusion of the charge of theft in the indictment, the accused men would not have been committed to prison.

The Lord Chancellor

ARMY—VOLUNTEER FORCE—COURTS OF INQUIRY.

ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

LORD TRURO, in moving for a Return showing the number of courts of inquiry held in each year in the Volunteer Force since its establishment, said, he moved for this information, because he thought it would be interesting to the public, to the Volunteers themselves, and to the authorities, to know the nature of the offences charged against Volunteers, and what had been the conduct of those who had been employed as instructors of the Force. He believed such a Return would be highly creditable to the character of the Force since its commencement.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Return showing the number of courts of inquiry held in each year in the volunteer force since its establishment: the number of volunteers of all ranks, the number of adjutants, and the number of instructors in each year on which such were held, and the several offences charged.—(The Lord Truro.)

VISCOUNT BURY said, that if the noble Lord wished for information on any specific point, he would be glad to give it to him if it was within the reach of the War Office; but these courts of inquiry were held on the authority of the officers commanding Volunteer corps—there were no records of them at the War Office. The Force had now been in existence 20 years, and to procure the information asked them the Department would have to apply to some 293 different corps, and ask them to go back on their records for that period. The Returns asked for would be inconvenient and expensive, if not impossible, and he hoped the House would not grant them.

LORD TRURO said, he only wanted the Returns of courts of inquiry ordered by the War Office.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE ZULU WAR—THE REINFORCEMENTS—THE CAVALRY EQUIPMENTS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH asked the Under Secretary of State for War,

What alteration of equipment, if any, is contemplated in the appointments or uniform of the heavy dragoon regiment known as the King's Dragoon Guards, about to proceed on active service at the Cape of Good Hope, or those of the 17th Lancers, under orders for the same station? He thought it a very unwise step to send out the horses of the cavalry regiments from this country. Horses that had not been acclimatised in South Africa would be useless. He regretted that that most excellent force, the Cape Mounted Rifles, had not been maintained. The men were well drilled and accustomed to the country, and their native horses were thoroughly acclimatised—and altogether they were a most useful body of men.

VISCOUNT BURY, in reply, said, there had been some minor alterations in the equipment of the two regiments which the noble Lord had named. Cork helmets had been substituted for brass helmets; a second ammunition pouch, making a total of 40 rounds for each man, had been supplied; some extra leather had been put on their overalls; a clasp knife had been given to each man; also, waterproof saddle covers, waterproof sheets, and a certain number of sets of harness for lasso purposes. The changes of equipment had been of a very minor character.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE wished to add that the two regiments in question would remain exactly as they were before, and although they had been sent out with these additional equipments there was the fullest permission to the commanding officers to put into store anything that was not required. Probably lances might not be found useful for service in the bush; but all lancers now carried the carbine as well as the lance. The noble Lord was in error when he described the King's Dragoon Guards as a heavy dragoon regiment. It was a medium regiment; and the men of both regiments were active, efficient, and not over heavy for their horses. With regard to equipments, the fullest permission was given to the commanding officers to make necessary alterations. For instance, the Lancers were furnished with a carbine, as well as a lance; and if the latter were found unserviceable or not fitted for the bush, the commanding officer could have it placed in store. As regarded the horses, the question was settled by the requisition from the Cape. It had been asked that the men should bring their horses with them. Even if the horses died, it would be undesirable that the authorities at home should refuse to send them when asked for in that way by those who must have the best knowledge on the subject. The reason was obvious. To collect a large number of horses on the spot would take time, and it was necessary that the men should go ready to proceed to the field at once on landing. Accordingly horses had been sent out with the cavalry, and also with the artillery. Everything had been done to assist the authorities on the spot, and he hoped and believed that the arrangements made here would give them entire satisfaction.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Six o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 21st February, 1879.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBERS SWORN—Earl of Yarmouth, for Warwick County (Southern Division); Colonel Daniel La Zouche Colthurst, for Cork County.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—District Auditors * [79].

Committee—Ancient Monuments [52], [House counted out].

QUESTIONS.

RAILWAYS—CONTINUOUS FOOT- BOARDS.—QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has received any further communications from the South Western Railway Company, since the end of last Session, respecting the wish generally expressed by the public in favour of continuous footboards to all the carriages, and likewise as to the adaptation of the height of the platforms at all stations, so as to prevent the risk of accidents to passengers alighting from carriages without the power of placing their feet directly on the station platform?

VISCOUNT SANDON: We issued a Circular to all the Railway Companies at the end of last Session, requesting them to give us the fullest information as to their views and intentions respecting continuous footboards, and the height of their platforms, which is, of course, a part of the same subject. We have now printed and laid upon the Table all the replies which we have received, together with the Circular itself, and they will be in the hands of Members very shortly. Replies will be found from most of the leading Companies; but I regret to say that the South Western Railway Company has sent no answer whatever to our Circular.

TREATY OF BERLIN -THE GREEK FRONTIER.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received information to the effect that the Turkish Government have declined to accept the frontier proposed for Greece by the 13th protocol of the Congress of Berlin even as a basis for negotiation, and have refused to surrender any territory in Epirus?

MR. BOURKE: The House will recollect that a day or two ago I stated that negotiations upon this subject were still going on. I am sure, therefore, that the hon. Baronet will see that it is impossible for me to state at present the details of those negotiations. I may also remind the hon. Baronet that Her Majesty's Government must necessarily be imperfectly acquainted at the present moment with the details of the negotiations.

ARMY—THE ZULU WAR—THE ARMY RESERVE.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the case that many men of the Army Reserve, trained soldiers, were willing to have volunteered to serve at the Cape, to fill up the regiments now embarking for foreign service, if permitted to do so; and, what objection there is to men of that reserve being allowed so to serve if willing to do so?

COLONEL STANLEY: Sir, as a matter of fact, I am not aware that any men of the Army Reserve have volunteered for service at the Cape, although I have no doubt, from all that I have heard, they would be very ready to do so if an opportunity were given. With regard to the second Question, I must speak with some reservation; but, as I am advised at present, the men who have joined the Army Reserve are covered by the Statute Law of 1867, under which they are allowed to serve upon two conditions—first, a Proclamation under section 10 in case of a national emergency; and, secondly, by volunteering for duty. Under the first condition they can serve for six months after the emergency is over; but under the second—which would be the one applicable to the Question of my hon. and gallant Friend—they can only serve for six months from the date of volunteering for service; and I do not think, under the circumstances, that it would be worth while to accept them for short a time.

INDIA (FINANCE)—INDIAN TAXATION.—QUESTION.

MR. GRANT asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether Her Majesty's Government have taken, or intend to take, any steps towards providing that the official and professional classes in India shall contribute their share of the taxation imposed upon the people as a security against future famines in that country?

MR. E. STANHOPE: This matter has been for some time engaging the serious consideration of the Indian Government; but I must ask the hon. Member to be good enough to wait for further information as to their decision until the Budget is published at the end of the present month.

INDIA—EAST INDIAN RAILWAY. QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If, before the East Indian Railway Bill for the purchase of the Railway is brought on, he will supply the House with a tabulated statement which will give the House information about the entire working of this Railway, so as to exhibit the annual gross traffic receipts and gross working expenses, net receipts, the capital created, guaranteed interest thereon, excess of that interest over net receipts and debt created, or excess of receipts over the guaranteed interest, portion of that excess paid to the Railway Company, portion appropriated to pay off debt, and the diminished interest debt, with a total of capital and debt on which the purchase-money is based?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid that to give the Returns in the form asked for by the hon. and gallant Member would be very troublesome and would cause some delay; but I will endeavour to have a summary prepared which will give, in a short and convenient form, the information which the hon. and gallant Member desires upon the subject. Further details will be found in the annual Reports of Mr. Danvers.

SOUTH AFRICA -- TRANSMISSION OF INTELLIGENCE.—QUESTIONS.

MR. OTWAY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, having regard to the interest and importance of early and reliable intelligence from South Africa, Her Majesty's Government see any objection to following the course by which a portion of the Press obtain priority of intelligence; and, whether they will instruct Consular Officers or detach gentlemen from the Colonial Office to St. Vincent and Madeira, for the transmission of telegraphic information from South Africa?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The Government have already priority for official despatches, and they have no reason to complain of any undue delay in their transmission. I do not think it advisable to instruct Consular officers or to detach gentlemen from the Colonial Office to St. Vincent and Madeira, for the transmission of telegraphic information from South Africa of an unofficial nature which might possibly not be accurate.

MR. OTWAY: Have the Consular Agents at St. Vincent and Maderia any cypher by which they can insure secrecy of their messages?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I do not know. It is not in my Department.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE DEFINITIVE TREATY.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. BOURKE: I wish, Sir, with the permission of the House, to give a short explanation of the answer I gave three days ago to my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway). My hon. Friend asked me—

“Whether Her Majesty's Government adhere to the statements of Lord Salisbury in his despatch enclosing copy of the Treaty of Berlin—viz., ‘That it results from these declarations, that Turkey is not internationally bound, and cannot be compelled to pay any portion of the indemnity until the claims of all the creditors of loans anterior to the war have been paid in full.’”

I thought the most satisfactory answer I could give my hon. Friend was to refer him to the 11th Protocol of the Congress of Berlin, which contained a declaration of Prince Gortchakoff, which was one of those upon which Lord Salisbury's statement was founded. My hon. Friend has, however, communicated with me privately on the subject, and he thinks it would be more satisfactory if I gave a definite answer to the exact words of his Question; therefore, I have no difficulty whatever in stating that Her Majesty's Government adhere to the statements of Lord Salisbury in his despatch inclosing a copy of the Treaty of Berlin, and then follows the copy of the quotation, referred to by my hon. Friend.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question of which he had given him private Notice, with reference to the Business of the House on Monday. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to ask the House to proceed to the consideration of all the Resolutions on that day, or only of the first Resolution? If he only intended to proceed with the first, what Business did the Chancellor of the Exchequer propose to go on with afterwards? He asked this Question, because if it was intended to proceed with all the Resolutions it would be likely to occupy the whole or a considerable part of the Sitting; but if only the first Resolution were to be taken up he hoped that, after the very prolonged discussion they had last night, the House might possibly come to a decision upon it in time to enable them to proceed with other Business.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had great difficulty in forecasting what the wishes of the House might be with regard to the Business on Monday. Undoubtedly the Government wished to proceed as early as possible with the Army Estimates; and if it should be the pleasure of the House to come to a speedy conclusion with regard to the first Resolution, so as to enable them to take up the Army Estimates afterwards, he should not ask them to proceed with the other Resolutions, but to let them stand over. He should move to amend the Resolution in accordance with the compromise he had offered last night; and if any agreement was come to within a short time after the meeting of the House he should propose the Army Estimates be proceeded with.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — SCHOOL INSPECTORS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. RATHBONE, in rising to call attention to the appointment of School Inspectors without sufficient preliminary special training for the work they have to perform; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, arrangements ought to be at once made to provide that in future, before being appointed to an independent post, newly appointed Inspectors should have one year's training under an experienced Inspector, unless they have been previously engaged in the education of children for a sufficient time to make this unnecessary."

said: I trust I need only detain the House a very short time, for I have really never met anyone who would deny the importance of the change which I propose, or who would dispute the grounds on which I advocate it; and yet the change is not made. I believe it has been delayed solely on grounds of expense. I hope, therefore, before sitting down, to show how very small an expenditure would be necessary for the purpose, and that this small expenditure would be a real economy, as it would make the very large expenditure now going on in our elementary schools much more efficient than it is. I am sure it will be admitted by all who have given even the most superficial attention to the subject that inspecting a school is a skilled, and highly technical, and complicated process, which it cannot be expected a man would be able to perform properly, except after some training and practice in the work; nor will it be denied by anyone that this work is as important as it is difficult. Upon the Inspector's Report depends the amount of grant to be received by an elementary school; while it is to the Inspectors that we must mainly look to raise steadily the character of our elementary education, by pointing out to managers of schools and schoolmasters in what respect they are inferior to other schools, and how, as shown by the experience of those other schools, these defects can be best remedied. If anyone doubts the amount of skill required to conduct efficiently, and yet fairly, that process of inspection and examination, and to draw up the resulting Report upon which the grant to an elementary school depends, or so to distribute encouragement and blame as to improve the education given in our elementary schools, I would refer him to a small book on School Inspection, written by Mr. Fearon, and published by Macmillan. Mr. Fearon, now in the Charity Commission, was selected by the Education Department as one of the ablest and most experienced Inspectors to make these inquiries, upon the results of which the Elementary Education Acts of 1870 and 1876 were, to a great extent, founded. Anyone reading that book will at once see how wise are the suggestions which Mr. Fearon's experience enables him to make. He will see, also, how technical many of the most important of them are, and that it would take a young Inspector fresh from College some years to find out for himself, at the expense of the corpus vile of our elementary schools, what a little preliminary training would show him in a year. But mere written instructions of that sort will not give the training which a young man would very rapidly derive from seeing in practice the work of an experienced Inspector, and from inspecting a school under his eye for a certain period. The House is not fond of extracts, and therefore I will only read one—and that a very short one—from Mr Fearon's book, to show what an experienced Inspector says "inspection" and "examination" mean.

The Marquess of Hartington

"By 'inspection' is meant the process of seeing a school at work in the course of its ordinary routine; noting how it is constructed, warmed, drained, ventilated, furnished, and supplied with apparatus and other materials; how its journals, registers, and other records are kept; what is the course of education, physical and intellectual, which it supplies to its scholars; whether it is conducted on the most approved methods for economising time and labour; what is the order and discipline; what the relations of the scholars to their teachers, and to one another; how the teachers give their lessons; and how in other respects they are qualified to perform their duties. By 'examination' is meant the process of testing, by written and oral questioning of the scholars, whether the results of the instruction given in the school are satisfactory."

It must be evident to the House how much skill is necessary to do such work as this, and how valuable—nay, how necessary—a certain amount of training and technical knowledge is to enable a man to do it; and the question I ask the House to consider is whether that training and that technical knowledge are to be gained at the cost of efficiency in our system of elementary education? It is evident that a young man, however able, fresh from College, who may, perhaps, have had very little to do with children, and nothing to do with elementary education since he was himself a child, will, if he comes to the work of inspection without sufficient previous training, be almost sure to fail in justly dealing with the masters of elementary schools. If he comes to his work with a very high standard, and is very conscientious, he may exact more than is possible; or, in his anxiety not to be unjust, he may be too lax. In either case he will injure the schools under his charge by creating a sense of injustice or a disposition to carelessness. This is no theoretical danger. Elementary schoolmasters do feel that they are subject to great injustice by their labour being judged of by those who have had no sufficient training or experience to enable them to judge justly; and the irritation and discouragement produced by this feeling have a most serious effect upon education. The want of such training has a further bad effect on the system in the great want of uniformity in the decisions of different Inspectors. A just and strict Inspector is exposed to much abuse and difficulty in his work from his decisions being compared with the laxity of neighbouring Inspectors; whereas, if young Inspectors were trained by eight or ten of the best Inspectors in the most important districts of the country, and these Inspectors were to meet periodically and compare notes, there would be a much more even standard of inspection than now exists, and much less discontent. But the work of an Inspector is not merely to ascertain whether those conditions have been fulfilled which are required by the Department for the payment of grants. Our main hope of a steady improvement in our system of elementary education is through the Inspectors. They can compare the teaching and system of one school with that of another, and, by a judicious apportionment of blame and encouragement, can gradually raise the general standard of education to the level of the better schools. They can show the schoolmasters where their teaching is defective; they can convince them by what has been done elsewhere that the defects can be removed, and they can point out how to remove them. This Department of their work is not only very important, but requires highly-skilled and technical knowledge, and training can alone enable them to do it really well. I have said in the Resolution that this training is necessary, unless the new Inspectors have been previously engaged in the education of children for a sufficient time to make it unnecessary, because it seems to me that the Department may find it wise to apportion a certain number of these higher appointments to elementary schoolmasters who have distinguished themselves by their success in improving the system of elementary education. The number of such appointments might be limited, so as still to secure for this work the best materials which our Universities offer. But a certain number of such appointments, if given to first-class schoolmasters, would give great encouragement, and the country would get some very good Inspectors. Even for these men some special training would be very desirable, but less necessary than it would be for a young man fresh from College, with no experience in the art of elementary education. My practical proposal, then, is simply this:—The number of Inspectors appointed annually is, I learn from the Department, about eight. I propose that the Lord President of the Council should select from the numerous candidates on his list for this work eight of those whom he thinks most suitable, and that, without waiting for vacancies to arise, he should place them under eight of the most experienced and able Inspectors in the service of the Department. For one year such commencing Inspectors—if I may so call them—should work with the experienced Inspectors, see how they inspect schools, and inspect them under the experienced Inspectors' eyes. While thus waiting to be appointed to an independent sphere of action, they should receive a salary of say, £250 a-year. A staff of such commencing Inspectors, constantly kept up, would only cost £2,000 a-year additional, and this would give increased efficiency to an expenditure on the part of the Central Government alone of the sum of £114,000 for inspection, and £2,100,000 for the total expenditure chargeable upon the Treasury for elementary education, besides the still further large expenditure derived from voluntary sources. I would ask the House and the Government, is it not a monstrous absurdity that, whereas in England we consider a much longer apprenticeship than the term I have named necessary to make a man a good cobbler, a good joiner, a good merchant, or lawyer, we should expect men to do satisfactorily, without any previous technical training, such highly-skilled and technical work as the inspection of our elementary schools? I, therefore, do urge upon the House to accept the Motion that I have now made, and thus strengthen the hands of the Government to do what I cannot doubt for a moment they are anxious to do.

MR. BRISTOWE, in seconding the Motion, said, he thought the House was indebted to his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool for bringing forward that question, which was one of considerable importance to the country at large.

Mr. Rathbone

Masters and mistresses and managers of schools looked anxiously to the visits of the Inspectors, for upon their report it depended whether the grant would be earned by the school; and, moreover, they naturally looked to the Inspectors for guidance and suggestions in order to make their schools more efficient. Those advantages could only be gained through having Inspectors who had experience in tuition or in examination. If they wished to make their schools efficient, the Education Department must take care that their Inspectors were thoroughly up to their work. It did not at all follow that because an Examiner was well-informed and highly-cultivated himself that he should have the power of testing others in subjects with which he himself was familiar; that was generally to be learnt by experience. By placing young Inspectors for a year under training in the way recommended by his hon. Friend (Mr. Rathbone), they would be better prepared to enter upon their duties. The propositions of his hon. Friend would tend to produce uniformity of examination, which was a matter of great importance, and he believed that it would meet with the approval of the Inspectors themselves.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, arrangements ought to be at once made to provide that in future, before being appointed to an independent post, newly appointed School Inspectors should have one year's training under an experienced Inspector, unless they have been previously engaged in the education of children for a sufficient time to make this unnecessary,"—(Mr. Rathbone.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. MAC IVER agreed in spirit, at all events, with the hon. Member for Liverpool, but thought that the particular scheme proposed involved needless expenditure. He felt compelled to rise on the present occasion on account of having received a communication bearing on the question from a source entirely independent of his hon. Friend—a communication which pointed out the evils which his hon.

Friend wished to remedy. The letter showed that however good an Inspector might be as an examiner, and however fit for the post he might be in other respects, he might be deficient in the common sense which could only be learned by experience—such experience as the hon. Member for Liverpool suggested. His informant, Colonel King, writing about the Oxton Schools, said—

“The manner of the Inspector was such as to frighten the children, and not give them a fair chance.”

Then Colonel King went on to say—

“I do not wish to injure the Inspector; but I think it would be well if he understood that when examining a school he has something else to do than cut down the grant.”

He (Mr. Mac Iver) had no desire to trespass longer on the attention of the House; but he could not conclude without saying that it seemed to him that the proposition of the hon. Member was well worthy of the consideration of the House and the Government.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool had made out a strong case. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) hoped the Education Department had become convinced that the time had arrived when they should make use of the older Inspectors in giving some training to those who were about to be appointed in future. Many of the old Inspectors had professional and special training for the work which it was impossible to expect in the eight gentlemen it was proposed annually to appoint. Inspection was no easy matter. It could not be learnt at College, because it required some kind of experimental teaching, as well as storing the brain with the subjects taught in the schools. This apprenticeship, if he might so term it, was required for several reasons. First, the art of inspecting ought to be taught by those who had themselves practised it. It would be a great advantage if a newly-appointed Inspector could work for a few months with a man who had been accustomed to inspect, and have the opportunity of learning the art of inspection without frightening the children; and practise, at the same time, perfect justice and fairness to the masters and the mistresses. Again, teaching, as well as inspecting, was becoming of Government importance. There was now an army of teachers all over the country who exercised good influence in their respective localities. The country expected a great deal from them, and Parliament must not ignore their feelings, or expect that they had none in the matter. All must, he thought, sympathize to some extent with a schoolmaster or schoolmistress who for many years had taught children with great success, and who found them inspected by a young man just from College. He did not think an Inspector ought to be thus brought into contact with experienced masters and mistresses without some previous training in inspection. In too many instances hard-working and struggling masters and mistresses looked forward with alarm and anxiety to the visit of the Inspector. These people felt deeply any kind of injustice from young Inspectors, though the latter might not mean to do any. The manner of inspecting required to be taught as well as the art of teaching. The necessity of a uniform system of inspection was universally recognized. At present money was given for results. Those results depended on examination. One Inspector might make the examination very different from what it would be under another, and thus a different standard for payment by results would be established in different schools. That would be no economy; but might lead to an enormous waste of money. It was, therefore, most desirable that there should be uniformity in their system of inspection. The plan put forward by the hon. Gentleman appeared to be very simple, and had a great deal to recommend it. If eight Inspectors were appointed every year, he saw no reason why they should not submit to a year's training, with small remuneration.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, there could not be two opinions on the necessity of improving their mode of inspection, which he would endorse by an incident which had come under his knowledge in a district in Yorkshire with which he was acquainted. A newly-appointed Inspector went to the school, and all who were interested in the school went to see him conduct the examination. Taking up a little child about six years old, he said—“Well, my little woman, what do you call a baby cow?” The child innocently answered—“A mutty calf, sir.” The Inspector said—ever, afraid that he could not assent to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, because its adoption would have the effect of adding to Estimates which were already excessively high, without any absolute necessity for the increased expenditure. He might also remark that there were a certain number of Inspectors who had been teachers. It should not, however, be forgotten that Inspectors were sometimes called upon to investigate very difficult and delicate matters, and it was essential that they should be able to meet on equal terms with managers of schools. They also required tact, self-possession, and patience to enable them to discharge their duties satisfactorily, but he did not think the Lord President would be indisposed to appoint teachers of whose qualifications he was satisfied; but it ought not to be established as a rule that teachers should have a priority of claim. He might, in conclusion, observe that to have a teaching and inspecting department composed of the same individuals would be to form a close corporation which might hereafter be found to work by no means satisfactorily.

MR. RATHBONE said, that after the explanation of the noble Lord he would not put the House to the trouble of dividing.

Question put, and agreed to.

EGYPT—FINANCE.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. H. SAMUELSON, in rising to call attention to the paragraphs in the Letter of the Marquess of Salisbury to Lord Lyons of August 7th, 1878 (Turkish Papers, No. 48), stating that Her Majesty's Government required the Government of Egypt to pay in full the May Coupon of the Unified Debt; and also to the conditions under which the Egyptian State Domain Loan of November, 1878, was contracted; and to move—

“That no sufficient justification has been shown for the enforcement by Her Majesty's Government of the payment of the May Coupon of 1878 of the Unified Debt of Egypt, nor for their interference in regard to the State Domain Loan of 1878;”

said, his object in calling attention to these two questions was to learn what was the justification of the Government for interfering with the financial concerns of Egypt. In reference to the

May Coupon of 1878, the Government had, in conjunction with the French Government, brought strong pressure to bear on the Egyptian Government to secure the payment of that Coupon in full. In doing so they were running a considerable risk, and the lamentable event which had recently occurred might be to some extent traced to the interference of Her Majesty's Government. The next transaction to which he referred was revealed by the publication of the prospectus of the loan issued by the Messrs. Rothschild in October last. The security for this loan was the transfer of certain lands from the family of the Khedive to the State, and the hypothecation of these lands for the interest of the bonds; and Her Majesty's Government had undertaken to nominate a manager of those lands, who should not be divested of his functions without their previous consent. The object of this was, no doubt, to give a certain security to the subscribers to the loan; but up to the present moment they did not know what was the nature of the agreement between this country and Egypt. In pressing for the payment of the May Coupon, the Government were guilty of great injustice at once to the people and to the creditors of Egypt. Moreover, Her Majesty's Government either were aware, or ought to have been aware, that at the time they insisted on the payment of this interest, the Revenues of Egypt were insufficient to meet the public charges. As early as the end of March last year, there were in the possession of Her Majesty's Government Estimates of the Revenues of Egypt, and, of course, also Estimates of the Expenditure; and at the time they required the payment of this Coupon, they had no reason to believe that the income for 1878 would be larger than the income for 1877 had proved to be. In point of fact, it now turned out that the Revenue for 1878 was only £8,372,000 in the gross, out of which the Government of Egypt had to pay items of interest, including £4,028,000, interest on the sinking fund of the Unified Debt, and making, in the whole, no less than £6,886,000. Deducting this from the year's income—and next year's income would probably fall below that of 1878—there remained a balance of £1,536,000, and that was all there was to pay the interest on an unknown floating

Lord George Hamilton

Debt, provide all the expenses of the administration of Egypt, provide for the Army and the Navy, the public works—excepting railways—education, the Civil List, and every other charge incidental to the government of the country. Now, the sum which was necessary to provide for the expenses of the administration of Egypt was estimated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Shoreham (Mr. S. Cave) at £3,000,000, and by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) at £3,500,000. Taking it at the lower sum, it would be seen that, if the full interest was to be paid on the Egyptian Debt, the other Services, including the Army and Navy, must suffer to the extent of 50 per cent. Though it was true that Her Majesty's Government, in the letter to Messrs. Rothschild, guarded themselves against any liability to pay interest on the new loan, yet by the course they had adopted, they took upon themselves, to a certain extent, the custody of the property which had been pledged for its security. Scarcely had they heard of this property being pledged for the payment of this particular loan, than news came that certain creditors had got a Decree from the International Court which enabled them to put an execution on this property. But suppose the Khedive or the Government of Egypt should fail to perform the convention into which they had entered as regarded the custody of these lands, or suppose the whole thing came to a deadlock through a disagreement between the three gentlemen who represented the various interests, were they to go to war on behalf of the private creditors of the Khedive? They had given a quasi-security to the creditors, which they might be called upon in a very inconvenient manner to fulfil. The question was, whether both of these transactions were not contrary to the precedent which they had hitherto followed? He did not speak of loans which had been guaranteed in cases of emergency, but the undertaking of a liability, however slight, in regard to loans by private parties with a foreign Government. It was not to the interest of the English people—clergymen, widows, and others—to enter into these foreign loans, and he contended the promoters of the loans should receive no encouragement. It would be much better to invest the money in Three per Cents or good railway debentures. He supposed he should be told that it was desirable England should co-operate with the Government of France. It was at least desirable that the two Governments should be on friendly terms; but whether England should enter into any entangling engagement with regard to Egyptian affairs was quite another thing. That raised a very wide question, but he should not enter into it on the present occasion. However, he would say this—If, instead of remaining on good terms with our neighbours across the Channel, the Government wished to get into trouble, and to create differences, jealousies, and disputes, they could pursue no course more likely to produce that effect than that of tinkering loans on joint account.

MR. SPEAKER intimated that, as an Amendment had already been moved, it was not competent for the hon. Member to move his Resolution.

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT reminded the House of the declarations made on behalf of the Government when the Suez Canal shares were purchased. That step was taken on the undivided responsibility of the Ministry, and there was no previous consultation with other countries. It was laid down that the purchase was made on behalf of what were thought British interests. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in referring to the question of the purchase of the shares, laid stress on the political consequences of the step. The House was told by the right hon. Gentleman that the action of the Government was taken not because it desired the Canal for purposes of war, but the Government was desirous of seeing that the Canal should not be used as a political engine against England. The Premier said he had recommended the purchase of the shares as a political transaction, and thereby obtain a great hold on that part of Africa. There had been a great change in the attitude of this country; and he believed it could be shown that within the last few months undertakings had been entered into which altogether altered the liberty of action of this country. England was no longer free to form her own engagements. The proof of this was to be found in a Parliamentary Paper containing a Correspondence in which Lord

Salisbury, M. Waddington, and the French Ambassador at Berlin were concerned. From this Paper it was clear that M. Waddington insisted that, in the event of any joint action between his Government and that of Her Majesty in reference to this question, such action should be based upon a perfect equality both of attributes and powers. This was not the case in 1876, when the Suez Canal shares were purchased, nor in 1877, when Lord Derby stated the conclusions which he had arrived at on his own independent judgment. In forming that judgment Lord Derby was not hampered by any engagements such as were subsequently entered into between Lord Salisbury and M. Waddington; and the noble Lord consistently refused to enter upon any course like that which now unfortunately existed, and which had an inevitable tendency to limit the freedom of action of this country with regard to Egypt, by establishing a partnership fixed upon an artificial basis. The practical consequence of this understanding as interpreted by M. Waddington became apparent when Nubar Pasha, in his capacity as President of the Council, selected Mr. Rivers Wilson as his Finance Minister. The moment this was done M. Waddington refused his assent, unless Mr. Wilson had appointed to act with him a French Colleague, possessing equal attributes and armed with equal powers. This point was at length conceded, and the net result of the whole business was that they had drifted into a position replete with complications and opportunities for entanglement, and had, moreover, introduced into Egypt an element of international jealousy and rivalry. They all knew the astuteness with which the Oriental mind could make use of international jealousies to serve their own ends. He did not wish to hurt the feelings of the French politicians; but no one could be sanguine that two years hence France would be administered by the same Government—the wise and temperate administration of M. Waddington—which she now enjoyed. By their recent action in Egypt they had introduced the materials with which a cunning hand might play with dexterity. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had yesterday admitted that the intelligence of the fall of Nubar Pasha was authentic; but up to the present they had no news of the intentions of Mr. Rivers Wilson. No one who had any notion of what was going on in Egypt could have been surprised by the news of the last few days. He was sure Her Majesty's Government must have been prepared for it. He himself, with his limited sources of information, had heard three weeks ago of intrigues which were attributable to a hand in the Palace, and this day there was a telegram from a well-informed source that these intrigues were also traceable to foreign influence. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would be able to tell the House whether Mr. Rivers Wilson had tendered his resignation, and whether, also, M. de Blignières was not waiting for instructions from his Government as to what he should do; whether, in fact, he was acting only as the political delegate of France, or whether he was acting in concert with Mr. Wilson? He knew that these were delicate questions, but he should like to have as much information as was consistent with the circumstances. He feared that their change of policy had given them the maximum of disadvantage with the minimum of advantage, and had put upon them a great amount of responsibility without giving them in return anything like a material benefit.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, I ought to rise at once, in order to give the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken the information they have requested of me. I must, in the first place, say that at the present moment it is not possible for me to speak with entire freedom, because events are passing which are of a character which imposes a certain amount of reticence upon me. But I am anxious to speak generally as to the position we hold financially as regards Egypt, and also to express my entire dissent from the theory which has been advanced by the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. W. Cartwright), that we have, in consequence of the arrangements made within the last 12 months, altered our position towards France with regard to Egyptian affairs. That is altogether an error. We have, from first to last, been desirous of acting in a cordial spirit and with full friendliness with our neighbours. We know that throughout the relations which the two countries have had with Egypt there have been many occasions of difficulty — occasions on which persons who had any interest to serve in stirring up international jealousies have been able to avail themselves of opportunities for so doing, and we have felt it necessary to be on our guard that we might disappoint and defeat intrigues for that purpose from whatever quarter they might come. That has been equally our policy from the time we took Office, as indeed it was the policy of our Predecessors, and it is our policy up to the present day. With respect to the interest which England has in the matter, and with respect to the finances of Egypt, I took notice of an observation made by the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Samuelson), when he referred to what he had heard some time ago about persons who had come over to England desiring to induce the Government of England to interfere on account of the creditors of the Peruvian Government. The hon. Member seemed to think that there was some analogy between the desired intervention on the part of England to save the English creditors of Peru and any action which England would think proper to take with respect to Egyptian affairs. That is not so. That illustration marks the entire difference between our policy in Egypt and our policy with regard to other countries. We do not think it would be right; it would be contrary to the spirit of British policy that, for the sake of merely protecting the interests of British subjects who might have lent money to other States, we should interfere to enforce the claims of bondholders throughout the world. But in the case of Egypt very peculiar considerations arise. Hon. Members have adverted to what has passed in this House on former occasions and to observations made by Members of the Government, myself among the number, as to the reason why we have felt it necessary to watch with particular care the position of Egypt. It is not only that Egypt is on the high road between England and India, but it is also because of the relations which Egypt bears to the Ottoman Empire and to France and other countries which have interests there. They are such as to render it a matter of extreme political importance that we should, if possible, avert anything like a catastrophe which would overthrow the Egyptian dynasty and the Egyptian system of government. We have special interests, too, even of a financial character, because, as the House is aware, certain Revenues of Egypt form one of the securities pledged to this country with respect to a debt which we have guaranteed, and Egypt is also herself a debtor to us with respect to the purchase of the Suez Canal shares. There are thus a number of financial considerations that have to be taken into account, and over and above that there are an infinity of complicated political interests which we have to bear in mind. That being the case, the short history of what has occurred has been this:—Since the day when my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General—to whom, I think, we hardly pay sufficient acknowledgments for the very excellent services he rendered in pioneering the way—ascertained the truth with regard to the maze of Egyptian finance, since the return of my right hon. Friend we have had our eyes necessarily and not from choice fixed upon what is going on in Egypt. After that inquiry had been made, the Khedive expressed a wish to appoint an Englishman of ability and position to re-arrange his finances, and Mr. Rivers Wilson was allowed to go out and ascertain for himself by actual inquiry whether that was a position which he could undertake. Mr. Rivers Wilson accordingly made inquiries, which ended in his declining to undertake that office. But in the meantime he became still further acquainted with Egyptian finances, and acquired a position which gave him a considerable reputation in Egypt. Subsequently to that, another step was taken, with which Her Majesty's Government had no official connection. After Mr. Rivers Wilson had returned, the Government had neither directly nor indirectly anything to say to the financial affairs of Egypt. But the bondholders—English and French—who had, of course, a very large interest in the country, deputed two gentlemen of very high position—one being the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen)—to represent their interests and to endeavour to make some arrangement with regard to the property held by them. Those gentlemen received from the English Government, and I have no doubt the French Government also, a certain amount of support, such as is accorded to any Englishman who may be going abroad, in the way of civility; but they conducted their business entirely on their own account. They ultimately came to an arrangement which appeared to be, as they thought, promising and satisfactory to the bondholders, and which was accepted by Egypt. That arrangement was confirmed by a Decree of the Khedive's; but in a short time difficulties arose, which attracted the notice of the Government. They were these. For a considerable time it had been the practice of the subjects of different nations having claims against the Government of Egypt to go to their respective Consuls and induce them to press their claims against the Government. Subsequently, in consequence of the inconvenience that had resulted from the want of proper administration in Egypt, a system of tribunals was established by agreement between the European Powers in concert with the Government of Egypt, and no doubt the European Governments were to a great extent pledged in honour and otherwise to see that these tribunals were upheld. Certain persons then obtained judgment for debts against the Khedive before these tribunals, and when those judgment debts came to be presented, it was, of course, necessary that the Khedive should pay them, or set aside the authority of the tribunals. Well, it appeared that when these judgment debts came to be presented, after the settlement had been made between the Khedive and the bondholders, the funds at the Khedive's disposal either were, or were alleged by him to be, insufficient to meet them. The consequence was that there was great danger of the judgments which had been obtained before the tribunals being set aside, and that the nations of Europe who were more or less responsible for the tribunals would find themselves in a difficulty on seeing the authority of these tribunals thus set at naught. On the other hand, it was alleged that if the Decree which had been made was worth anything, the bondholders were entitled to certain rights under it. Under these circumstances, the representatives of the bondholders, I believe, thought that there ought to be another and more complete inquiry into the financial condition of the country. "Let us be quite sure," said they, "that the difficulty is a real one, and not a mere pretext to evade payment based on the concealment of real sources of wealth." A new inquiry accordingly was set on foot, and the services of Mr. Rivers Wilson were requested, on the part of the bondholders, to assist in it. Meanwhile, it was thought only fair that the scheme which had been devised by the bondholders should be allowed fair play, and that a whole year should be allowed to run in order that they might see what, as regarded Revenue and Expenditure, was the real financial condition of Egypt. There were better means of learning that than had ever existed before, because, under the scheme, independent persons—Englishmen and Frenchmen and others—had been nominated to positions of high authority in the administration of the finances of Egypt, so that it was felt from what they experienced in the working of the system, results could be arrived at which could be depended upon. Of course, however, the claims for postponement and for putting off payments arose from before the full working out of that experiment. Well, it was during that year that the question arose about the payment of the Coupons to which the hon. Gentleman refers—the Coupons of May, 1878—and it appeared that when the time was approaching for the payment of these Coupons the bondholders apprehended default. Accordingly, representations were made to the French Government and other Governments on the subject. In the first instance, a communication was made by the French to the English Government on the subject, and a desire was expressed that the Representatives of the two nations should urge upon the Khedive that he should make an arrangement for paying the Coupons of the Debt, in consequence of which the English Government worked with the French Government on that occasion. But the hon. Gentleman says the Coupons could only have been paid either by setting aside the claims of other creditors, or by exercising an unfair pressure on the people of the country. These representations, no doubt, were urged by various persons, and it is due to those representations that Lord Salisbury made the references in his despatch which have been referred to. But at the same time that Lord Salisbury instructed our Consul to make these representations, he also directed him to impress upon the Khedive that this pressure was put upon him in consequence of the firm belief that he had resources at his command which he would be able so to apply if he chose, instead of expending them in palace building and other matters to his own private advantage; that it was a question of drawing upon his own private funds, and that there was nothing to justify him in putting undue pressure upon his people. The hon. Member for Oxfordshire, commenting on the despatch, said he gathered that from this period a new position was taken up; but the fact that Lord Salisbury refers in that despatch to events which had taken place at an earlier date shows that that is a mistake.

Mr. W. Cartwright

MR. W. CARTWRIGHT: I said that a new political departure had taken place.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not quite understand in what the new political departure consists. There has always been a desire to act cordially with France, and I am not prepared to admit that there was any new political departure in the matter. The desire of the English Government has always been in every possible way to avoid creating any jealousy between the two countries in relation to the affairs of Egypt. We claim, on our own part, that we have a large interest in the maintenance and stability of the country; that we have large interests in her prosperity and good government, and in the avoidance of those complications which may so easily lead a country first into bankruptcy and then into political embarrassment. It is hardly necessary to point out that the financial embarrassments of Turkey aided in bringing about political events of a very serious character; and it is really on political grounds well worth our while to prevent a country like Egypt—a country naturally wealthy, with great resources, and with ample means to bear all the necessary expenditure and to pay the debts she owes without any oppression upon the people—provided only that the system of tax collecting is a good one, and that all which is collected finds its way into the Treasury, and provided that the expenditure of the country is on a reasonable and moderate basis—from falling into the same embarrassments. Well, that brings the history of the case up to the time of the Commission of Inquiry to which I have referred. Now, that Commission of Inquiry undoubtedly was appointed with the goodwill both of the English and of the French Governments. We were anxious, and we directed our Representatives to inform the Khedive that we were anxious, that fair play and a full opportunity for conducting their inquiry should be afforded to the Commissioners, and we represented to the Khedive how essential it was in his own interest that the inquiry should be full and complete; that the position depended greatly on his taking advantage of the services of those who were employed to prosecute the inquiry, and that we felt no doubt that he would act honestly and wisely in the matter. Well, that Commission completed its labours, and the results were of the character which has been alluded to. I cannot state the figures precisely; but, at all events, it carried its inquiry so far as to arrive at certain resolutions of an important character, to the effect that the Revenues of Egypt, properly administered, would be sufficient for its expenses, but that a new system of administration was required. The result was that the Khedive determined, on his own motion and the advice of those on whom he relied, to make the sacrifices which the Commission had pointed out. One of these sacrifices was a very important one to him. His revenues consisted, of course, of all the ordinary taxes of the country. They consisted, also, of the produce of certain lands which were known by the name of Daira, and those had been dealt with under the arrangements made by previous settlements. But over and above what was known as the public Daira, there was an amount of land which was the private property of the Khedive himself and the members of his family; and it was strongly urged on him that his only way to get out of his difficulties was to give up these lands and all his possessions, to alter his whole position, and take a certain revenue that would be allotted to him in the form of a Civil List. The Khedive decided on adopting that course, and he agreed to this arrangement. He also agreed to what was more important—that he should become a Constitutional Sovereign, with a responsible Ministry; and he placed Nubar Pasha, who had filled a very high position before, at the head of the Ministry. From that moment Nubar Pasha was in the position of what may be called the Prime Minister of a Constitutional country. I do not say that the parallel in practice was complete; but the theory was that there should be a responsible Government with a chief Minister at the head of it. Nubar Pasha was appointed to that position, and he formed an Administration by introducing into it certain persons who were to fill different offices. Among these Mr. Rivers Wilson was appointed Minister of Finance. On being offered that office, Mr. Rivers Wilson accepted it with the reservation that he should obtain from Her Majesty's Government leave of absence for a certain time, which would enable him to undertake the duty with greater freedom than he could otherwise command. The Government gave him the two years' leave of absence he desired, and he undertook the position of Finance Minister in the Khedive's Cabinet. Undoubtedly it is true that the French Government, finding out what was going on, were anxious that a French Minister also should be attached to this Administration. That was a matter with the decision of which we had nothing whatever to do; but it was the occasion of some correspondence between the two Governments. Ultimately a French Minister was appointed. That Administration has been holding the position for some months of the responsible Government of the Khedive until the events of the last few days, which have led to Nubar Pasha ceasing to hold his office. I may say, in the meantime, that Mr. Rivers Wilson has not resigned, neither has M. de Blignières, the French Minister, thought it necessary to resign. The hon. Member asks what is the meaning of the arrangement which has been made with regard to a loan charged on the Daira lands? That step, it is said, has led to the nomination of one of the trustees for the Daira lands. The history of it is this—When Mr. Rivers Wilson accepted the office of Minister of Finance, he naturally considered what arrangement he could make with regard to the finances of Egypt. Among other arrangements, he desired to raise a loan of £8,500,000. He considered what security he had to offer; he had the security of the Daira lands on which, as part of the resources of Egypt, he was entitled to raise a loan. He applied to Messrs. Rothschild to advance the sum required, and they agreed to advance the money on the security of those lands; but they made this stipulation—that they should have some security that the revenue of those lands would be applied properly to the purpose of defraying the charge. They stipulated that there should be, at least, one Englishman and one Frenchman, designated by their respective Governments, who should be responsible for the proper application of the revenues of the Daira. Accordingly, that request was agreed to by the English and French Governments. A French gentleman was designated by the French Government, and Mr. Rowsell was designated on the part of England, the understanding being—and that understanding was subsequently put into a note from Nubar Pasha—that the persons so designated should not be removed without the consent of their respective Governments. That, I think, is the whole history of our transactions in this matter. I feel that it is one of the details of which may well excite the attention of hon. Gentlemen and of this House; but there is nothing in it that we are in the least disposed to conceal, or, as we think, that in the least requires apology, but rather the contrary. We quite admit that transactions of this character are so exceptional that they require full explanation, and our desire has been, and is, to give that explanation. I hope what I have said will meet the wishes and objects of hon. Gentlemen who have addressed the House. I can only say the principles on which we have acted thus far are principles by which we intend still to be guided, and it has been one main object of our proceedings to maintain good and thoroughly confidential relations with the Government of France in this matter. I am persuaded that nothing could be more advantageous for the interests of Egypt herself, and of Europe generally, than that there should be a good and thorough understanding between England and France on this question. It is quite certain that our Representatives must have considerable influence in Egypt. It is all very well to say that they should have nothing to do with the affairs of the country, such as have been the subject of debate; but we know very well that intrigues are always going on, and attempts are made to play off the Representative of one

Power against another. I am glad, however, to say that at the present moment and the present crisis we are in close and confidential communication with the French Government, and our understanding is of an entirely satisfactory character.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as to the desirability of maintaining the most cordial relations with France in this matter; but he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had fully met the objections that had been urged. The common belief was that the Government had been forced to join France in this financial enterprize, against their own judgment, in order to smooth over and humour the French susceptibilities which they had excited by their Eastern policy. He thought Her Majesty's Government would have done better to have kept their hands from interfering in such a nasty kettle of fish as the foreign debts of the Khedive. The right hon. Gentleman had shown no good reason why they should have forced the Khedive to pay the coupons of his debt in full, and leave the servants of the State unpaid. The decent administration of a country entirely depended upon the zealous and honest work of its officials, and this could not be procured by leaving them unpaid. If their salaries were not paid, they would be left to prey on the country. In fact, the recent crisis in Egypt had been caused by the outbreak of those officials, who had this reasonable pretext for their conduct, though, no doubt, they would hear a different account of the causes of the outbreak in the versions that came through sources connected with foreign creditors. He did not think facilities should have been given for raising a new loan, which would be an additional burden upon the over-taxed people of Egypt. It seemed to him that up to the present time everything had been done for the bondholders, and nothing for the people of Egypt. Things in that country were going from bad to worse. New loans might be used to pay interest and raise the value of the bonds in the market; but they pressed heavily on the taxpayer. It was said that wherever the carcass was, there the vultures would be gathered together, and Egypt was a prey to all the vultures of Europe. Considering that the Native officials had been deprived of their proper salaries, while the bondholders had received their dividends, it was not altogether surprising that the recent crisis had occurred. He hoped Mr. Rivers Wilson would see that the officials were paid as well as the bondholders, and that the result would be a better state of things for the future. The right hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. S. Cave) made a very good report, but went out on his Mission to Egypt as the Representative of a creditor of that country—namely, the British Government, which had purchased several millions' worth of the Suez Canal shares—not to set matters right in the interest of the people. Next came the Mission of the right hon. Member for London (Mr. Goschen), who went out avowedly as the agent of the bondholders, although his high character and position were a guarantee that in pressing the claims of the bondholders, nothing that was unfair would be done by him. At the same time, events had shown that the right hon. Gentleman had taken too sanguine a view of the finances of Egypt. The right hon. Gentleman had always said that the system he initiated was only an experiment, and that if it should turn out that the Revenues of Egypt could not suffice to pay the creditors in full, and also carry on the government of the country, a new arrangement must be made. Now, it seemed to him that that was exactly what had happened, and that a new arrangement was necessary. Next came a third Mission—that of Mr. Rivers Wilson. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the Khedive made up his mind to introduce Constitutional government and a responsible Ministry in Egypt; but it was difficult to understand what the right hon. Gentleman meant by those phrases. What was the Constitution of Egypt? He (Sir George Campbell) was not aware that it was founded on anything except the will of the Khedive, nor did he know that the Ministry was responsible to anybody but the Khedive—as, indeed, the events of the last few days had shown. He saw no essential difference between all that and any other Oriental despotism. A great deal had been said about the reforms that were to be effected by the new Ministry. Now, they had often heard of such a certain extent in Egyptian finance, it would in future be necessary that an Egyptian Budget should always be discussed in that House. He did not think that the House of Commons was the proper arena for the discussion of questions of Egyptian finance. His hon. Friend who had just sat down (Sir George Campbell) had addressed himself partly to the action of the Government; but the main portion of his address had been directed to the bondholders' question, and the course which they ought to pursue. He (Mr. Goschen) would not follow his hon. Friend's example. Deeply interested as he had been in the matter, he should not take the opportunity of either defending the original arrangements which were made, or of entering into any future arrangement which ought to be made, as he did not consider questions of that character ought to be discussed there, as the discussion would naturally be interminable. He could not complain of the manner in which his hon. Friend had spoken of his (Mr. Goschen's) Mission to Egypt. His only reason for rising was that it might not be asserted that silence as to any of the observations of his hon. Friend was to be construed into acquiescence in the statements which he had made. He wished to remind his hon. Friend that he had distinctly stipulated, when he undertook his Mission to Egypt, that he should never be expected, in the interests of the bondholders, to propose or to accede to anything which, on political grounds, could not be fully justified. And, further, he had made this stipulation in writing, that he would not urge any steps on the English Government which, although useful to the bondholders, he might deem to be politically inexpedient. He was aware of the fearful suffering that would be produced by the bankruptcy of Egypt, and he was certain that it would not be for the benefit of this country that Egypt should become bankrupt. As he believed at the time that she was on the high road to bankruptcy, he had consented to act on behalf of the bondholders; but thinking, at the same time, that it would be of political service to this country that a country of such large resources as Egypt should be saved from bankruptcy. When his hon. Friend spoke of the Egyptian creditors as if they were paid in full, while others had been sacrificed, he (Mr. Goschen) would like to tell him that he forgot that what they were now receiving was really a compromise, and was less than what they were entitled to under their original agreement. He had been anxious, while protecting the bondholders from beginning to end, that he should not in any way appear to be bolstering up Egyptian credit. He had always said it was impossible to forecast what the Revenue would be until it had been for some time under European administration; and he was not concerned to answer at any greater length the remarks of his hon. Friend.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

ANCIENT MONUMENTS BILL.—[BILL 52.]

(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Beresford Hope, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Sir Richard Wallace.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present,—Committee counted, and 40 Members not being present,

Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair:—House counted, and 40 Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter after Eight o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 24th February, 1879.

THE PLAGUE IN RUSSIA—SANITARY PRECAUTIONS.—QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether they will adopt the same precautions against the plague with regard to shipping coming to this country from Russian ports in the Baltic as have been adopted for shipping from the Black schemes in connection with Turkey and Egypt; but there was invariably this little addendum to all of them—namely, that the Oriental Potentate who was to effect all these great reforms was going to have a new loan. Mr. Rivers Wilson might be a very able man; but as far as he (Sir George Campbell) could see, he had only shown his ability by obtaining a new loan for the Khedive of Egypt, which had been devoted to paying the interest of the bondholders, which he did not think was right. On that account he very much regretted that Her Majesty's Government should have touched the matter, as it were, with the tip of their little finger, and would have much preferred that they should have left it alone altogether. They should have refused to have anything to do with the loan, at least until the administration of Egypt was put upon a proper footing, and the arrears to which he had referred were paid. They might go on paying the interest of one debt by creating another; but it was a proceeding very much of the character of the doings of the Directors of the City of Glasgow Bank, who paid 11 and 12 per cent dividend to their shareholders when they owed a great deal more money than they were ever able to pay. It seemed to him also that, in all the proposals that had been made in respect to Egypt, too much importance was attached to the sending out there of swarms of European officials. He admitted that men were sent out there who were not vultures, but many others had come from all parts of Europe in search of places. Not only were there three or four times as many officials in Egypt as were really required, but every time a new Mission went out to that country a fresh layer of officials was, so to speak, super-imposed upon the old set of officials. Mr. Romaine, a man of great experience, was appointed to occupy a very important position in the Egyptian Administration. He had only one fault—he was a great deal too honest for Egypt. He exposed the true state of the finances in a way that was not agreeable to the foreign bondholders, who wished to raise the value of their stock. He was engaged for a term of years, at a high salary, together with other foreign officials; but he and they were all suddenly told that the Administration had been changed.

Sir George Campbell

Officials were multiplied in the most reckless manner, and a new set were appointed. Our Government were responsible for some of these matters. For instance, as to the Daira estates, they were in the charge of a most competent officer, Mr. Money, an ex-official of the Indian Government, who had had the management of the Revenues of Bengal. Now, Bengal was 10 times larger and more populous than Egypt, and Mr. Money consequently went from a charge 10 times greater than that of the whole Revenues of Egypt. But, nevertheless, he had only charge of the Khedive's estate, which represented about one-tenth of Egypt. Under the circumstances alluded to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, some further Daira estates were surrendered to the creditors; and it might have been supposed that Mr. Money, who had had so great a charge in India, would have had that additional charge imposed on him. But it was thought necessary—he knew not why—to send out another English official. Mr. Rowsell, he understood, was a very able man, and one who would be much missed at the Admiralty here; but he was not aware that that gentleman was particularly qualified to deal with agricultural affairs in Egypt. It was unfair to the unhappy and heavily-taxed people of Egypt that Mr. Money and Mr. Rowsell should both be paid for doing work which one of them could do 10 times over. He had been in Egypt last year after the bad Nile, and he did not think the bad Nile sufficiently accounted for the financial shortcomings. They scarcely realized how heavily the taxation pressed on the people. Head for head it was as heavy as the taxation of the people of England, and that for so poor a country as Egypt was enormous. It should be reduced instead of being increased. Any reform of the administration in Egypt meant a reduction of the Revenue, because the present Revenue was only obtained by harsh measures which it would be impossible for a good European administration to enforce. It would, therefore, be the most prudent thing not to force the people of Egypt to pay this great debt in full, but to make a reasonable compromise.

Mr. GOSCHEN said, he did not know whether, in consequence of Her Majesty's Government having intervened to a certain extent in Egyptian finance, it would in future be necessary that an Egyptian Budget should always be discussed in that House. He did not think that the House of Commons was the proper arena for the discussion of questions of Egyptian finance. His hon. Friend who had just sat down (Sir George Campbell) had addressed himself partly to the action of the Government; but the main portion of his address had been directed to the bondholders' question, and the course which they ought to pursue. He (Mr. Goschen) would not follow his hon. Friend's example. Deeply interested as he had been in the matter, he should not take the opportunity of either defending the original arrangements which were made, or of entering into any future arrangement which ought to be made, as he did not consider questions of that character ought to be discussed there, as the discussion would naturally be interminable. He could not complain of the manner in which his hon. Friend had spoken of his (Mr. Goschen's) Mission to Egypt. His only reason for rising was that it might not be asserted that silence as to any of the observations of his hon. Friend was to be construed into acquiescence in the statements which he had made. He wished to remind his hon. Friend that he had distinctly stipulated, when he undertook his Mission to Egypt, that he should never be expected, in the interests of the bondholders, to propose or to accede to anything which, on political grounds, could not be fully justified. And, further, he had made this stipulation in writing, that he would not urge any steps on the English Government which, although useful to the bondholders, he might deem to be politically inexpedient. He was aware of the fearful suffering that would be produced by the bankruptcy of Egypt, and he was certain that it would not be for the benefit of this country that Egypt should become bankrupt. As he believed at the time that she was on the high road to bankruptcy, he had consented to act on behalf of the bondholders; but thinking, at the same time, that it would be of political service to this country that a country of such large resources as Egypt should be saved from bankruptcy. When his hon. Friend spoke of the Egyptian creditors as if they were paid in full, while others had been sacrificed, he (Mr. Goschen) would like to tell him that he forgot that what they were now receiving was really a compromise, and was less than what they were entitled to under their original agreement. He had been anxious, while protecting the bondholders from beginning to end, that he should not in any way appear to be bolstering up Egyptian credit. He had always said it was impossible to forecast what the Revenue would be until it had been for some time under European administration; and he was not concerned to answer at any greater length the remarks of his hon. Friend.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

ANCIENT MONUMENTS BILL.—[BILL 52.]
(Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Beresford Hope, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Sir Richard Wallace.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Notice taken that 40 Members were not present,—Committee counted, and 40 Members not being present,

Mr. Speaker resumed the Chair:—
House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at a quarter after Eight o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 24th February, 1879.

THE PLAGUE IN RUSSIA—SANITARY PRECAUTIONS.—QUESTION.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether they will adopt the same precautions against the plague with regard to shipping coming to this country from Russian ports in the Baltic as have been adopted for shipping from the Black Sea; and whether they have placed restrictions on the importation of rags or other equally contagious merchandise from Russia?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON replied, that Her Majesty's Government did intend to take the same precautions in regard to shipping coming from Russian ports in the Baltic as had been adopted for shipping from the Black Sea as soon as it might be necessary to do so; but as at present all navigation in the Baltic was stopped, it was not necessary to issue the Orders with respect to the ports in the Baltic, as had been done in reference to those in the Black Sea. Her Majesty's Government had not placed restrictions on the importation of rags, nor did they think that at the present time there was any necessity for such a measure.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
ACT, 1878—DAIRIES, COWSHED, AND MILKSHOPS ORDER, 1879.

QUESTION.

LORD COTTESLOE asked the Lord President of the Council, Whether it is the intention of the Government to include within the provisions of the Dairies, Cowshed, and Milkshops Order, 1879, cowkeepers and dairymen who use the produce of their dairies in the manufacture of butter and cheese for sale, not being sellers or purveyors of milk? The Order in question was generally felt to be unnecessarily stringent, and that it was also expensive to those who were brought within its scope.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he was sorry to hear that there were such objections to the recent Order as those spoken of by the noble Lord. The Order had been issued in accordance with the 34th section of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act of last year. He could, of course, state what were the intentions of the Government in framing that Order; but it would be impossible for him to make an authoritative statement as to the particular cases that might from time to time be brought within the Order. Each case must rest on its merits. He would, however, state very distinctly that the intention was that those who sold butter and cheese and milk should be included within the Order. He did not think that those who sold butter and cheese, but did not sell milk, would come within it, the object being to secure to the public a supply of pure and wholesome milk. The noble Lord appeared to think that the regulation was a stringent and expensive one. He did not see how it could be expensive; for if the noble Lord referred to the 56th section of the Act, he would see that no charge was made by the local authority for anything done under the Act, so that there was no expense whatever to anyone registered under the Order. He did not imagine that the noble Lord would wish that persons who sold milk should be allowed to keep their cowsheds and dairies in an unclean and unwholesome condition. All were aware of the prevalence of typhoid disease in this country, and it was recognized that that disease was much spread by the use of bad milk; and, therefore, he thought the Order must be regarded as one made in the interests of all consumers of milk, both high and low, throughout the country.

ARMY—THE REINFORCEMENTS FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD TRURO asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether it is true, as has been stated, that, after the men selected for service had been despatched from their several depôts and head-quarters, an Order was issued by the Horse Guards that men under twelve months' service should be excluded, and, if so, what was the date of that Order; and whether it is true that the 91st and 94th Regiments have received between 300 and 400 volunteers to complete their establishment for active service? The Question had a twofold character. First, it touched upon the Horse Guard administration; and, secondly, upon the system carried out by the War Office. He could not doubt that both those Questions would receive a full and complete contradiction; because, if they did not, they would lead to the most unfortunate inferences that at the Horse Guards there had been no careful consideration of these matters previously, and no Regulation in force as to the age, efficiency, and drill, and thorough instruction in the use of the rifle by the men sent out in such services, or their ability to withstand the effects of such a climate. It would lead to the inference, equally unfortunate, that very young men were being sent out on an extremely hazardous service, and one requiring the utmost caution and care, but for which they had been selected without due care; and to the inference that the reputation of the regiments and of the officers commanding them, and the honour of the Army, were not sufficiently considered. Those inferences no one would be disposed to draw; and, therefore, he could not help thinking the first Question would meet with an unqualified negative. In reference to the next Question—Whether the 91st and 94th Regiments have received between 300 and 400 volunteers to complete their establishment for active service?—he would only say that we seemed to have adopted the system of universal incompleteness in order to adopt another system of indefinite expansion of establishment. It appeared that in the case of one of the regiments he had mentioned volunteers were received from no fewer than eight other regiments; so that they must have appeared on parade in motley. This fact implied that instead of having regiments we had nothing more than half-battalions—a state of things which was very undesirable. The system of expansion was admirable to a certain extent; but it would be well to consider whether five or six or seven regiments standing first on the list for foreign service should not be of full strength and completely equipped, so as to be capable of being transported to any part of the world where they were needed. This did not appear to have been the condition of any one of those regiments when this emergency arose. If there was any advantage in having an inspection of troops before they leave the country for foreign service, it ought to secure that the regiments should leave properly dressed and provided in other respects, and certainly not in the condition they had been led to believe those troops were in.

Lord Stanley of Alderley

VISCOUNT BURY: The noble Lord has put two Questions to Her Majesty's Government which I will answer seriatim. The noble Lord described, with regard to the first, three inferences, highly unfavourable both to the Horse Guards and the War Office, which he should draw if his Question were not answered in the negative. I am glad to be able to relieve the mind of the noble Lord by telling him that no Orders such as he imagined, and upon which he has founded those inferences, have been issued by the Horse Guards. Therefore, I need not try to refute the inferences which he says he would have drawn had my answer been otherwise.

LORD TRURO said, his Question was founded on what had appeared in The Times newspaper.

VISCOUNT BURY: The noble Lord says he would have drawn certain inferences from a statement he found in a newspaper if I did not contradict the statement; but I entirely contradict the statement. With regard to the second Question of the noble Lord, it appears to have been framed with the view of finding fault with the scheme of the localization of the Army. But that scheme, having been fully discussed and agreed to by both Houses of Parliament, it is hardly to be expected that I should defend it or try to say anything in its favour. I will answer the Question of the noble Lord by saying that it is quite true that the 91st Regiment did receive 374 volunteers to make up their battalion, and that the 94th did receive 346 men to make up their number. By the localization scheme of the Army, the noble Lord must be aware that these regiments are linked with battalions serving abroad, that one-half of each regiment is at home, and the other half abroad, and that the regiment at home must keep up the regiment abroad. The 91st is linked with the 72nd, serving in India, which they had to keep up, so that, according to the scheme, when the 91st was ordered abroad they had to receive volunteers. The 94th is linked with the 89th, also serving abroad, and had to receive 346 men in order to raise its strength, and that in accordance with the provisions of the localization scheme, which, as I have already said, I am not now called upon to defend.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 24th February, 1879.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—
Assizes [83].
Committee—Habitual Drunkards [47]—R.F.

QUESTIONS.

CUSTOMS RE-ORGANIZATION.

QUESTION.

MR. RITCHIE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, When the scheme for the re-organisation of the Customs Department, which has for some time been under consideration, will come into operation?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he was sorry he was not in a position to state when the promised scheme would come into force. The matter was still under consideration, and he expected that the basis of the new scheme would be submitted to the Treasury in the course of the next two or three days. No time would be lost, when that scheme had been received, in coming to a conclusion upon it; and he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) hoped before very long to be able to give a more satisfactory answer to the hon. Member's Question.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND)—RATE OF DUTY.

QUESTION.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will revise the scale of taxation for the sale of intoxicating liquors in Ireland, having regard to the reduction of the hours of sale by the legitimate trader, owing to the passing of the Early Closing and the Sunday Closing Bills?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, at present the law provides for a reduction duty in the case of six-days' licences of six-sevenths of the full duty, and for a lower rate of five-sevenths in the case of others. In these circumstances, there did not appear to be any grounds for a further reduction.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT—DIPHTHERIA
IN NORTH LONDON.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the President of the Local Government Board, If he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report made by Mr. W. H. Power on the cause of the late outbreak of diphtheria in North London?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he had no objection to lay upon the Table the Report referred to if the hon. Baronet would move for it.

INDIAN RAILWAYS — SHIPMENT OF RAILWAY MATERIAL.—QUESTION.

MR. RYLANDS (for Mr. E. JENKINS) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any supervision is exercised by the Indian Council over the shipment of Railway material and stores from Great Britain for the use of the Guarantee Railways in India generally or the East Indian Railway in particular; whether it is a fact that the general body of shipowners are virtually excluded from competing for the conveyance of such material and stores from the circumstance that all such shipments pass through the hands of particular brokers, who make it a condition that the ships taken shall be consigned to certain houses in the East, thus securing private profits; whether the results of this exclusion of competition is not to enhance very greatly the expense of the conveyance of such stores, and whether it is in the power of the Indian Council to secure that the contracts for such conveyance shall be unconditionally placed in the open market; and, whether he will cause to be prepared and laid upon the Table a Return of the freights paid during the past five years by the India Office for stores shipped on Government account, and rates paid by the various Indian Railways upon such stores respectively—distinguishing Railway materials from other stores?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, supervision is exercised by the India Office through the Government Director of Indian Railways over the shipments of stores for the guaranteed railways, including the East Indian. I understand that the East Indian Railway employ a broker to engage tonnage for the conveyance of their stores, and I have also heard that it is the practice of the Company to consign their stores to particular firms in Calcutta; but I have no certain knowledge about it. But I am told by the Chairman, Mr. Crawford, that the suggestion that private profits are secured to individual members of the Board or their firms is quite erroneous. The result of this so-called "exclusion of competition" does not appear to have enhanced the expense of the conveyance. The rates paid by the East Indian Railway Company for the period of five or six years which I have examined do not compare unfavourably with those paid by others shipping at the same port. The India Office has, no doubt, the power to secure that such contracts shall be placed unconditionally in the open market; but it is doubtful if it would lead to economy. The expediency of employing or not employing a broker is a moot point, upon which the best authorities differ. It is thought undesirable to lay down any hard-and-fast rule in the matter, but to leave it to the discretion of the companies to obtain the best terms they can. There is no objection to laying on the Table a Return of the freights paid during the past five years by the India Office for stores shipped on Government account, and rates paid by the various Indian railways upon such stores respectively.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT—SMALL-POX IN THE METROPOLIS.—QUESTION.

DR. CAMERON (for Dr. LUSH) asked the President of the Local Government Board, If the inquiry instituted by him last year into the causes of the great prevalence of small pox in the metropolis has led to any definite results; and, if he will explain to the House what increased sanitary safeguards he proposes to recommend for adoption, either by legislation or otherwise?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, the Report had not yet come into his hands; but he had no doubt it would contain information that might lead to a useful amendment of the law. At present he had no intention of proposing legislation; but arrangements were now being made for a more careful carrying out of the Act dealing with vaccination.

INDIA—THE MAHARAJAH OF CASHMERE.—QUESTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to an article in "The Times" newspaper of December 27, 1878, in which it is asserted that the Maharajah of Cashmere has been instructed to carry out operations in the direction of Chitral and the Hindoo Koosh; whether he is able to assure the House that the Maharajah of Cashmere has not been instructed to carry out operations in that direction, and that he has not in fact been either carrying on nor is about to carry on operations in that direction; and, whether he is able to inform the House that the Maharajah is not carrying on nor is about to carry on operations beyond his own borders, and that the rumour of his having been instructed to co-operate in the "rectification of the frontier" is without foundation?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I have read the article in The Times of the 27th of December, 1878, as to military operations in this quarter. I am able to assure the House that the Maharajah of Cashmere has not been instructed to carry out military operations in the direction of Chitral and of the Hindoo Koosh, or beyond his own frontier; and that he has not been instructed to co-operate in the "rectification of the frontier;" and so far as we know, he is not carrying out, nor about to carry out, any such operations. The hon. Member will, however, of course understand that that my answer applies to existing circumstances and not to contingencies at present unforeseen.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BELFAST UNION WORKHOUSE.

QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return of all Correspondence that has taken place, or Orders made, or Resolutions or Minutes received by the Local Government Board (Ireland), relative to the payment of £25 a-year by the Government through the Guardians of the Belfast Union to the assistant teacher (Mr. Bellard) for the instruction of the boys at the union workhouse in instrumental music, which salary has been paid by the Government since 1872, and is now withheld by reason of the Local Government Board declining to give the required certificate to the Government approving said payment; and, if he will state why said certificate has been refused?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the reason why the certificate to which the hon. Member refers was refused was that it did not appear to the Government that the cost of music-masters was a legitimate item of workhouse expenditure. I will look into the Correspondence and see if there is any which can, with advantage, be laid upon the Table of the House.

REGISTER HOUSE BUILDINGS, EDINBURGH.—QUESTION.

MR. M'LAREN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, as the result of his recent personal examination of the different departments within the Register House buildings in Edinburgh, he intended to introduce a Bill to remedy the existing defects, and to confer on the Treasury the same power of appointing all the clerks as they have in other Government establishments; and, whether the Bill will provide for the appointment of an Under Secretary of State for Scotland, as was done by the Bill which he introduced last Session?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Question belonged more to the Treasury than the Home Department; but having been over the buildings and seen their working he had made certain recommendations to the Treasury with respect to them. As soon as the two Departments had come to a conclusion on the matter, the proper time would have arrived to state the nature of the Bill it was proposed to introduce. He could assure the hon. Member that the matter was not being lost sight of.

PRISONS ACT (RULES)—SALFORD GAOL. QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true, as stated in substance in the "Manchester Guardian" of a recent date, reporting the Salford Hundred Quarter Sessions and the discussions of the Bench of Justices, that the Chief Commissioner of Prisons, Sir Edmund Du Cane, presented himself some time since at the Salford Gaol, unannounced and unknown, to the warden, and, being admitted through the outer door, ordered the warden to open the inner iron gate; whether the warden, pursuant to the rules of the Justices, declined to open the gate to a stranger, and requested to know his name and business; whether the account is true, which states that the Chief Commissioner of Prisons shook the iron gate in anger, and tried to take the keys from the warden's hands, and, not succeeding, then stated who he was, and was admitted; whether the warden for this was, by Sir Edward Du Cane's order, immediately put on six months' probation as a punishment; whether that order has ever been formally revoked, and when and whether care will be taken that the warden be not prejudiced; and, whether there will be any objection to lay the Correspondence and Papers relating to this matter upon the Table?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, the first paragraph of the hon. and learned Member's Question is substantially true, with the exception of the word "unannounced." As to the second and third paragraphs, the rule of that gaol consists of two parts—first, persons desirous of seeing the Governor should be politely asked what is the nature of their business and detained pending the receipt of orders; secondly, a Visiting Justice or a Justice of the Peace having jurisdiction in the prison is to be admitted at once; if a stranger, the gatekeeper will inquire his name. The Commissioner says, "He told the gatekeeper who he was and his office at once." The gatekeeper says, "He ordered me twice to open the gate before he told me that. I said I could not allow any stranger to enter the prison without sending his name and the nature of his business to the Governor. He said, 'I am the Commissioner; open that gate,' &c. He shook the iron gate and tried to take the keys out of my hand. I sent up to the Governor and Sir Edmund was admitted." It is only fair to state that the Commissioner says he never touched him. I am asked whether the gatekeeper acted pursuant to rule. If the case fell within the first part, he certainly did, and he ought to have been rewarded rather than punished. The Commissioner, however, being a Visiting Justice, came under the second part of the rule. Therefore, I cannot say that the officer acted "in pursuance of the rule;" but it was only a mistake through over zeal and not one, in my opinion, deserving of punishment. However, though not degraded in rank, he was afterwards put on probation for six months. This was cancelled in December by a Minute of the chairman on the report of the inspector, and the inspector made the announcement to the gatekeeper in the presence of the Governor and principal and senior warders. I can only repeat now what I informed the Visiting Committee, that I very much regretted the incident; that I had fully expressed my regrets to the Commissioner; that I had insured that no injury should happen to the prospects of the gatekeeper in any way; and that I had received from the Commissioner the expression of deep regret at having been so betrayed into impatience on being, as he thought, improperly refused admittance, contrary to the rule and the usual practice. Sir Edmund is a public officer of long standing and experience, and his hard work, his ability and efficiency have constantly received high praise. I can only add on his behalf that no one regrets this incident more than the Commissioner himself. In these circumstances, I cannot see that any good would come from laying any Papers on the Table.

Mr. Biggar

PERSIA.—EMPLOYMENT OF RUSSIAN OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government has received any information from Her Majesty's Consul at Teheran, or from any other source regarding the reported organization by Russian officers of the Persian Army?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, it has been reported in the newspapers that the Persian Government had determined to employ some Russian officers for the purpose mentioned by my hon. Friend; but Her Majesty's Government have not received information to that effect.

TREATY OF PRAGUE—ARTICLE 5. QUESTION.

MR. J. COWEN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If the Government has received official notification from the Governments of Austria and Germany, or either of them, of the abrogation, in the month of October last, of the 5th Article of the Treaty of Prague of August 23rd, 1866, and any communication on the subject from Her Majesty's representatives at the Courts of Vienna and Berlin; and, if so, whether the Government will lay Copies of the Papers, together with any replies on the part of the Government, upon the Table of the House?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the abrogation of the 5th Article of the Treaty of Prague has not been notified officially to Her Majesty's Government either by the Government of Austria or Germany. Information of the fact of the abrogation has been received from Her Majesty's Representatives at Vienna and Berlin, but it is not intended to answer those communications, and, therefore, no Papers will be laid on the Table.

SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND—THE AWARD.—QUESTIONS.

MR. DILLWYN (for Mr. CHAMBERLAIN) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Despatch from Sir Henry Bulwer, dated 12th June, No. 96, and mentioned on page 25 of the Papers respecting the Affairs of South Africa, presented to Parliament in February 1879, has been included in the correspondence hitherto published; and, if not, whether there is any objection to now laying it upon the Table?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, the despatch of Sir Henry Bulwer dated the 12th of June was not included in the Correspondence published last summer because, like Sir Theophilus Shepstone's account of his interview with Cetewayo, referred to the other day by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James), it was not only marked "confidential," but dealt mainly with the question of the boundary dispute, and I did not consider it desirable to publish any Papers discussing that subject until after the High Commissioner had pronounced his award. It will now be published, together with two previous despatches written in April and May last dealing with the same question.

MR. DILLWYN (for Mr. CHAMBERLAIN) asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to a statement in Despatch No. 92<sup>a</sup>, dated October 17th, 1878, in which it is stated—

"All the information that has hitherto reached them (the Government) with respect to the position of affairs in Zululand appears to them to justify a confident hope that by the exercise of prudence and by meeting the Zulus in a spirit of forbearance and reasonable compromise it will be possible to avert the very serious evil of a war with Cetewayo;"

And, whether the information above referred to has been published in the papers laid before Parliament; and, if not, whether there would be any objection to produce it?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, the word "information" quoted by the hon. Member included all those general means of forming a conclusion, in addition to official communications, which were at the command of the Government; but so far as it referred to communications from persons holding official positions they have been published in the Papers laid before Parliament.

THE MERCANTILE MARINE—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Government have abandoned their intention of proposing legislation on the subject of the discipline and condition of Merchant Seamen, similar to that embodied in the Bill which last year was referred to and considered by a Select Committee?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, my hon. and learned Friend has, I think, overlooked the fact that it was mentioned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the first day of this Session that the Government had arranged to bring in a Bill respecting merchant seamen if the state of Public Business permitted. I may add that I have given my best consideration during the winter to the Report of the Select Committee of last year as well as to the subject generally, and we have prepared a Bill which, though I am happy to say it is a short one, deals with matters of considerable importance to our Mercantile Marine, and will, I have reason to hope, prove acceptable generally to both shipowners and sailors.

NAVY—EXPLOSION ON BOARD H.M.S. "THUNDERER."—QUESTION.

LORD HENRY LENNOX asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether

Mr. Dillwyn

he could give the House any information as to the decision of the Committee who inquired into the explosion on board the "Thunderer"?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the Report of the Committee and full Minutes of the proceedings of the Committee appointed to inquire into the explosion on board the Thunderer arrived at the Admiralty this morning. The documents are exceedingly voluminous, containing several hundred manuscript pages. I have not yet had time to read them through, but I have ordered them to be printed immediately. I trust in a few days to be able to lay the whole, or a great portion, of them upon the Table. The Committee report the cause of the accident to be as follows:—

"The Committee have now to report the cause which they are unanimously convinced burst the gun was that the gun, having missed fire at the time of the electrical broadside, and this misfire not having been noticed, the gun was presented to receive the full charge and empty common shell for the independent firing, and did receive this charge and shell while the battering charge and the Palliser shell were still in the gun."

I am not yet able to inform the House as to the nature of the evidence which was sufficient to convince the Committee that this was the cause of the accident; but I may state that their conviction was arrived at in the most satisfactory manner, each member of the Committee separately writing down his opinion and handing it to the secretary without communicating its nature to the others. Singular enough, their opinion was unanimous. Experiments have been made with the view of preventing a recurrence of the accident; but the Committee have recommended that further experiments should be made. The whole matter will receive the very careful consideration of the Admiralty. As to breech and muzzle-loading guns, the Secretary of State for War stated a few days ago that the War Department were considering the question of breech-loading ordnance, and the Admiralty are in communication with the War Department to see whether it will be desirable to extend the system to guns on board iron-clads now building.

PRISONS ACT (RULES)—FEMALE PRISONERS.—QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department,

Whether he is aware that the orders for putting women to the treadwheel, crank, &c., said to have been sent to Kirkdale Gaol only, were also, to the number of 350 copies, sent to Salford Hundred Gaol, and in a few days recalled because "the standing order of the 9th September, respecting the furnishing of mattresses and pillows to plank beds modifies the rules for female prisoners," and after nearly a month's delay revised orders were substituted, omitting the provisions as to treadwheel and crank for female prisoners; whether the original draft was submitted to the Commissioners, and any copies sent to any other gaols; and, if he has any objection to lay upon the Table the Correspondence between the Visiting Justices of Lancashire, himself, and the Prison Commissioners on this and other matters relating to the prisons of the county since the coming into force of the Prisons Act?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, the story detailed in the Question of the hon. and learned Member carries its own refutation on the face of it. As I stated the other day, the documents referred to were not fresh rules or orders issued for the guidance of the prison officers. They were merely abstracts of existing rules intended to be posted in the cells for the information of prisoners, in the same manner as abstracts of the Factory Acts are posted up in factories. The abstract of the rules applicable to males was submitted to the Commissioners and printed, and they directed that similar abstracts of the rules relating to females should also be printed and submitted to them. The latter were printed at the same place as the former; but by some mistake the abstracts relating to females were issued without having been sent to the Commissioners for revision. The latter abstracts were issued on Thursday and reached the prisons on Friday; and the mistake being discovered, they were recalled on the following Monday. Having been properly revised, they were finally issued in correct form on the 6th of December. If the hon. and learned Member for Stockport will call at the Home Office, the whole of the Correspondence on the subject will be at his service; but we do not think it necessary to print it and to lay it upon the Table of the House.

PRISONS (IRELAND) ACT—MEDICAL OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the General Prisons Board (Ireland) has submitted to the Treasury any proposals for increasing, under the provisions of the Prisons Act, the pay of the surgeons of county infirmaries in proportion to the considerably increased duties thrown on them by that Act; and, whether, as these surgeons have, in spite of the repeated applications to the General Prisons Board within the last twelve months, been performing these increased duties without extra pay, he can hold out a hope that the sanction of the Treasury will be given without further delay to a reasonable increase in their salaries?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: Sir, in answer to the hon. Member for Longford, I can say that it is only within the last two or three days that the Irish Government have submitted to the Treasury proposals for the remuneration of medical officers in Irish prisons. I have not yet had an opportunity of examining them properly, and therefore I cannot give information as to what effect they may have on the pay of surgeons of county infirmaries in Ireland. I assure the hon. Gentleman I shall lose no time in looking at these proposals and coming to a conclusion, and I hope before long to settle the question.

THE NEW FOREST—STONY CROSS INCLOSURE.—QUESTION.

MR. FAWCETT asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, as his predecessor stated on the 7th August 1876, that the Law Officers of the Crown were considering the legality of an inclosure made a short time previously near Stony Cross, in the manor of Minestead, in the New Forest, he can now inform the House what conclusion has been arrived at as to the legality of the said inclosure; and whether, if it is illegal, the Government intend to take any action in the matter?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that the opinion given by the Law Officers had been to the effect that they could not say that any rights of the Crown which it would be possible to enforce had been infringed by the inclosures made by the lord of the manor of Minstead. In these circumstances, it was impossible for the Government to take any action in the matter.

MR. FAWCETT asked whether there would be any objection to lay the opinion on the Table?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON : No.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—REPORT OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION.—

QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY asked the Paymaster General, When the Report of the Royal Commission, appointed to inquire into the privileges and revenues of certain Municipal Corporations, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE: Sir, I am not surprised at this Question. The inquiry has been prolonged far beyond what I expected when I undertook it. There were 101 Corporations on the original list, to which 10 others were afterwards added. We have examined a large number of witnesses from most of these places, though nothing like all who were anxious to come; and we have had to wade through a mass of Correspondence, former Reports, old charters, and other documents. A Royal Commission is not like a Parliamentary Committee, which can sit on stated days throughout the Session. The Members of this Commission, over which I have the honour to preside, are men fully engaged elsewhere. One is a member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. There are three Queen's Counsel; there are, also, Chairmen of Quarter Sessions in distant counties. I myself was Chairman of four Committees of this House last Session, and, of course, my time was much taken up. Nevertheless, we have held 118 sittings, of which 46 were during the Recess. We have completed 65 boroughs, and have received evidence with respect to all the rest; and I hope we may report before Whitsuntide. The hon. Gentleman may rely upon our losing no time, for I can assure him that we have had quite enough of the subject.

CORONERS BILL—THE SELECT COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. PELL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will move to enlarge the reference to the Select Committee to which the Coroners Bill was committed, in order to enable that Committee to take evidence and report on the whole question of the appointment, duties, and payment of Coroners?

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the way in which the Bill was drawn would give ample opportunity to the Committee to which it had been intrusted to report on all the subjects alluded to in his hon. Friend's Question. He had ordered a statement to be prepared for the use of the Committee, which he hoped would give them valuable information. He would venture to suggest that the Committee should, in the first place, go through the Bill without taking evidence; and if they should afterwards think it advisable to take evidence, he would have no objection to the Reference being enlarged to enable them to do so.

FACTORY LEGISLATION (INDIA).

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If the Indian Government has yet decided to introduce Factory legislation into India; and, if he is yet prepared to lay upon the Table the Report that was obtained as to the condition of the Factories in India?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Sir, I am sorry to say that we do not yet know the decision to which the Government of India has come upon this subject; but a Bill is certainly under their consideration. The only Report we have at present is one of July, 1875. It would, therefore, be probably better to await more recent information before laying any Papers on the Table.

THE SLAVE TRADE IN THE RED SEA.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If there have been any recent negotiations with Turkey on the subject of Slavery in the Red Sea, and what is the present footing of that question?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, a despatch, dated the 3rd of February, has been received from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, reporting that the draft of the Anti-Slave Trade Treaty which was submitted to the Porte last summer has passed the Council of Ministers, and that Caratheodori Pasha has been instructed at once to enter into negotiations with the British Representative for its conclusion.

FINANCE—EXCHEQUER BONDS. QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Exchequer Bonds for £2,750,000, which become payable on 16th, 23rd, and 27th of March next, and which are enumerated in a Paper recently laid upon the Table of the House, comprise the whole of last year's deficiency to be provided for before the 31st March next; and, whether he intends paying the bonds off out of the surplus income of the present year or renewing them; and, if the latter, for how long?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I believe there will be no further deficiency disclosed by the Appropriation Accounts to be provided for this year. But with regard to the more important part of the hon. Gentleman's Question, I would, with his permission, request him to wait two or three days, when I shall have to make a proposal to the House with regard to the necessary provision for meeting the bonds which are in question.

MR. CHILDERS asked whether, before the right hon. Gentleman made his proposal, a Statement of the Supplementary Expenditure for the present year would have been laid on the Table?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he hoped he would be able to lay on the Table in a few days a Statement with regard to some of the Supplementary Expenditure; but he was not sure that he could give a complete Statement.

THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—THE PERAK EXPEDITION—MEDALS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any application has been made to confer a medal on the officers and men who composed the expedition to Perak?

COLONEL STANLEY, in reply, said that, so far as he could trace the matter, some application of that kind was made two or three years ago; but the service performed at Perak was not thought to be of so important a nature as to render it the subject of a special medal. At the same time there was some hard fighting; and he was, therefore, prepared to place himself in communication with the Colonial and the India Offices with the view of seeing whether the medal for frontier service could not be so extended as to include a special clasp for Perak.

DIVINITY SCHOOL—THE UNIVERSITY, DUBLIN.—QUESTION.

MR. PLUNKET asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he will now state what course the Government intend to pursue in regard to the recommendations of the Royal Commission of last year relating to a Divinity School in the University of Dublin?

MR. J. LOWTHER, in reply, said, the matter to which his hon. and learned Friend referred was one involving the greatest consideration, and still engaging the attention of the Government. He hoped shortly to announce the decision at which they had arrived.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

RESOLUTION. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to the First Resolution, as amended [20th February],

"That, whenever the Committee of Supply appointed for the consideration of the ordinary Army, Navy, and Civil Service Estimates stands as the first Order of the Day on a Monday, Mr. Speaker shall leave the Chair without putting any question."

And which Amendment was,

After the word "Monday," to insert the words "provided there be not on the Paper any Amendment relevant to the class of Estimates about to be discussed."—(Mr. Anderson.)

Question again proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Debate resumed.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Hon. Members who have discussed these Resolutions at some length have incurred an amount of censure which it seems to me is entirely undeserved. The House of Commons would be unworthy of its name, and it would be false to its character as the Representative Assembly of the people, if it did not offer a determined resistance to these despotic and reactionary Resolutions. The more these Resolutions are considered, the more objectionable they appear to independent Members on both sides of the House. We were told at first that the Resolutions had nothing to do with obstruction; but the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), who loves to persecute opinion, religious or political, when it differs from his own, declared the real motive of these restrictive proposals. By the first Resolution the Chancellor of the Exchequer would push us at once into Committee when Supply is down; and when he gets us into Committee, without any previous discussion, he will then still further restrict our freedom of debate; and yet we are told, in the blandest possible manner, that all this will facilitate the discussion of the Estimates. If you want to facilitate the discussion of the Estimates, why do you propose, in the second Resolution, to gag Members in Committee, to limit their freedom of speech, and restrict their right of taking divisions? While many plausible excuses are put forward for these proposed alterations in the Rules, the principal argument urged in their favour is that they will facilitate the despatch of Public Business. Now, this is the one important point which the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and those who have spoken on his side of the question, have, I venture to say, entirely failed to prove. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire says the time has come when something must be done to maintain the dignity of Parliament. I quite agree with him; but when he suggests that the House of Commons shall put on a straight jacket and wear a strong chain, held in the hands of the Executive, in order to look dignified and respectable, I fail to appreciate the force of his reasoning. If the House were capable of that, it would be capable of sacrificing at once both its character and dignity; and no one ought to be surprised, therefore, at the opposition which the House has given to these very obnoxious Resolutions. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) has distinguished himself among the champions of Parliamentary coercion on this side of the House; and he asked us the other night to consider what was the complaint of the country against the House, and he told us that it was that the House was unequal to its work, and unable to get through the legislation urgently demanded. The country has certainly a right to complain of the deadlock in legislation; but I venture to contend that the remedy which has found favour with the right hon. Gentleman will aggravate the disease instead of removing it. If you stifle the expression of popular wants in the House of Commons, where shall they find utterance? You may say these Resolutions do not go so far as that. But, remember, they lead the way in that direction, and the experience of all history shows that if encroachments of this kind are not sternly resisted at the outset, they will be repeated again and again, and they will find you on each successive occasion less able to repel them, until finally you are obliged to succumb without raising a murmur of opposition. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Chester (Mr. Dodson), who has been referred to as a high authority on the Business of Parliament, told us he had endeavoured to induce the House to part with some of its work. I regret very much that his efforts in that direction were not successful. He was then on the right track, and pursuing a more statesman-like course than he is now pursuing in lending his support, however cautiously, to the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There are only two rational courses, by either of which the difficulties of the House can be removed. You must either so enlarge the powers of local government as to give Home Rule to Ireland for Irish affairs, Home Rule to Scotland for Scottish affairs, and Home Rule to England for English affairs, while at the same time maintaining the Imperial Parliament in all its strength and integrity for carrying on the government of the Empire, and for the transaction of all Imperial affairs; or, taking the Representatives of the three nationalities as they are in this House, you must assign to each national section respectively the legislation affecting the country which each represents. With the continued accumulation of work you must introduce the principle of the division of labour, or get rid of such portions of the work as you are unable to perform. The latter is by far the more sensible course to adopt; and I assert, emphatically, that this House is utterly incompetent to legislate satisfactorily for the internal wants of the three Kingdoms, besides grappling with the multitude of affairs comprehended in the management of a vast and widely-extended Empire. One day the House is summoned to discuss a question of high Imperial interest, on another to debate the merits of a Turnpike Bill—or, as somebody said a few days ago, a road across Hyde Park; but no one has undertaken to show why Parliament should stoop to questions of this description. What should I, as an Irish Member, know about the merits of the Scotch Roads and Bridges Bill, and why should I be obliged to master its details to the possible neglect of matters in which my constituents take a deeper interest? Why, on the other hand, should Englishmen and Scotchmen insist on having a voice in deciding the merits of Irish Water Bills, Gas Bills, and Railway Bills? These are plain questions and urgent questions which the Select Committee on Public Business seems to have entirely ignored; but they are important questions which will one day force themselves on the attention of statesmen, and demand recognition and settlement. You have sanctioned a policy which is extending the Empire every day and adding to your tremendous responsibilities. But domestic affairs are not less pressing on that account. They are constantly growing with the growth of modern civilization. There is now a school in every village, and the land is dotted with libraries and reading-rooms, like oases in the desert, where the people resort to drink of the fountain of knowledge. There is education, and information, and enlightenment everywhere, accompanied by discussion; and the consequence is that a thousand new problems of social, industrial, and political interest spring up every year which demand the consideration of the highest statesmanship. Looking at the condition of Germany and other countries, it must come home to the mind of every thoughtful man that some of the questions of the day, to which I allude, are questions which it would be dangerous to ignore. The transformation which the work of Parliament has undergone has been well described by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. J. Cowen), and the evils of which he complains arise from the tendency to centralization, which has been growing stronger and stronger every year, and which the present Executive has forced to a point which is simply intolerable. It flatters the vanity of the House to assure it that when local institutions are brought under the control of the Government they will be under the control of Parliament also; and that, as the people control the House of Commons, they will always rule, no matter who may govern. Statements of this kind were put forward in support of the Prisons Bill; but nothing could be more delusive. The prisons were handed over to the Government. But does any unofficial Member of this House imagine that any word or act of his will influence prison discipline or prison management? No; it was the officials of the Home Office, and not the Members of this House, who obtained control of the prisons when you centralized the prison system. They will take care to capture each new Home Secretary, and bind him hand-and-foot with the red tape of their system; and the same thing happens in each of the other Departments. The Minister presiding over each is in the hands of his own officials. By-and-bye, when these evils shall accumulate beyond endurance, the people will cry out, not against the tyranny of the Government or the tyranny of Parliament, but against the tyranny of confederated officials, against the tyranny of an odious bureaucracy, which is the most hateful tyranny of all. Surely it is time to make a stand against centralization, if local liberty and local power are not to be entirely surrendered. The necessity of doing something to facilitate Public Business appears to be a sufficient argument with some hon. Gentlemen in favour of these Resolutions; but if you are to go on tightening your Rules, and increasing your Business, the logical conclusion of your action will be a despotism which will dispense with Constitutional liberty and Parliamentary institutions. It will certainly be something like the irony of fate, or poetical vengeance, if this House, which has often used its power to destroy the liberty of many nations, should, as a necessity of its policy, end by destroying its own. It is not, perhaps, from an Irish Representative whose country has felt the tyranny of your sway that you should receive warning of such a possible catastrophe; and I will conclude by declaring that, as a friend of freedom of speech and popular rights, I, for one, will consent to no part of the coercion code which the Minister has attempted to fasten upon the House.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE believed that the House was generally of opinion that they should arrive at some compromise on this question, and proceed to that very interesting and important topic—the future of the British Army. When his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a friendly and generous spirit, accepted the compromise of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), he (Mr. Beresford Hope) ventured to point out reasons why he thought it was not sufficient. There were certain evils which were inherent in it which were not so conspicuous in the proposition of 1876. Under the Rule of 1872 there would be much more temptation than under that of 1876 to heap the Notice Papers on first Supply nights with Motions which might be raised so as to prevent the Minister in charge of the Estimates from making his Statement till after the dinner-hour, when the House was in a state of exhausted collapse. In contrast to this, the expedient which the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggested in examining Mr. Speaker before the Committee, and which Mr. Speaker in his evidence unmistakably supported, and of which the Chairman of Committees also most strongly approved, was that the Minister in charge of the Estimates should make his Statement on the Motion that the Speaker should leave the Chair. He would make his Statement in face of the Amendments on the Paper, and could therefore traverse and answer a great many of them by anticipation. If that were done, and the Resolution of 1876 adopted, the Government would gain considerable advantage, and, at the same time, no hon. Members would be stopped from the right of stating a grievance before Supply. The rationale of the present system was that the House being already in Committee of Supply the Minister stated the reasons of the Vote for which he asked. The rationale of the one which he proposed was that the Minister gave his reasons for going into a Committee of Supply by a general sketch of what would be asked for when that Committee was set up. If, therefore, his right hon. Friend would take the framework of the Resolution of 1876, modified by that other reform which he himself originally suggested, of allowing the Minister to make his Statement on the Motion that the Speaker should leave the Chair, he believed that it would meet the general wish of the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was anxious to agree to a compromise in order to cut short the protracted discussion, and with that view he had already accepted certain Amendments to his Resolution; and he thought that the compromise he had so offered was quite sufficient. He was not, therefore, prepared to accept the additional Amendments suggested. He could only repeat now what he had said on one or two previous occasions. They had discussed the matter very fully, and as far as the technical question of the alteration of the Rules was concerned the argument had been exhausted. He admitted, of course, that the larger and wider questions raised by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) would require, and indeed they deserved, larger and fuller examination; but they did not arise upon this technical question, and the House would hardly think it convenient to go into them. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Member would not think him discourteous in declining to follow him. The present Resolution dealt with the question of the best way of so arranging the details of the Orders as to give the best facilities for pursuing Business with decent rapidity, and, at the same time, without unduly fettering the rights and liberties of the House. Of course, hon. Members would understand that it was impossible to have any Rules that would not in some way fetter the liberty which was the natural privilege of every man in this country. Even the Rule that they must not speak twice on the same subject might be said to fetter the liberty of every man to speak when he liked. The question before the

Mr. O'Connor Power

House had been carefully considered, not only in this debate and in the Committee which sat last year, but also in former years. On the whole, he thought the Resolution which he had proposed, with the Amendments which he had already accepted, and which were very considerable, would be a fair and reasonable arrangement and one which they might work upon. It was pretty much the arrangement that was adopted in 1872 and 1873; and while carrying out the proposal of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter W. Barttelot), and the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon), it would not infringe the liberty of anyone. What he hoped was that now, after so much discussion, the House would be allowed to come to a conclusion. They would first divide on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Glasgow, and if he was successful, the Rule would be adopted in that form. If he failed, then he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was prepared to adopt either the Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex or that of the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury. The Business on the Paper was important and interesting, and there would be a good deal of disappointment felt if the Army Estimates were to be put off. His proposal was that if they should come to a vote at an early hour on the first Resolution, he would not ask the House to take the other Resolutions into consideration at present; but they might stand over for another time.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had refused to surrender the point, and would remind him that if he wished to proceed to the consideration of the Army Estimates at once, the only way of succeeding in his desire was to accept the suggestion of a further compromise. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would move to add the words "or Notice" to the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), in order that questions requiring some explanation might be put and debated before Supply.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to insert, after the word "Amendment," the words "or Notice."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or Notice' be there inserted."

MR. ANDERSON said, he willingly accepted the addition proposed by his hon. Friend. He was also sorry the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not able to accept his Amendment, because the right hon. Gentleman put himself in the peculiar position of going back to the Liberal Resolutions of 1872, instead of to his own in 1876. It was quite clear, if the 1872 Rule were adopted, irrelevant Notices would be piled up on Monday nights, and that was exactly what the House wished to avoid.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON thought it would be more convenient to take the sense of the House on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope). He hoped, therefore, the hon. Member for Glasgow would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY thought the Government must have had some other object in view when they refused the reasonable compromise which had been offered. They were all equally interested with the Government in the proper conduct of the Public Business; but they could not be silenced by the statements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which were not arguments; and he protested against the sic volo sic jubeo style in which the right hon. Gentleman was treating the House.

MR. ANDERSON said, he would withdraw his Amendment in deference to the appeal of the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington). The sense of the House would be taken distinctly on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope), which practically was the same as his own.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, and Original Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in moving, as an Amendment, to insert after the word "shall," the words "except on first going into Committee on the ordinary Army, Navy, or Civil Service Estimates respectively," said, that its object was to allow Amendments, whether relevant or not to the Estimates, to be brought forward on the first night that they were placed on the Paper. In consequence of the appeal made on a former evening by the noble Marquess the Leader of the Opposition, he would not move it, unless the House wished it. At present he asked leave to withdraw it. ["No, no!"]

Amendment proposed,

After the word "shall," in line 3, of the First Resolution, to insert the words "except on first going into Committee on the ordinary Army, Navy, or Civil Service Estimates respectively."
—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

